SENATE—Thursday, March 20, 1986

(Legislative day of Tuesday, March 18, 1986)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Our prayer today will be offered by Father Michael J. Murray, St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church in Washington, DC. He is sponsored by Ernest Garcia, Sergeant at Arms.

PRAYER

The Reverend Michael J. Murray, St. Joseph's Church on Capitol Hill, Washington, DC, offered the following prayer:

Loving God, Father of us all. We stand in Your presence once again, at the outstart of another day of work. We praise You, and thank You for having created us in Your image and likeness. We praise You and thank You for having redeemed us and for having accompanied us on our journeys. We praise You and thank You for having chosen us to mirror Your love and care to a broken world.

Bless these men and women, our chosen representatives. Let them be a conspicuous example of devotion to the sense of duty and of service to the advancement of the common good. May they always look to the welfare of the whole human family, which is tied together by the manifold bonds linking races, peoples, and nations. Let them work to exercise the honorable art of politics without thought of personal convenience. Prudently and honorably let them fight against injustice and oppression, the arbitrary rule of one man or one party, and lack of tolerance. Let them devote themselves to the welfare of all sincerely and fairly, with charity and political courage. This we ask in Your name. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The able majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished President pro tempore, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND]. Under the standing order the leaders have 10 minutes each—and I would reserve time that leaders do not use—followed by special orders in favor of Senator HAWKINS and Senator PROXMIRE for 5 minutes each; routine morning business not to extend beyond 10:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each; then return to the motion to proceed to S. 1017, the regional airport bill.

We have had a good debate and discussion on the regional airport bill. It would be my hope that we could make some headway on that bill today. I certainly cannot quarrel with the debate. There was almost 6 hours of solid debate on the issue yesterday by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. TRIBLE]. So we have had good debate.

I would hope today that we can reach some time agreement because there are a number of other items we would like to complete action on before the Easter recess begins at the close of business Thursday, March 27. That would include the Contra aid proposal, which I assume we will take up before the Easter recess, but again I will want to visit with the President on that matter. Second, we will complete action on the balanced budget on March 25. There are a number of issues, drug export bill, sports franchise bill, and others that we would like to start on—and maybe a trade bill. Then I have indicated to the chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator DOMENICI, that we might be able to move to the budget resolution which was ordered reported out of the Senate Budget Committee yesterday afternoon. Again, I think we need to study that resolution rather carefully, and I am not certain that will be up next week.

Mr. President, let me yield briefly to the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD].

FATHER MICHAEL MURRAY

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for yielding in order that I might be permitted to extend a very special and warm welcome to Father Murray, of St. Joseph's, who has opened our Senate this morning.

Mr. President, St. Joseph's is a very key church on the Hill because it is the closest to the Senate office buildings. There is a great ministry that goes on from St. Joseph's for Members and their staffs on the Hill.

I find that it is a very inspiring and renewing experience to drop in a number of mornings a week for 8 o'clock mass. I guess you would call me a high Baptist. But I find this is a very delightful and inspiring experience. Father Murray has had that covenant relationship with the Hill now for a number of years, to be the shepherd, to be the spiritual helper and counselor and guide. I express my very personal thanks to him for providing a place for quiet meditation to begin the day and oftentimes to get us through the day. I am delighted that the Senate was blessed this morning by his presence and by his prayer.

I say to the majority leader that I will not speak to the future because our colleague from Alaska I notice is here, and I would urge the majority leader to yield to him for a very brief word about the future of Father Murray.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield 2 minutes of my time to the Senator from Alaska [Mr. MURKOWSKI].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I thank the majority leader and I thank my colleague from the State of Oregon.

I think it is appropriate that I take the opportunity this morning to commend Father Michael Murray for the prayer of thanksgiving which he gave in opening the Senate. I am particularly proud, Mr. President, to advise you and my colleagues that this summer Father Murray will move to Fairbanks, AK. I wish to say that this is in recognition of the significant ministry which he has provided for our colleagues and associates at St. Joseph's. On the other hand, I want to reassure my colleagues that in no way is it anything more than a reward.

Of course, Father Murray is eminently qualified for the important assignment ahead. He is the only child of Charles and Frances Murray, of Bethesda, MD, where he graduated from Cathedral Latin Preseminary and Catholic University cum laude. He then entered the North American College in Rome, and upon graduation was ordained to the deaconate by Cardinal Baum. His ordination to the priesthood was held at St. Mathews Cathedral here in Washington in September 1976.

Father Murray has wanted to serve in Alaska for many years, ever since he had an opportunity to visit St. Mary's and McGrath, and I might add he visited at an appropriate time, in the dead of winter when Alaska is in full bloom.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Father Murray received a request from Father Whelan of our Fairbanks diocese to serve in Fairbanks, AK, but he was unable to leave Washington at that time. However, he pursued his interest, climbed the Chilkoot trail. He has returned to Alaska and has shown a love of the outdoors. It is my understanding that he intends to take up flying and work the missions when he does establish himself in Alaska late this fall. We are very blessed to have him come to our State. He has a warm and genuine interest in Alaska's people. I am gratified that he has been chosen to serve the Lord in our great State of Alaska. I certainly welcome a new Alaskan. I thank the Chair and the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank both Senators HATFIELD and MURKOWSKI.

Mr. President, I shall just take a couple minutes and then I will yield the floor.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, March 20 is being celebrated as National Agriculture Day throughout the Nation in recognition of the tremendous achievements and contributions made by the American farmer.

AGRICULTURE—AMERICA'S HEARTBEAT

Mr. President, the American farmer is the envy of the world. He produces enough food and fiber for 116 people—86 in the United States and 30 in foreign countries. American farmers today produce over 80 percent more crop output on an acre of land than did their fathers. Today, 1 hour of farm labor produces 16 times as much food and other crops as it did in 1920. In fact, agricultural production per hour has been increasing about three times as fast as industrial production.

We have an opportunity today to remind all Americans of the American farmer's productivity and the benefits of agriculture to our standard of living. U.S. consumers spend only 15 percent of their disposable income on food and yet are blessed with a stable supply of many different types of food items.

Agriculture is the Nation's biggest industry. Farm assets total over $1 trillion and are equal to about 70 percent of the capital assets of all manufacturing corporations in the United States. Agriculture accounts for 20 percent of the Nation's gross national product with $610 billion of business activity yearly. Agriculture is the Nation's largest employer with roughly 21 million people—1 out of 5 American jobs—involved in some phase of agriculture from growing food to selling it at the supermarket. And although U.S. farm exports have fallen from their 1981 peak of $43.8 billion to a projected $28 billion this year they are still a key ingredient to U.S. farm income. Every billion dollars in farm exports generates 35,000 jobs and creates another $1.4 billion of economic activity in the United States, for a total of $2.4 billion.

The American farmer is a consumer and taxpayer as well. Farmers, as consumers, spend $45 billion a year on goods, services, and personal taxes. Total farm production expenses or the cost of producing crops and livestock for 271 million people amounts to $139.5 billion.

KANSAS—AN AGRICULTURAL GIANT

Mr. President, my own State of Kansas has long been considered the breadbasket of the world. Kansas is the No. 1 State in wheat production and wheat and wheat products exported. Kansas is also No. 1 in sorghum silage production, flour milling capacity and grain sorghum produced. Kansas is second in commercial grain storage capacity, total cropland, cattle on feed and dressed beef production. The annual value of Kansas agricultural production is nearly $5 billion in crops and livestock.

Kansas is also the home of Kansas State University, one of the Nation's first land grant schools and a major teaching and research university. The university has been a leader in training students for successful agriculture-related careers. In addition, the Kansas agricultural experiment station has provided basic and applied research for almost 100 years to aid farmers and others. There are currently over 600 research projects ongoing in the experiment station network, which includes scientists from 30 KSU departments, 5 branch stations, and 11 experiment fields. Further, the Kansas Cooperative Extension Service is an essential source in disseminating this information to all parts of our State and has helped Kansas attain the status of being one of the leading agricultural States in the Nation.

A TIME OF CHALLENGE

Mr. President, I am proud of American farmers and Kansas farmers. Yet we all know that these are difficult times in agriculture. Many farmers are struggling to simply survive from several years of falling prices. They have seen embargos wreck markets and ruin our reputation as a reliable supplier. They have been hit by high interest rates and burdened by mounting debts. In fact, the largest single production expense last year was interest on debts which cost farmers $21.1 billion. Farmers have been a direct victim of runaway Federal spending which has caused a huge budget deficit resulting in a strong dollar and drastically reduced exports. In my State and others, many farmers have faced several years of bad weather and insect problems.

When farmers struggle, the local businessmen struggle, the local bankers struggle, and in some cases entire communities wither. So it is important to remind Americans of what the farmer contributes to our society and to also remind Americans of the difficulties the family farmer is encountering in today's economic environment.

TOUGH CHOICES

It is my hope that Congress will be committed to working in a bipartisan manner to make the tough decisions on the budget deficit and other issues which will benefit farmers and all Americans. We've taken positive steps through the passage of a new 5-year farm bill that protects income for a couple of years and we've reformed the Farm Credit System. We will need to look at other measures to ensure that farmers have access to credit and that banks can service the small communities which make up American agriculture.

Internationally, with the export tools provided in the new farm legislation, we have sent a clear message to the world. The message is that the American farmer will compete, he is in business to stay and the United States will be more aggressive in finding and developing markets. Our Government will stand beside our farmers to ensure that they are competing on a level playing field.

WORKING TOGETHER

Our problems in agriculture are not a result of a particular administration or a particular party. Rather they are the result of years and years of shortsighted economic policies and farm policies which have sent confusing and short-range signals to farmers. Unfortunately, some farmers may not be able to endure the present circumstances long enough to see agriculture recover and be healthy again. But it is our obligation to work together to address the current problems, providing assistance and a long-term direction that makes economic sense to the long-term security and prosperity of our Nation and its farmers.

I only indicate that this is a time of challenge for the American farmer. It is a time of challenge and a time of trouble for many American farmers.

But I am confident that those of us in Congress who have a responsibility have responded by passing what I consider to be a good farm bill with the minor amendments made just this year.

I also believe it will address some of the farm credit problems that farmers are having in many parts of the country.

So I just suggest that notwithstanding a very troublesome time, I believe that there is light at the end of the tunnel and there is hope for American agriculture, which means hope for the American consumer and others who rely on American agriculture for their existence.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the acting minority leader is recognized.

FUNDING THE CONTRAS IS FUNDING TERRORISTS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the Reagan administration has framed the upcoming vote for $100 million in aid to the Contras as a vote for or against communism. Yet millions of patriotic Americans who deplore communism do not believe funding Contra killing is the way to stop it.

Nor do I.

This is not a vote for or against communism.

It is a vote on what is the best way to stop communism.

It is a vote on whether we are going to take still another step down the bloody road to war in Nicaragua.

We are walking into a trap in Nicaragua—the same horrible trap we got ourselves into in Vietnam:

First we pour in U.S. money; then more U.S. money; then U.S. military advisers; then U.S. troops.

I say no.

The time to stop is now—before it is too late.

President Reagan and administration officials call the Contras freedom fighters. Yet the Contras are using terrorist tactics. Trained and financed by our Government, their chief targets are civilian, not military.

Mr. President, neither I, nor any other Senator, carries any grief for the Sandinistas. I deplore the tactics the Sandinistas employ. But the issue here is not the Sandinistas; it is whether or not U.S. taxpayers want to continue to finance an illegal terrorist war.

I want to refresh my colleagues' memories about a few of the terrorist acts carried out by the Contras. In September 1983, U.S.-backed rebels attacked the main airport in Managua. In October 1983, the Contras launched several air and sea attacks against Nicaragua's Pacific ports of Corinto and Puerto Sandino.

According to press reports, U.S. officials said the CIA helped plan these attacks. The officials said these actions were, and I quote the New York Times of October 16, 1983:

> The result of a decision, reached by the CIA over the summer, that attacks directly against industrial and transportation targets inside Nicaragua would be a quicker and more effective way of hurting the Sandinistas than previous efforts.

Of course, such actions are completely illegal under international law and are a violation of the OAS Charter.

The campaign continued. By March 1984 it was evident that principal Nicaraguan harbors were mined and that the CIA was instrumental in carrying out these activities.

Civilians have been targets, too. On several occasions Amnesty International reported that it appealed to Honduran authorities on behalf of individuals captured by Contra forces. In one case, Amnesty International appealed to authorities in December 1982 on behalf of lay church leaders Maria Eugenia de Barreda and her husband Felipe Barreda who were seized by Nicaraguan Democratic Forces [FDN] while working as teachers near the Honduran border. The Barredas were—> Taken across the border and reportedly transported by Honduran Army forces to the town of Danli where they and other Nicaraguan captives were reportedly held and interrogated. According to detailed reports, from captives who escaped FDN/Honduran custody at Danli, the Barredas had been severely beaten. Other reports maintained that Maria Eugenia de Barreda had been repeatedly raped and was held bound and gagged. The bodies of the two were reportedly found near Danli several months later.

In another case, FDN forces seized five student teachers on September 28, 1984 and another on October 5 in Nicaragua's Jinotega department. According to Amnesty International, they were removed across the border to Honduras. One of them who reportedly escaped, told a press conference in Managua that she had been held inside Honduras for part of her captivity, where she was raped and tortured.

In its report, "Human Rights in Nicaragua," America's Watch refers to two widely reported incidents in 1984 and 1985, where women traveling in trucks to visit their sons in the military service were killed. The FDN attacked a vehicle killing 8 women and wounding 19 other civilians in September 1984 in Pantasma, Jinotega. Nine women were killed and 24 other civilians were wounded when a truck was attacked near the base of Mulukuku, 168 miles north of Managua in July 1985. More recently, in the February 20, 1986, issue of the New York Times, Stephen Kinzer reported an attack on a group of women traveling in the countryside. According to the story:

> A land mine tore through a pickup truck carrying 17 civilians. A rebel band waiting in ambush then opened fire. Five women ranging in age from 28 to 70 were killed. A Swiss agronomist who had worked in the area for three years also died.

The U.S.-backed rebels have been accused of heinous crimes and atrocities. These have been the subject of numerous debates in Washington which have degenerated into a who-can-top-who argument. Yet attacks against civilians and civilian facilities like schools, health clinics, and farms continue.

Mr. President, it is not a question of degree of atrocities—or of who commits more, the Contras or the Sandinistas—it is simply a question of whether U.S. taxpayers want to continue to finance terrorist activities, not only against a government we dislike, but against women and children and schools as well. These Contra tactics have done nothing to help foster democracy. It is time for us to stop backing them.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of the leadership time on this side of the aisle.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR HAWKINS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

TERRORISM AND DRUGS: AN UNHOLY ALLIANCE

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I call attention once again to the umbilical link between drug trafficking and terrorism. The International Narcotics Control Board, an agency of the United Nations, recently issued its annual report which contains grim documentation of steady expansion and growth of the narcotics trade. The Board states that the abuse of various drugs is spreading, the number of users is increasing, and that new areas of illicit cultivation and production have emerged. The net result of this growing drug trade is economic disruption, corruption, and political instability. The most forbidding aspect of the Narcotics Control Board report is the observation that both illegal arms trades and international terrorism are connected with drug trafficking. The huge profits generated by drugs tend to undermine legitimate economies and political institutions. Narcotics syndicates are highly organized and their activities are often tied in with the smuggling of weapons and fomenting of violence and terrorism. The tremendous cash-flow that is being churned spills over into illegal traffic in firearms, vehicles, ships, and aircraft, and in the process fosters subversion, crime, and terrorism.

Drug traffickers attempt to conceal their ill-gotten gains by money-laundering, often through legitimate businesses. This undermines the economic and social order, spreads violence and corruption, and threatens the political stability and security of some countries. Not the least of our concerns is the threat to youth: When drug abuse ensnares young people, it affects the future of nations.

Last December, our Ambassador to the United Nations, Vernon Walters, remarked in a speech that terrorist and insurgent groups are turning to drug deals to fund their operations in many parts of the world. Ambassador Walters observed that "terrorism and narcotics together are destabilizing whole regions of the world and posing a significant threat to duly constituted governments." Secretary of State Shultz has characterized drug trafficking as the "modern day version of piracy" and warned of the serious security threat posed by armed, heavily financed drug traffickers.

I should, Mr. President, like to cite three examples from the scores of incidents linking drugs and terrorist acts. In Peru, 36 coca eradication workers were literally slaughtered by narcotics entrepreneurs who respect no laws but their own. In Colombia, the Minister of Justice was assassinated by drug kingpins because of his tough stand against the narcotics trade. In Mexico, last November, 21 policemen were ambushed by traffickers protecting their marijuana cache.

Ambassador Walters emphasized that "these are not isolated incidents; they are essential elements in a pattern of lawlessness which has infiltrated all societies affected by narcotics trafficking and production."

On February 10, the Honorable Elliott Abrams, the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, addressed the Council of Foreign Relations in New York City. Secretary Abrams alerted us anew to "the mounting evidence of a deadly connection between narcotics traffickers and guerrilla terrorist groups." He singled out for special attention the case of Colombia, where guerrilla groups have been found protecting cocaine labs and landing strips and facilitating shipments of drugs. Last November, terrorists attacked the Colombian Supreme Court and killed nearly half its judges. The judges who were attacked first and extradition documents burned convinced Colombian law enforcement officials that the terrorists were working directly for drug traffickers.

The sophistication of the weapons used in that attack and the origin of the weaponry, Communist-led Nicaragua, demonstrate the ignoble association between narcotics and terrorism. More than 15,000 Cuban-trained Latins have been dispersed throughout Central and South America to spread havoc wherever they can.

They are armed with weapons, communications, and intelligence capabilities often far superior to the governments and security forces they are attempting to subvert. These Cuban-trained guerrillas have direct links to drug dealers in a sort of tweedle-dee-dee tweedle-dee-dum relationship.

I wish that every leader of every nation had as firm a grasp on the terrorism and drug addiction link as does the Deputy Prime Minister of Malaysia, Musa Hitam. The Minister says, and these are his words: "We recognize that drug traffickers are working to undermine every aspect of life that we hold dear. They are corrupting the young, creating a population of drug slaves; distorting fragile national legal structures and eroding political guarantees. They then seek only to open new markets for their poison." Those, Mr. President, are the words of a very wise man.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

STAR WARS WILL SET OFF THE BIGGEST ARMS RACE IN HISTORY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will star wars aggravate the arms race? Mr. President, if this country presses ahead with star wars it will set off a furious arms race between offensive and defensive nuclear weapons. What will be the result of that stepped-up arms race? It will be immensely expensive. Will it increase our security? Or will it enhance the likelihood of nuclear war. Well, this Senator firmly believes it will increase the fear, the danger, and the likelihood of a fatal accident that could trigger the disaster of a full-fledged nuclear war. Does any thoughtful American really believe that, if the United States should begin to make real progress in building a shield that gradually destroyed the credibility of the Russian nuclear deterrent, the Soviets would not pour its demonstrated technological capability into a desperate effort to overcome our star wars shield with nuclear penetration capability and with massively increased offensive nuclear power?

Again and again the Soviets have matched United States nuclear weapons achievements with their own. Consider the long and consistent record. This country first developed the relatively primitive, Little Boy nuclear bomb the we exploded at Hiroshima. For a few years, we had a nuclear weapons monopoly. Then the Russians made their own first primitive nuclear weapon breakthrough. The United States pioneered intercontinental ballistic missiles so that we could strike the Soviet Union over the pole from the continental United States in a 30-minute flight. The Soviet Union matched that advance in less than 2 years with their own ICBM's. In 1960, the United States greatly added to its strategic advantage when we successfully equipped submarines with nuclear missiles that we could fire at distant targets from below the ocean and covering thousands of miles. Within 8 years, or so, the Soviets equipped their own missile-firing submarines.

And then in 1970, America pioneered what seemed like a definitive military advantage with the first multiple independently targeted reentry vehicles. This missile could launch not one but several warheads simultaneously at different targets hundreds of miles apart. Our leaders said it would be years, if ever, before the Russians could catch and match the United States. How long did it take? It was 5 years. And that is not all.

Again and again and again we have developed advanced nuclear weapons and again and again and again, without exception, the Soviets have succeeded in matching us. Is star wars different? If we develop a defensive shield that can protect the United States would the Soviets be able to do the same? On the basis of all past experience, it would seem that if we do develop such a shield they very probably could soon match it. Our adversary has shown that it will literally beg, buy, borrow, and steal whatever is necessary to maintain its nuclear parity.

In the case of star wars, however, there is a very big "if." The big "if" is whether or not the United States can itself develop an impenetrable barrier in the sky capable of shooting down almost all of the Soviet offensive missiles that might challenge it. A vast majority of eminent experts and scientists say that we cannot. If they are right, the star wars effort will be the most costly and foolish waste of money in the history of the world. If they are wrong and star wars works, what happens then? Well, we know from past experience that the Russians will again beg, buy, borrow, and steal whatever they need first to penetrate it. Second, they might also—I repeat, also—go on to build their own star wars defense. And what would be our response? We too would rise to the challenge to build even more powerful nuclear offenses as well as nuclear defenses. This insane arms race will rush on.

Do you doubt this course? Consider under these circumstances what would any Russian leader with any common sense do in the face of the headlong drive by the United States to build a super astrodome in the sky? The answer is easy. The first step the Russians will take will be to follow the course that the great majority of independent American experts say they can follow most easily. They will strive to research, develop, produce, and deploy the hardware that will penetrate the SDI defense. The Soviets have the technological capacity to do it. They have the time. It will take this country at least 20 years to finally deploy star wars. They fear that the United States might succeed in building a star wars system that could prevent the penetration of a Soviet attack if they do not make a vigorous, major effort to develop the offensive capability to penetrate it. The Soviet Union also know that the offensive capability will come far cheaper, quicker, and more surely than the long shot of duplicating the trillion dollar-plus American star wars.

Furthermore, they know the duplication of star wars will—like the other Russian nuclear weapons breakthroughs—follow much more quickly and easily if they permit the Americans to go first, to go through the agonizingly expensive and time-consuming process of building the first star wars defense.

So the Russian defensive star wars will follow, if and when we succeed. Do you ask, "Isn't that exactly what President Reagan has asked? Won't world peace be served if, at long last, the two great superpowers both build successful antimissile defenses?" The answer to that is an emphatic "no." Here is why; Both superpowers will find their offensive nuclear deterrent credibility challenged by the specter of a successful star wars defense. So both will rush ahead to build the offensive capability to penetrate the adversary's defense. The offense will be cheaper. It will be more swiftly produced. Both sides can deploy it far more quickly and easily. Result: Star wars will set off the furious offensive-defensive arms race that this Senator foresees.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

MYTH OF THE DAY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, my myth of the day is that we can be confident of the accuracy of recent forecasts of declining Federal budget deficits over the next 5 years. That is a myth. Let me say why it is a myth.

There has been a great deal of excitement over the newest Federal budget deficit estimates which forecast that without further budget cuts or tax increases the deficit would fall to $100 billion by 1991.

These optimistic projections are based upon a series of heroic assumptions that interest rates will decline further, inflation will stay under control, economic growth will accelerate, and there will be no increase in real military spending. The euphoria surrounding these pollyannish projections will be quickly dissipated if any of these assumptions turn out to be wrong.

Just how accurate have budget forecasts been since the Budget Act was passed in 1974? A recent staff study prepared for the Subcommittee on Economic Resources, Competitiveness, and Security Economics of the Joint Economic Committee details the abysmal record of optimistic forecasts which never came true.

The JEC study found that 10 of the 11 projections analyzed overestimated the average growth rate of real GNP over the forecast period. While the actual growth rate of real GNP from 1974 to 1985 was 2.4 percent, the official Office of Management and Budget forecasts came in with a figure of 4.3 percent, or 75 percent higher than the actual growth rate.

The overly optimistic OMB forecasts resulted in underestimating the interest rate on 3-month Treasury bills by more than one-third. The OMB forecast said the bill rate over the 11 years would average 6.8 percent while the actual figure was 9.5 percent.

These feel-good scenarios wildly underestimated the budget deficits especially when we look at each budget projection for the fourth and fifth years into the future. Over the last decade, deficit projections for the fourth year into the future have underestimated the deficit by a whopping average of $158 billion in that fourth year alone. When we look at the budget projections for the fifth ensuring fiscal year, we find that the average underestimation of the deficit has grown to an unbelievable and astronomical $212 billion in that fifth year alone.

Based upon the historical record, anyone willing to bet that the current 5-year projections of sharply declining budget deficits are accurate, would probably also be willing to take an even bet that the sun will rise in Milwaukee before it does in Washington next Tuesday morning.

THE LIABILITY INSURANCE CRISIS

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, many doctors in this country are finding that the costs of liability insurance for obstetric work is increasing so much, more and more physicians are declining such work. The local transit authority in Louisville, KY, has seen its liability insurance rates go up from $46,800 for $10 million in coverage in July 1984 to $555,100 for only $6 million in coverage 1 year later.

Situations like these are driving up the cost of daily living for people as higher insurance costs are passed on to the consumer. A recent article in Louisville magazine, appropriately titled "Everybody's Crisis," does an excellent job of describing the problem, exploring possible sources of blame and looking at some solutions.

The article also explains some of the reasons why I introduced Senate bills 2038 and 2046. These bills are aimed at correcting abuses that have arisen in our tort system, resulting in outrageous punitive damage awards and clogged court dockets. Such abuses are causing companies and government entities to lose their insurance. In some cases, consumers end up paying higher prices for goods as manufacturers have to pass on the cost of higher insurance premiums.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EVERYBODY'S CRISIS

(By George H. Yater)

The Kentucky Railway Museum, which spent years getting 'old 152,' its former Louisville & Nashville steam locomotive, ready to run again, is worried about July 15. That's when the $3-million liability insurance policy covering its planned excursion trips expires.

"We don't know what the renewal cost will be," reports Museum president Allen Kempe, "but we expect it will be double the $6,700 premium we paid in 1985." That, in turn, is double the cost of a 1984 policy.

Those figures are small potatoes, however, compared to cost increases for liability coverage that some other organizations have faced. Moreover, all indications are that the situation will not improve in the near future and may get worse before it gets better.

WHERE ARE THE BRAKES?

The Transit Authority of River City, for example, paid $46,800 in July 1984 for $10 million in liability coverage for mishaps involving injuries on its bus fleet during the ensuing 12 months. In July 1985 the cost jumped a dramatic 1,200% to $555,100 for only $6 million in coverage.

Moreover, adds TARC general manager David Arnett: "We had to provide only $50,000 per claim in 1984 in self-retained funds to cover small claims. Now we have to provide $100,000." The policy is up for renewal in July and TARC is braced for another cost increase. "I don't think it will jump up as much as it did last year," Arnett adds, fervent hope evident in every word.

Across the Ohio River in Indiana, the Paoli Peaks ski resort has faced the same problem in protecting itself against claims by exuberant skiers who wind up with injuries. The resort used to get $5 million in insurance for $35,000 annually. Now it pays a quarter-of-a-million for only $1 million in coverage and the deductible is higher. For a while Paoli Peaks feared it wouldn't be able to get coverage at all and would be forced to shut down. "We negotiated until the day before we opened this season," a spokeswoman reports. "We're told by the insurance people that we're lucky; that we have the lowest rate of all ski resorts in this part of the country."

NIBBLING AT CONSUMER DOLLARS

These three organizations are not alone in their dilemmas. Check with any private business, independent professional, nonprofit group, governmental entity or any other group that you can name and you'll find that they're all getting hit in the pocketbook by the doubling, tripling, quadrupling—or more—of the cost of protecting themselves against suits for damages.

These added costs are eventually reflected in the price of the product or service—and that means we all pay. The Railway Museum may be forced to raise the ticket prices on its fall excursions. Paoli Peaks has tacked a dollar onto the charge for its weekend lift passes. TARC hasn't had to raise fares, but will probably run over budget this year because of the sharp rise in the cost of liability insurance. "Thank God for the Federal budget freeze on cutting transportation funds!" Arnett exclaims.

Has the cost of drinks gone up at your favorite watering hole? Likely it's due in part to the increased cost of liquor-liability insurance and perhaps the distiller's or brewer's product-liability insurance. If you have youngsters attending a day-care center, you're paying more—again largely because of rising liability insurance rates. At the Calvary Child Development Center, 2520 Wallace Ave., for instance, that translates to $5 a week. This sort of thing may not be classic inflation, but it's nibbling away at consumer budgets nonetheless.

These are examples of what buyers of commercial liability insurance all across the U.S. are calling a "crisis." Locally, from Churchill Downs to skating rinks to the mom-and-pop grocery on the corner to the banks, the crisis is a reality.

The National Federation of Independent Business/Kentucky reports that many small businesses throughout the state report liability costs up more than 50%, while 26% of firms have been unable to get insurance at all.

A MEDICAL MORASS

Perhaps one of the most serious aspects is the steep rise in the cost to physicians of medical malpractice insurance—reflected in higher patient fees.

In most smaller Kentucky communities the general practitioner is usually the only kind of physician in town and so the only one to handle obstetrical work. But the cost of insurance coverage for the OB portion of a general practice is rising so sharply that these physicians more and more are declining such work.

"The GP may find that OB work doubles his medical malpractice coverage from, say, $10,000 to $20,000 a year," notes Louisville insurance consultant Eric Tachau, whose work is statewide. "He probably doesn't earn that much in fees from those cases, so he turns them down."

The result, Tachau says, is that expectant mothers go to the nearest large town for hospital-delivery of their babies. "But," he adds, "they get no prenatal care, which can have dire consequences for both mother and child."

And the problem isn't confined to rural areas, and not just to OB work. It's happening right here in Louisville as well, according to Dr. Lynn L. Ogden II, president of the Jefferson County Medical Society.

"Especially among older and younger physicians and surgeons, the cost of medical malpractice coverage is a problem," he says. The older physician may wish to slow down and limit his practice; the younger physician is still building his practice. "Yet they're paying the same rates as physicians with dawn-to-dusk schedules," Dr. Ogden explains. "They sometimes wind up paying 30% to 40% of their income for insurance."

That can prompt the older physician to drop out of practice or the younger one to seek an alternative to private practice—go on the payroll at a hospital or private corporation. The end result is reduced availability of medical expertise to patients in general, in addition to higher fees.

THE FIRST TO GO

But governments, especially small municipalities, are facing the worst problems of all. Many can't buy liability coverage at any price. The one-year terms and necessity for submitting bids makes it distasteful to insurance carriers at any time; in a tight market it's the first to be jettisoned.

"If somebody maliciously removes a stop sign in a smaller city here in Jefferson County and a collision occurs at that intersection, a verdict for damages, in the absence of insurance, would have to come out of that city's none-too-ample funds," says Louisville attorney Stanley Chauvin, Jr. "The city's trustees could conceivably find themselves liable."

Cities generally considered themselves immune to liability suits, but last year the Kentucky Supreme Court ruled that they can be sued in cases of negligence.

Large governmental units are feeling the coverage pinch, too, but not as drastically. Both Louisville and Jefferson County, with large tax bases, self-insure many of their liability risks. Even so, Louisville found its one-year auto-liability cost would rise last July from $75,000 to $385,000 for $5 million in coverage.

"We couldn't afford that," says Kevin O'Donnell, the City's administrator of risk management. "We had to go for only $1 million in coverage and that cost $130,000."

The story is the same in County government, where auto liability cost went up 67% last July. "I felt fortunate that it was only that much," reports Chester Brandon, who handles the County's insurance purchasing. Medical malpractice for EMS personnel went up 150%.

Across the river, Jeffersonville thought it wasn't going to be able to get liability insurance at all last summer. "but our agent went to bat for us," says City attorney Allen Morris. Now the City pays $18,540 for a $1-million liability policy. Previously it paid $7,500 for $5 million. Other liability coverages (such as for police and elected officials) went up in the same ratio.

In Jefferson County, the Metropolitan Sewer District did have its $30-million umbrella' liability policy—covering all contingencies—cancelled. It has been unable to find new coverage and has only a policy covering $1 million in expenses—at an annual cost of$497,408.

WHO'S AT FAULT?

Why, at a time when inflation has been tamed and the economy is showing signs of stable—even slow—growth, would liability rates start reaching for the sky? And are any attempts being made to correct the situation?

The answer to the first question is "Several factors," and to the second, "Yes, but. . . ." Let's take the questions in order.

It's a fact that casualty-and-property insurance companies are showing underwriting losses. The $3.8-billion loss in 1984 climbed to an estimated $5.5 billion in 1985. However that includes property losses as well, unusually high because of the several hurricanes that struck the Atlantic coast last year.

The pat answer to the operating loss (excess of claims paid over premiums charged) is that trial lawyers have been wangling astronomical settlements from sympathetic juries for injury and wrongful death cases, even when the defendant is not to blame. And certainly there have been some unusual awards: the California burglar who fell through a skylight while about his burgling and successfully sued the building owner for injuries; the pole vaulter who received $1.6 million for injuries received when he missed the mat; and others of like nature.

Should we blame the plaintiffs' lawyers in these cases, and by extension, the whole legal profession?

"Juries make awards, not the attorneys," answers Louisville attorney Chauvin, president of the American Judicature Society. "Certainly anyone who has suffered injuries through the negligence of someone else has a right to adequate compensation and a trial by jury, if necessary." Chauvin notes that his own professional liability insurance cost has tripled recently.

Moreover, he adds, the huge awards that have received media attention are few and far between. Most awards, he says, are for modest amounts covering medical expenses, lost wages and some compensation for pain and suffering. The Kentucky Medical Insurance Corp., formed by Kentucky physicians to help fill the gap in obtaining malpractice coverage, estimates that the average jury award in this state is $31,000.

It may well be the case, also, that most plaintiffs suing for damages have better courtroom representation than that provided by insurance companies to the persons or business being sued. Insurance consultant Eric Tachau notes that in the past the insurers often got "low-fee lawyers to handle smaller cases and they presented a lousy defense, while the plaintiff's lawyers built up new approaches to certain legal doctrines."

SOCIAL WELFARE?

Those new approaches may be a potent factor in the broadening definitions of liability that have come out of judicial decisions of the past few years—liability as defined by judges and not awards made by juries.

In New Jersey, for instance, a local court put an unexpected meaning in the language of a general-liability policy that excluded pollution liability except for "sudden and accidental occurrences." The court ruled that each drip from an oil-tank over a 12-year period was "sudden and accidental."

Some courts have ruled that an obstetrician may be liable for alleged delivery-room negligence until the infant reaches adulthood. The Iowa Supreme Court last year ruled that private party hosts can be held responsible if a guest drinks to excess and later injures himself or others in an auto accident.

Even though U.S. courts are interpreting the concepts of liability and the meaning of insurance policies more broadly than ever before, that in itself has little overall effect on underwriting losses, Eric Tachau declares.

"It's the increase in punitive damages awarded [the civil law equivalent of a prison term under criminal law] that is the real disaster area," Tachau notes, citing a recent western Kentucky case. A pedestrain struck by a car with a drunk driver at the wheel suffered a broken left wrist and was awarded $100,000 in punitive damages in addition to medical expenses. (There was no loss of income.)

"Although there were few similar instances," Tachau adds, "it is the uncertanity of such awards that results in a large number of out-of-court settlements today for 1,000% or more of what would have been paid just a few years ago."

In 1976, he points out, the Western Kentucky case would probably have been settled out of court for $2,500, assuming $1,200 in medical expenses. There would have been minimal attorneys' fees and no court costs. One insurance company attorney estimates that of every $2.59 paid by an insurer in settling suits, $1.59 goes for attorneys' fees and court costs.

Added punitive damages are also one reason that medical malpractice awards are so high, Tachau adds. "The old common-law defenses are no longer adequate," he points out. "Formerly, if a doctor explained the chances of success and the patient gave 'informed consent' to a course of treatment that didn't work out, there was no legal case unless it could be proved that the physician botched his work."

Now, he says, the courts have largely thrown out the concept of informed consent. "It may be held that a patient was not adequately informed; perhaps there was emotional coercion by the physician telling the patient that he had only so long to live without treatment or something similar." And how, Tachau asks, is an obstetrician to know beforehand all of the unexpected complications that may occur during birth?

The basic crisis here, Tachau comments, is society's growing expectation that when anything goes wrong, somebody should pay. Oregon attorney Lloyd B. Ericsson, who practices insurance defense work, puts it this way: "In effect, the courts have said that the insurance industry constitutes part of the social welfare system. . . If this is the burden imposed by the courts, the insurance industry has to regroup to define its participation."

BLAME THE INSURERS, TOO

But that industry does not come to the table with clean hands. It has contributed mightily to its own predicament by price-cutting and ignoring sound underwriting practices during the past few years. The parallel to what has happened to the airlines in the wake of deregulation is striking. The difference is that insurance has never been regulated at the Federal level—only lightly and separately by the 50 states.

It is a free-wheeling, free-market, competitive business that goes through regular peaks of underwriting profits and troughs of losses, usually on a six-to eight-year cycle. When profits are high, companies engage in price wars to attract more business; when underwriting losses start (they always do), prices bounce back up. But this time liability coverage buyers are finding absurdly high rates and insurance companies are finding losses deeper than ever.

The tight underwriting situation today follows a period of deep price-cutting that began about 1978 and continued until about 1984. "Our $46,800 liability cost in 1984 was too low," says TARC's David Arnett, "and the $55,100 we're paying today is far, far too high."

The high interest rates of the late 1970s and early in the 1980s compounded the problem; insurance companies were making billions on investment income from reserve funds. That prolonged the rate war (competition for more funds to invest) even though claims payments were mounting. That situation couldn't continue, especially when investment income fell as interest rates declined. Some casualty insurance companies have gone bankrupt.

The crowning blow, Tachau notes, came when the reinsurance companies, which take part of the high end of the risk for the primary carrier, said, "No more!" Settling claims had become so expensive that the reinsurers were beginning to feel the pinch. Much of this 'laying off' of part of the risk goes to European reinsurers, particularly brokers at Lloyd's of London. They are taking a dim view of the insurance situation in the U.S., in many cases refusing to participate at all for fear of high court awards or out-of-court settlements.

And there's an odd Catch 22 situation at work here. The higher rates go, the fewer policies the companies can issue. Premium income should not exceed two to three times reserve funds. As rates are raised to make up for losses, premium income goes up, but because of initial expenses in issuing the policy plus the complex and slow way in which reserves build up, these reserves lag premium income for several years.

To keep within the usual ratio, companies are refusing to renew some policies or to accept some new business, with small municipalities the first to suffer. Reserves could be increased by an infusion of investment capital, but investors are reluctant to commit funds to property and casualty insurers who are posting losses.

"This trough that we're in will last a long time—until some changes are made," Tachau warns.

POSSIBLE SOLUTIONS

What can be done?

That question is getting lots of attention these days in lots of places, including the U.S. Senate and the Kentucky General Assembly.

One remedy might be for groups that are having special difficulty in getting coverage to form their own mutual insurance company. That's what some 40 East Coast banks are exploring. All financial institutions now face problems of cost and availability of bonding sources for employees and of liability coverage for directors and officers.

David Arnett of TARC reports, however, that transit operators tried a similar approach a few years ago during the last insurance crunch. "It worked fine until commercial liability rates came down again," he recalls. "When the big insurers started a price war, the transit operators all left their own company for cheaper rates elsewhere and that was the end of that."

Kentucky's cities, counties and physicians are trying a different approach. They've gone to the state legislature for relief. The Kentucky Municipal League and the Kentucky Association of Counties are backing a bill (BR 354) that would limit government liability to $100,000 for each person and $1 million for each incident. The Kentucky Medical Association is backing a bill (BR 1087) that would: put a cap of $500,000 on the total recoverable for any injury or death of a patient; permit periodic rather than new lump-sum payment of the award, and provide that suits must be filed within two years of the date of the alleged medical malpractice.

But many attorneys think these bills, if approved, would probably be ruled unconstitutional, as has similar legislation in other states. In fact, the Kentucky Constitution specifically prohibits the General Assembly from placing any limitation on awards for injuries, death or property damage. Physicians hope that a provision permitting patients to reject the limitations in writing will enable the bill to pass court muster.

Dr. Lynn Ogden has other thoughts on easing the problem. Noting that a patient who sues may have his own health insurance that paid all or a substantial part of his medical costs, Dr. Ogden suggests that the jury be allowed to know this. Often a successful plaintiff receives double his medical expenses plus an award for pain and suffering plus a large sum in punitive damages.

Dr. Ogden also points out that many 'expert' witnesses for plaintiffs are out-of-state physicians "who testify for the fees they collect." If such witnesses had to be licensed Kentucky practitioners, perhaps appointed by the court, with each side paying half of a standard fee, such expert testimony might live up to its name.

Stanley Chauvin notes that punitive damages are "a form of punishment for a wrongful act" and the civil-law equivalent of imprisonment under the criminal law. But, asks Eric Tachau, since criminals pay their debt to the state through the prison term, why shouldn't punitive damages go to the state as well?

"The victim of a criminal act doesn't benefit—except psychologically—from the imprisonment of a criminal," he comments. "Why should the plaintiff in a civil case reap a windfall?" Paying punitive damages into the public coffers (with none going for attorneys' fees) would likely mean that juries would impose them only in appropriate cases and reduce them to a reasonable figure, he believes.

"If the legislature would do something about punitive damages, I believe the rest will take care of itself," he says.

OTHER OPTIONS

Both Tachau and Chauvin have thoughts on additional moves to ease the liability crisis. Both agree that limiting awards, even if it were legally possible, would be unjust, since there are some horrendous cases where virtually no award is adequate.

Both also agree that putting a cap on attorneys' fees would not work. Chauvin acknowledges that in many cases fees are high, but adds that "capping a fee will not prevent a skywalk from falling in Kansas City."

He suggests that an assigned-risk pool, as used in auto insurance and workers' compensation, might be set up by the insurance companies. Each would agree in turn to issue a policy for any organization or business that otherwise would be rejected for whatever reason.

Chauvin also thinks that the way insurance companies set rates should be scrutinized. "What percent of income goes to overhead, for instance," he wonders, "and why is investment profit not considered in rate-making?" He also believes that arbitration, mediation or conciliation might provide forums for settling some kind of simpler actions that now clog court dockets, providing they do not preempt judicial involvement and the right to a trial by jury.

Such alternative methods would free the courts to give adequate time to complex cases, including liability suits, "where the right to a jury trial must be guaranteed," he declares.

When Tachau suggested—somewhat reluctantly—in a newsletter to his clients that Federal regulation of insurance might be necessary to cut the Gordian Knot, he stirred up a small hornet's nest with many readers taking exception. And Chauvin is also opposed to such action, which he sees as creating uniform rates across the U.S. "Why should the Louisville Water Co. pay the same rates as the water company in Phoenix, Ariz., where the liability situation is much different?" he asks.

Tachau, however, points out that having 50 states individually regulating insurance means that no one state can take a strong stance unless all do. "If the Kentucky insurance commissioner tried, for example, to curb the current price-gouging in liability rates, the insurers would simply stop offering that coverage here," he says.

"I don't hold any particular brief for Federal regulation, but State regulation is not working, so the question is whether Federal regulation might," he adds. Tachau sees a parallel with the Federal Reserve System that brought order to the chaotic banking business, and Federal deposit insurance that protects depositors.

Whatever the eventual solutions, they will not be won easily. Meantime, we can all be relieved that personal lines of insurance are not greatly affected by the current imbroglio.

"That's because there's more competition, more selective underwriting and lower limits of coverage with little fear of giant punitive damage awards," Tachau says.

TAX OVERHAUL

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate Committee on Finance began consideration of a tax overhaul plan. The chairman of our committee has put a great deal of time into this plan, and I think most Members would agree that his document is a good starting point.

Obviously, I do not agree with all the aspects of the bill as it now stands, and I believe substantial changes will be made as we proceed with our markup.

Today, I want to mention one proposed change contained in the draft of the bill, and urge that it be dropped from consideration immediately before significant damage is done. The change is contained in the expanded minimum tax for individuals and corporations. Under current law, tax-exempt interest is not considered to be an item of tax preference for purposes of the minimum tax. From time to time, this type of suggestion has been made, but for a variety of reasons, it has been rejected in the past.

In the House-passed bill, H.R. 3838, the interest on newly issued nonessential function bonds would be included in the minimum tax as an item of tax preference. The change, as proposed in the House bill, however, would apply only to bonds issued after January 1, 1986. Bonds outstanding on that date would not be considered an item of tax preference. Further, the change would only apply to nonessential function bonds—that is bonds that are used by private parties, not those used in traditional Government functions.

In the draft of the bill presented to the Committee on Finance, all tax-exempt interest on all bonds—including those outstanding today—would be included as an item of tax preference for purposes of the alternative minimum tax for individuals and corporations. This change would be phased-in over 5 years. Presumably, the way it would work would be that in the first year you would calculate your tax-exempt interest and then take 20 percent of it into account as an item of tax preference for purposes of the alternative minimum tax. Then, the next year 40 percent, and so on, until the fifth year you take all of it into account as an item of tax preference.

This proposed change, Mr. President, has had a devastating effect on the bond market, and it will seriously impair the ability of State and local governments, school districts, and many other governmental entities in their efforts to finance capital improvements.

I know other members of the Finance Committee are very concerned over this proposed change, and I would hope that this proposal is dropped from the draft of the package very quickly. Any prolonged delay in this area will have serious consequences.

With State and local governments already facing serious problems due to the elimination of revenue sharing, and reductions in programs due to efforts to reduce the budget deficit with Gramm-Rudman, throwing this additional problem on top of them is simply unwarranted. It is unjustified, and it is unfair.

While I am most concerned over the effect on State and local governments, I am extremely concerned over the apparent inequity of imposing what amounts to a retroactive tax on these bonds. The people who bought them did so in good faith, relying on the state of the tax law at that time. It seems to me that fairness would dictate that any changes not be made retroactive. As I have stated earlier, I oppose the change in its entirety, but I will vigorously oppose any retroactive changes of this type.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from today's business section of the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MUNICIPAL BOND MARKET SINKS

(By James L. Rowe, Jr.)

The multibillion-dollar municipal bond market virtually collapsed yesterday when investors panicked after Senate Finance Committee Chairman Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) proposed a new minimum tax that could hit municipal bond interest that now is tax-exempt.

"For all practical purposes, the market ground to a halt," said Thomas Opdycke, vice president and manager of Bank of America's municipal securities and public finance department.

In response to the turmoil in the market for municipal bonds, several major issues due to be sold this week were postponed, including a $450 million New York City sale.

Municipal bond is a generic term that is used to describe virtually any security whose interest payments are exempt from federal taxation, whether or not it is sold by a municipality. Industrial revenue bonds, for example, are protected from taxation even though they benefit a private party.

The tax-exempt change proposed by Packwood would apply only to those taxpayers with sizable incomes and low tax liabilities under the normal tax rules. Those taxpayers are subject to a "minimum tax" on portions of their income. Packwood would include interest that is tax-exempt in the income that is subject to a 20 percent minimum tax.

Taxpayers who are not subject to the minimum tax still would enjoy the federal tax exemption.

There are no statistics on how many municipal bondholders are subject to the minimum tax, but presumably a large number are. Their willingness to buy municipal bonds could be reduced if the interest were included in the minimum tax. Municipal bonds generally carry lower interest rates than bonds—such as those sold by corporations or the federal government—whose interest currently is taxed.

Opdycke said that the tax-exempt status of the interest earned from a municipal bond is a major factor in determining the price of that bond. "When we don't know the value of the tax exemption, we cannot evaluate" the price of the bond, he said.

For a period of time, I assume there will be no real market for tax-exempt bonds, because people won't know whether they're tax-exempt or not," said David Wright, national tax director for the accounting firm of Coopers & Lybrand.

Even though the proposal is far from enactment, it does not cover every municipal bondholder and it would not become effective until next year, the volatile market reacted sharply to the Packwood proposal, which was revealed Tuesday night as part of the Republican's sweeping tax reform plan.

Municipal bond prices fell sharply yesterday, by about $2.50 to $3.50 for each $100 of face value. But Opdycke said the prices are misleading, because almost no one was willing to buy or sell municipal bonds yesterday.

Some brokers, such as Prudential-Bache Securities, temporarily withdrew from buying or selling tax-exempt securities. But most firms continued to "make a market," although there were almost no investors willing to buy or sell them.

The volatile reaction of the municipal bond market surprised some observers because Packwood has been talking about including some tax-exempt income in the minimum tax for several weeks. But earlier proposals suggested that only newly issued bonds or those that changed hands would be subject to the minimum tax. In the proposal released Tuesday, all tax-exempt income from previously issued or new bonds would be included.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today being the first day of spring, it is the day traditionally designated as "National Agriculture Day."

It is a day to pay our respects to not only the 2 million or more farm families who work so hard to produce this Nation's food and fiber, but the 20 million other workers involved in the processing, packaging, and distribution of our food supply.

Fittingly, the theme of this year's celebration is "The Agriculture Team," a tribute to the millions of men and women who are involved in providing the most bountiful, nutritious, and inexpensive food supply any nation on Earth in all history, has enjoyed.

Mr. President, the cornerstone of this food system is the family farmer. The past few years have been difficult for the family farmer. Serious farm problems began when inflation roared and interest soared in the late 1970's, and then farmers were taken out of a competitive market position by the grain embargo and high price supports. Increased competitive abroad—largely encouraged by our own Government's farm policy—led to a worldwide glut and depressed prices.

But just as the first day of spring is a symbol of renewal and rekindling of the spirit, this year's celebration marks the beginning of a new optimism in rural America. There are many signs that point to better days ahead on America's farms.

Last year, Congress passed a farm bill that, for the first time in 4 years, will make U.S. farm commodities price competitive. The reduced loan rates in the farm bill, coupled with the weakening value of the dollar in relation to other currencies, signals a strong rebound in American farm exports. A strong export performance is surely a cornerstone of profitability for America's farmers.

The farm bill also provides for record amounts of public money to be spent to protect farm income. Congress and the President have made an unprecedented commitment to America's farmers, which will ensure sufficient money to meet credit needs this spring as well as billions of dollars in income support.

Other economic signs point the way toward profitability for our farmers. Interest rates have been dropping at a stunning rate, and reduced interest costs will be a prime factor in putting more money in farmers' pockets. Inflation—once in the double digits—is now down around 3 percent, giving farmers a more stable economic environment in which to plan. The sudden and dramatic reduction in oil prices not only contributes to keeping inflation low, but directly contributes to reducing input costs farmers must pay.

Mr. President, the recent appointment of Richard E. Lyng as Secretary of Agriculture is cause for optimism. Secretary Lyng is a highly experienced and competent man, and, as he told the Agriculture Committee at his confirmation hearing, he is absolutely committed to expanding U.S. exports.

But he brings to the job another important quality—optimism. Mr. President, it is time to renew the sense of optimism on America's farms. As Secretary Lyng told the committee, "This Nation has a strong agriculture, the strongest in the world. It will survive and thrive in the years ahead. This is no time for pessimism. It is, rather, a time for hard work and confidence in the days ahead."

On National Agriculture Day, this first day of spring, let us as Senators renew our commitment to and confidence in America's farmers.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY AND NUTRITION MONTH

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, today is "National Agriculture Day" and, in addition, March is "National Nutrition Month." At a time when American agriculture is being severely tested we should take time to salute the enormous contribution made to our Nation by our farmers and to acknowledge the great debt that we, as Americans, owe them.

One half of the American land mass is farmland—a phenomenal 1 billion acres. This enormous acreage is comprised of 43 percent cropland and 57 percent of the land is devoted to livestock. But it's not the amount of land that is so impressive, it's what the ingenuity and hard work of the American farmer has done with it.

Our farmers have made quantum leaps in production and land usage. In 1984, the aggregate number of breeding animals and total inputs to agriculture were only 5 percent above the same levels of 1930. However, crop production in the United States has increased 2.5 times since 1930 and livestock production rose 2.1 times in the same period. As if this were not enough, the average farmer today produces 80 percent more crop output than his or her parents did. This is astounding. With 2.3 million farms averaging 440 acres a piece, America manages to produce 25 percent of the world's beef and 15 percent of the world's grain, milk, and eggs.

Yet, with all these accomplishments, our debt to America's farmers remains uncollected. We owe our farmers a fighting chance, a fair market, and the respect that an economic force of such magnitude deserves. While there may be only 3.75 million Americans working on our farms, there are 21 million people working in jobs somewhere between the tractor and the grocery checkout. That represents more agriculturally dependent jobs than the transportation, steel, and auto industries combined. Furthermore, farmers pay $4.4 billion in farm real estate taxes annually and $500 million in personal property taxes each year, yet the annual farm income after taxes and expenses amounts to around $9,000 a year. It is apparent that their contribution to our Nation's economy reaches far beyond the cultivation of land.

In a country as wealthy as ours and as proficient in the production of food as we are, hunger and malnutrition should be absent from our land. However, it is estimated that perhaps as many as 20 million people in our country go hungry every year with 15 million of these individuals existing beneath the poverty level and the remainder being comprised largely of people who are not technically poor due to such factors as household composition, newly or temporarily unemployed, the new poor, or those who hover above the poverty level while remaining in its grasp.

We should remember, however, that while some people are fed they are still malnourished. It is my hope that special months like these go far in increasing public awareness of the importance of proper diet for good health, since poor diet can increase susceptibility to such diseases as heart disease, some cancers, strokes and hypertension, arteriosclerosis and diabetes.

America should be proud of the accomplishments of the American farmer. Their ingenuity, determination and productivity feed a nation and a world. Let us salute them and honor their contribution to good nutrition on National Agriculture Day.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I would like to briefly speak in honor of the dedicated men and women of American agriculture. Today, March 20, has been proclaimed, since 1973, as "National Agriculture Day" in recognition of the vital importance that all sectors of agriculture ply in our economic well-being and national security. We in the United States are truely blessed with bountiful supplies of high quality food and fibre. We spend less than any other country in the world for these necessities of everyday life—about 14 percent of our disposable income—and yet, we are prone to take our agricultural blessings for granted.

Agriculture is much more than just food: It includes cotton, wool, forest products, tobacco, greenhouse products, and many, many others. About one-fourth of all prescription drugs contain one or more agricultural product, and Americans use about 20 pounds of paper per person daily. Think of other items: Pet food, grass seed, gasohol, adhesives, cosmetics, soap, candles, paints, and even chewing gum. Agriculture has spawned a vast new industry to help farmers produce, process and transport food and clothing to the consumer. Although there are only about 2 million farm producers, there are more than 21 million other jobs which exist because of agriculture. Each additional 1 billion dollars' worth of farm demand creates some 30,000 additional jobs in related industries and services and adds a total of $2 billion to the Nation's gross national product.

Mr. President, this would be a much more joyous occasion—this National Agriculture Day—if it were not for the continuing financial stress of those redoubtable men and women who make all of our bounty possible in the first place. With all of the debate that has taken place in this Chamber, with all of the media coverage from every region of the country, and with the personal contacts I know all of my colleagues have experienced directly, there can be no doubt as to the extent or the severity of the hard times our farm producers are currently enduring.

I do not know of one single Member of this body who desires to do anything but the best in an attempt to assist our farm men and women during these tough times. However, I do find it frustrating when the Senate becomes bogged down for weeks—sometimes months—in trying to resolve conflicts and concerns between differing philosophies or political goals while producers sit at home on the farm and wonder what we will do to them next. And that's unfortunate because most of the time we do unto them rather than for them.

Most farmers I know do not want a handout from Uncle Sam—they don't want a free ride at the expense of the Federal taxpayer. They do want and need to know what the rules of the game will be so they can plan and execute their business, and they need to know as far in advance as possible. I find it a shameful commentary on the ability of the Congress that we managed to delay passage of the new 1985 farm bill last year until Christmas, when farmers needed to know what to plan on as early as September. And we're still playing that shameful game, Mr. President, by delaying the recent urgent supplemental for CCC, by delaying and bickering like children over the recent technical amendments bill, by nitpicking over the budget reconciliation measure.

Mr. President, I will not belabor these points further. I do point out to my colleagues that we could best celebrate National Agriculture Day by each making a solemn pledge to renew our personal efforts in an attempt to provide true assistance for the brave women and men of American agriculture. We can each determine to seek guidance and pray for a greater degree of compromise, compassion, and understanding as we make future decisions which impact our agricultural economy and our farm producers. Let us seek to minimize partisan disputes and maximize our joint concerns by adopting a new spirit of cooperation in this body. If we will truly adopt such attitudes and behavior, Mr. President, we will be able to provide a measure of true relief for American agriculture and our farm producers.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR STEVENS AT RESERVE OFFICER'S ASSOCIATION ANNUAL MID-WINTER BALL

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I would like to call to the attention of our colleagues a recent address delivered by the Honorable TED STEVENS of Alaska at the Reserve Officer's Association Annual Mid-Winter Ball. Senator STEVENS was being honored as the Reserve Officer's Association Minuteman of the Year.

The thrust of his remarks dealt with the continuing importance of our National Guard and Reserve Forces. Senator STEVENS highlighted the improvements in Guard and Reserve readiness in the past 5 years as we have transferred more missions to the Reserve components.

In the months and years ahead, as we attempt to reduce the deficit, there will be great pressure to limit increases or even reduce expenditures for our national defense. Maintaining our commitments around the world will force us to rely even more heavily on the Guard and Reserve.

Senator STEVENS emphasizes this point in his address, and he is to be commended for his foresight and knowledge as one of the Senate's leading experts on defense matters.

Mr. President, I ask all of our colleagues to join me in congratulating Senator STEVENS as this year's recipient of the Minuteman of the Year Award, and I ask unanimous consent that a copy of Senator STEVENS address to the Reserve Officer's Association Annual Mid-Winter Ball be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR STEVENS

I am honored to receive this Minuteman Award.

The staff of the Senate Defense Appropriations Subcommittee works harder than any group that I know on the Hill—and under greater time pressures. They deserve this more than I. Let me introduce to you the staff director of our subcommittee, Dwight Dyer.

My continued involvement in defense issues is possible because of the overwhelming support I receive from my constituents. Billy Mitchell once said he who controls Alaska could control the world. Alaskans have a special awareness of defense needs—we live on the edge of our frontier and share a long line of demarcation with the Soviet Union. As your most northern and western fellow countrymen, we are the Soviets' closest eastern neighbors. In the Aleutian Islands, Alaskans carry our flag to the edge of the Asian continent. And, we remember well the occupation of the Aleutians in World War II.

I accept this award as a proud American and as a proud Alaskan—Alaska has been a State for only 26 years—this award was first presented the year the Alaska statehood bill became law.

This is a fast-moving and an exciting time in history. We are witnessing the evolution of the Soviet leaders' awareness of world opinion. And they may comprehend the economic limits on military power, even under the communistic system.

We also are learning hard lessons from deficit financing and the impact of compound interest on an ever growing national debt. Political rhetoric as to who or what party is or is not responsible for that debt is not in order here. And, in my judgment, it would be better for all concerned to realize that we have seen the last of the generations which could take it for granted that we could somehow, someday, pay for the wants of today without regard to the needs of tomorrow.

Our Nation now has a two plus trillion dollar national debt. Interest on that debt now exceeds $165 billion per year. By law, in 1987 our Federal Government may have no more than a $144-billion deficit—meaning that if Congress complies, in the coming fiscal year, the national debt should increase by no more than $144 billion. Each year, the target deficit will be lowered, and each year the increase in the debt should be less. If successful, by at least 1991, the budget should be balanced—and all interest paid out of current revenues. But, our national debt will then be over $2.4 trillion. In the long run, the national debt is the real problem. But, that cannot be solved unless the deficits are first eliminated.

While I have high regard for the Senators who authored Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, I shall not use it as either a whipping post or an altar. It is neither—it is a mechanism for discipline in a divided society. The sooner all concerned realize that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is not a solution but a device which attempts to assure a solution, the easier it will be to live with.

For myself, I believe our major defense concern is not complex; it is, simply stated, how may we maintain the prestige and power of the United States through this painful period of fiscal readjustment?

National defense interests will suffer more than any other area of Government if we fail to meet the goal of deficit reduction.

The result of the arms control negotiations will put severe pressure upon our Nation to keep, primarily with conventional forces, our commitments for mutual defense.

I now am optimistic that we can succeed in these negotiations with the Soviets and the ongoing summit talks. We want not just limitations—as you know we seek radical reductions in nuclear arms and, further, that the superpowers build down their nuclear arsenals. If we are successful, the cost of conventional forces in the last decade of this century will far exceed the current cost of our nuclear umbrella. At the very least, the threshold for the use of nuclear weapons will rise.

Assuring survival of readiness and the modernization program in this period of budgetary restraints requires tough cost saving decisions. Obvious options have been discussed by others: The restoration of the draft; reduction in our commitments abroad; or even increased utilization of Reserve and Guard forces.

My preference is to try to meet our goals without restoring the draft. However, it may well be that current generations will pay more in the long run for the cost of volunteer forces. The costs will have to be repaid with compound interest—a burden they would not bear if they dedicated a short period of their lives to our defense early in their careers.

And, I reject the option of reducing our commitments abroad. As a world power, we must defend our legitimate interests throughout the world.

I believe we should continue what we have already started with the Reserves. Funding for Reserve and Guard forces has almost doubled in the past 4 years—from $3.9 to $6.1 billion. Our Reserve component personnel have increased by 20 percent. And their incentive and special pay, allowances and benefits have more than quadrupled—from $50 to $240 million.

We on the Defense Subcommittee have insisted that we not only increase utilization of our citizen force but provide them at least a fair share of modern equipment as it comes off the line. We added more than $3.7 billion to the budget expressly for Reserve and Guard aircraft, weapons and equipment—often exceeding authorization when we find offsetting savings.

Over the past 5 years our subcommittee also supported more than $1 billion above budget as a defense contribution to Coast Guard modernization and readiness. This strengthens critical defense wartime assets.

Incidentally, no chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee has ever had the privilege of the kind of working partnership that I have. The overwhelming majority of the subcommittee has agreed with JOHN STENNIS and me. The Reserve and Guard forces of this Nation know of our subcommittee's commitment to your strength.

Now, in the current budget crunch, we must do more for the Reserves and rely on them for more.

Our military Reserves, I am convinced, represent the best and most immediate opportunity to preserve a strong defense in a period of severe budget constraints. The cost of maintaining Reserve personnel is about one-fifth that of full-time active personnel. And total personnel costs now consume nearly half the Defense budget.

Let's expand our Reserve components, and press harder for a wider role for Reserves. We can shift more of the tasks performed by the active force to Reserves, here and overseas.

The Southern Command has demonstrated for us already how valuable the Reserves can be outside our borders. In Central America, Reserve and Guard units supply most of the tactical and logistical support for regular forces stationed in Panama and for the training operations in Honduras. We should expand on that concept.

With that in mind I have asked the General Accounting Office to look into cost considerations under various manning alternatives. If we are innovative, we can develop rotational training programs for the Reserves that substantially reduce the costs of maintaining our permanent forces in Europe and the Pacific.

Without question, wider and more effective use of Reserves will help avert damaging reductions in the force structure and costly setbacks in military readiness.

Rather than continue to articulate my ideas, let me urge you to come forward with your ideas on how to maintain our defense and at the same time save our fiscal and monetary systems. You, each of you, has the experience to think through these problems and offer solutions to them. Congress is in a receptive mood for new ideas, new suggestions, new solutions.

It doesn't seem long ago that I stood on the aft deck of a baby aircraft carrier, returning from China across the Pacific, wondering if I should change my career so that I might help prevent the reoccurrence of world conflict. As the years went by, I became convinced that the only way to prevent such a war was to assure that our Nation is always ready to defend itself.

I know of no group which has had a greater role in maintaining that readiness than your organization and the forces you represent. You give meaning to our traditions and bolster our hope that the peace of our time will last long into the future.

May God bless you all—and answer our mutual prayers for continued peace with honor.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY, 1986

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues on this occasion, National Agriculture Day, to highlight the importance of U.S. agriculture and to cite the contributions our farm families and agricultural sector make to our society.

During this period of great difficulty for many of our farm families, it is especially appropriate that we, in Congress, pay tribute to the values and productivity of our Nation's agricultural community. As many of us from rural communities know, and as everyone in this Chamber should bear in mind, agriculture remains this country's No. 1 industry. The agricultural sector in its various forms, from production to retail marketing, employs one in five Americans, and the value of goods and services produced by those workers constitutes a full 20 percent of the U.S. gross national product.

I am proud to represent and serve one of this Nation's most productive agricultural States. Indiana farmers produce a variety of farm commodities, from corn, soybeans and hogs, to popcorn, poultry, and hardwood lumber. The value of Indiana farm products sold in 1985 totaled nearly $4 billion. We devote nearly 70 percent of our State's land to agriculture. That amounts to about 16.5 million acres, 12.5 million of which is tillable, making Indiana a top corn and soybean producer.

In Indiana, our 81,000 farms employ over 35,000 workers, and they are also the principal source of income for an additional 64,000 farm family members and nonpaid individuals. From these farms stem the rich character of our State. The basic unit of Indiana farm production, the family owned and operated farm, is a prime source of our community and State leaders, support for our churches, tax revenues that fund our schools and highways, and the social character that shapes our unique Hoosier culture, which is founded on cooperation and integrity.

As we, in Congress, debate policies designed to address the problems plaguing our farm economy, it is necessary to appreciate not only the economic contribution that our agricultural sector makes, but the social one as well. Our family farms represent the fiber from which the fabric of our culture is woven. It is not enough to think of U.S. agriculture as a sector of our national economy, for in fact, agriculture is the very foundation upon which our society is built.

In protecting this vital part of our society, as we must, I strongly believe that we should develop a long-term plan to meet the needs of our farm economy and community. That plan must be one that reduces the damaging effect of Federal Government involvement and places emphasis where it should lie, on providing an economic environment most favorable to healthy competition and prosperity. This can only be accomplished through a consistent and sustained effort along several fronts: By pursuing a sound fiscal policy, including a balanced Federal budget and tax reform, managing our money supply appropriately so as to accommodate economic growth while discouraging inflation, aggressively fighting unfair trade practices, and finally, developing farm legislation that allows our farmers the freedom to make individual, on-farm management decisions.

For those who leave the farm, it is essential that we provide a means of transition. Our farmers are blessed with a diversity of skills necessary for the demanding work on the farm, and with some help, they can often successfully apply these skills in off-farm professions. In 1982, I was the principal Senate author of the Job Training Partnership Act, the Nation's primary job training program, and earlier this year, I introduced amendments to the JTPA—to assist those who are forced off the farm by hardship. These amendments would specify that dislocated farmers are eligible for participation in JTPA's Dislocated Worker Program. My bill, S. 2069, is designed to provide dislocated farmers with the same opportunity to return to the workplace now provided laid-off steel and auto workers under JTPA's title III, which gives program participants training in new skills.

Mr. President, all Hoosiers and all Americans would do well to pause and reflect on the vital role our agricultural community has played in shaping our national personality and character. On this, National Agriculture Day, let me repeat what I have said time and again: In these times of technological advancement and dramatic social change, U.S. agriculture remains the predominant source of economic and social stability and strength in this country.

WORLD HOME ECONOMICS DAY

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, today is "World Home Economics Day," and I want to call it to the attention of my colleagues so that they may join me in extending our best wishes to the home economics profession for long and continued service. I do this because it is important that we recognize and publicly celebrate the profession that makes life so livable for all of us.

The term "home economics" conjures up an image of skills that have been mainstays of past home economics programs, and their importance to American life is not to be underestimated. But, as the American family has changed over the past 25 years, so too has the home economics profession. Today home economists in the schools, the USDA Extension Service and the many businesses that employ them assist Americans in dealing with contemporary family problems such as budgeting, consumer education, prevention of child abuse, teenage parenthood, school drop out, farm family stress, concerns of the aging, and myriad nutrition programs that are important to all Americans and people throughout the world. The knowledge and training provided by home economists has contributed to each of our communities' strength and comfort.

But home economists have not stopped at that achievement. Thousands of home economists have gone abroad to work in developing countries, and have brought with them knowledge to help deal with the forces of nature, the forces of the marketplace, and the forces of their own domestic conditions.

I particularly want to call to your attention the American Home Economics Association, which for 77 years has been the voice of the profession, offering advice and counsel to individual and unit members—setting standards, emphasizing goals. It is truly a force for families and that makes it a much-needed and valuable force in our lives today. I also want to recognize the International Federation for Home Economics, which provides working relationships for home economists across the globe so that professionals can easily communicate with other professionals as the needs arise.

Home economists deserve our recognition, our thanks, and our support. On World Home Economics Day, please join me in a salute to the members of this profession, who have served the public and their communities faithfully.

TRIBUTE TO JOSEPH U. ELSTON, DEDICATED CHRISTIAN

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, on Sunday, March 23, 1986, at a morning prayer breakfast, Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church will pay tribute to Joseph U. Elston for untiring and dedicated service as Sunday school superintendent. Mr. Elston is a textbook example of Christian dedication and I pause to recognize him for the work he has done since succeeding his father as Sunday school superintendent more than 20 years ago. This is an important position in his church, and he is also making a great contribution to the Little Rock community.

I am told that Mr. Elston's health has not been the best over the last few years, and this would make it easy for him to resign from work and community activity. But, Mr. Elston is continuing to do all that he can, and this makes his service even more noteworthy. Besides being Sunday school superintendent, he is on the board of stewards at Bethel AME and last year was named President Emeritus for the Arkansas Christian Credit Union. He is a mortician owner of Miller-Elston Mortuary.

Mr. Elston is widely loved and respected in his church and community. It is truly an honor for me to take this time to congratulate him on this occasion and commend him for his work. I wish him Godspeed, and he will be in my thoughts and prayers. If all of us were as dedicated as he, the world would indeed be a remarkably better place.

MESSAGE FROM U.S.S.R. SUPREME SOVIET CONCERNING NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet has delivered a message to the Senate regarding recent proposals by General Secretary Gorbachev concerning nuclear weapons testing. As President pro tempore, I bring this document to the attention of my colleagues at the request of the Supreme Soviet. The presentation of this document to the Senate, and its publication in the RECORD, does not in any way represent my personal endorsement of its contents.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this document be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the document was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APPEAL OF THE PRESIDIUM OF THE U.S.S.R. SUPREME SOVIET TO THE U.S. CONGRESS

Dear members of the Congress of the United States of America, on behalf of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet its Presidium regards it as its duty to address you on a subject of paramount importance—immediate cessation of nuclear weapon tests.

General Secretary of the Central Committee of the CPSU Mikhail S. Gorbachev has received a message from the leaders of Argentina, India, Mexico, Tanzania, Sweden and Greece. They recall the determination that was expressed at the Soviet-American summit in Geneva to achieve early progress at the negotiations on nuclear and space weapons. The message also contains the reasonable proposal that the U.S.S.R. and U.S. refrain from any nuclear tests until the next summit.

A similar message, as we know, has been received by President Ronald Reagan as well.

In his response Mikhail S. Gorbachev indicated that the Soviet Union would not conduct nuclear explosions after March 31, either—until the first nuclear explosion in the USA.

Thus the Soviet Union supported the opinion of the six countries. It means that now seven countries strongly urge the leadership of the United States of America to stop nuclear weapon tests. Over a billion people live in those countries on various continents. They are joined by everybody who cherishes peace.

The Soviet Union unilaterally has already not been conducting nuclear tests for over seven months. Within that period of time the U.S. has carried out seven officially announced nuclear explosions and is preparing for the eighth one in April. So the entire world can see a fundamental difference between the positions of the two states.

Addressing the USSR and USA the leaders of the six countries state: "You bear the primary responsibility for our survival". The USSR, for its part, fully appreciates that responsibility. It is prepared for the negotiations to ban nuclear weapon tests on any basis—bilateral, trilateral, multilateral. Now it is up to the United States of America.

The arguments of the opponents of the mutual moratorium and complete termination of nuclear tests, in our view, do not stand up to criticism.

They say, for example, that testing is necessary to verify the "reliability" of the American nuclear weapons. While in fact testing is conducted for its modernization, for enhancing their operational, destructive capabilities, for creating new types of such weapons, including those for use in outer space. So the stake is made on the continued growth of the potential of the weapons of mass destruction, though what is already there is sufficient to explode humankind and to cover the planet with grave dust.

They also say: let us confine ourselves to working out the methods of verification. However, what they propose to verify is not compliance with agreements to stop testing, but, rather, nuclear explosions which they want to continue.

We are convinced that in the interests of entire humankind nuclear testing must be stopped. Moreover, the Soviet Union is prepared to go farther. It has put forward a comprehensive stage-by-stage program of completely freeing humankind from nuclear weapons already before the end of this century. This program has been brought to the attention of all the states, all parliaments and all governments of the world. It is known to the U.S. Congress, too.

Having no lesser interest than the U.S. in strict compliance with agreements, the Soviet Union, naturally, attaches great importance to verification. Scientists, experts have long proven that verification of compliance with agreements on terminating nuclear tests and subsequent treaties on nuclear disarmament can be ensured by national means and with the help of international procedures—when necessary, including on-site inspections, which the Soviet Union has agreed to.

The attention of the peoples of the world is focused today on the issue of stopping nuclear testing. Politicians and public figures, parliamentarians and outstanding scientists of all countries, including well-known U.S. scientists, point out the urgent need to put an end to nuclear weapon tests.

We call upon the Congress to do everything in its power to have the position of the U.S. also correspond to the task of terminating nuclear tests in accordance with the will of peoples, their passionate desire for lasting peace on Earth.

It is the duty of our two countries, possessing the greatest stockpiles of nuclear weapons, to be the first to stop their testing. Our two countries can and must justify the aspirations for peace of all the peoples.

The USSR is against nuclear explosions.

The USSR is against nuclear weapons in general.

However, now the first step must be the decision regarding the non-resumption of nuclear explosions by either the Soviet Union or the United States of America.

THE PRESIDIUM OF THE U.S.S.R.
SUPREME SOVIET.

TRIBUTE TO STEVE BELL

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, one of life's most satisfying experiences is to watch a man work at a job for which he is perfectly suited by temperament and skill. If the match is good enough, the man's mastery of his task can become so thorough, so complete, that this activity is less a job than an extension of his personality.

Such has been the case these past several years with Steve Bell, staff director of the Senate Budget Committee. During the 6 years that I have served on that committee, I have come to admire greatly the style with which Mr. Bell has carried out his tasks. It is not simply his diligence and loyalty that I admire, though these are great qualities. More than that, though, I think it is the sheer good humor and sense of joy that he brings to his work that sets Mr. Bell apart. Not for Mr. Bell a life of quiet and unemotional detachment. Quite the contrary, he obviously lived fully both the joy of victories and the pain of his setbacks—which setbacks have usually, in Mr. Bell's case, been few and temporary. We may sometimes have questioned the particular advice that Mr. Bell was providing in his service to the chairman of the Budget Committee, but no one has ever accused Steve Bell of being understated.

This vitality of style should not make us think that Mr. Bell was deficient in the traditional virtues of top staff. An enthusiastic style has been fully compatible with discharging his duties with diligence, loyalty, and political sensitivity. Mr. Bell's service to the chairman and to the entire Budget Committee has been of the very highest order, and he will be missed by the committee and by this Senator.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH CALLS FOR PEACEFUL RATHER THAN MILITARY SOLUTIONS IN NICARAGUA

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I would like to share with my colleagues a letter from the Most Reverend Edmond L. Browning, presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church, to President Reagan. Bishop Browning, reflecting his deep concern about the course and tone of the administration's policy toward Nicaragua, sent me a copy and is permitting me to share it with you. He also sent me two resolutions adopted by the general convention of the Episcopal Church at its meeting in Anaheim, CA. The resolutions oppose all covert and overt aid to the Contras and support the Contadora peace process.

I find Bishop Browning's letter to the President significant because it reflects the concern of a respected leader of a major church in the United States. The bishop's problems with the identification of the Contras as "freedom fighters" and with the administration's attempt to place in question the credibility of those who oppose current policy is shared by many of us.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Bishop Browning's letter and the resolutions of the general convention of the Episcopal Church be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EPISCOPAL CHURCH CENTER,
New York, NY, March 11, 1986.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

MR. PRESIDENT: I write regarding your proposed financial and moral support of the "Contra" forces against the government of Nicaragua.

The five Episcopal Dioceses of Central America are a part of the Episcopal Church. We are proud of the mission and ministry of our sisters and brothers in Central America and we support them and their leadership. I have just visited with the leadership of our Latin American dioceses and my estimation of their contribution to the spiritual and physical well being of the people in the region has been strengthened and expanded.

After a two-year process, including a series of extensive visitations, study reports and nationwide discussion on the local level, the General Convention of the Episcopal Church, meeting in Anaheim, California, in September 1985, passed two resolutions relating to the United States' policy and actions in Central America. The resolutions are enclosed for your information. In summary, they oppose all covert and overt aid to the "Contras", oppose attempts to destabilize the government of Nicaragua, and support the Contadora process. As requested in the resolutions, it is my intention to share these actions with members of Congress and the other identified governments.

On a personal note, Mr. President, I must share with you that I have several disquieting questions about your policies and your characterizations of some of the governments in Central America, and political processes and conditions in the region; and, I must admit, some of your public statements about those in this country who do not share your perceptions.

I do not think that I am alone in finding it less than helpful for our national leaders to coin or corrupt the language of our democracy in support of questionable foreign military forces. Identifying the "Contras" as freedom "fighters" obscures the issues in an attempt to attach the "Contras" to the historic memory of the U.S.

To disregard the reports of reputable international human rights agencies or undermine their credibility and legitimacy by preemptive accusations of "a disinformation campaign" does not seem to serve the interests of our open national decision-making process, serve the interests of those in legitimate need nor enhance the vital work of independent, international human rights agencies and advocates.

To ignore the advice and counsel of our historic allies and friends in Latin America, especially those who have initiated the Contadora process, strikes me as a short sighted approach to the common security of our hemisphere.

I question the public relations attempt to blunt or short circuit full citizens information, discussion and participation in the formulation of the policies of our great nation. I hope your office will stimulate public debate and quality discussion not stifle it.

I am deeply troubled by these concerns, Mr. President. I must be honest in sharing with your that neither your public statements nor those of your administration have alleviated my discomfort—a discomfort I do not believe is mine alone.

Faithfully yours,

EDMOND L. BROWNING,
Presiding Bishop.

RESOLUTION

I hereby certify that the following is a Resolution adopted by the General Convention of The Episcopal Church at its triennial meeting in Anaheim, California, September 7-14, 1985:

Resolved, the House of Bishops concurring, That this 68th General Convention supports the unanimous vote of the Executive Council of the Episcopal Church calling on the United States government and all other governments involved, to take concrete actions in support of the Contadora initiative and process; to work toward negotiated, rather than military, solutions to regional conflicts; to cease all covert and overt activities aimed at destabilizing governments in the region; to affirm and respect the principles of national sovereignty, self-determination, and non-intervention in domestic affairs; and to respect human rights; and be it further

Resolved, That dioceses and congregations encourage all members to study this declaration of the Executive Council, and to share their individual views on this declaration and the situation in Central America with those in authority in Washington.

RESOLUTION

I hereby certify that the following is a Resolution adopted by the General Convention of The Episcopal Church at its triennial meeting in Anaheim, California, September 7-14, 1985:

Resolved, the House of Bishops concurring, That this 68th General Convention calls upon the United States government and all other governments involved to:

(a) cease all covert and overt aid to the contras and all other military forces in Nicaragua;

(b) cease all embargos and other activities aimed at destabilizing the government of Nicaragua;

(c) affirm and respect the principles of national sovereignty, self-determination and non-intervention in the domestic affairs of Nicaragua; and

(d) seek a negotiated settlement based on the 21 points of the Contadora Group; and be it further

Resolved, That this General convention expresses it support of the Diocese of Nicaragua in its appeal to the entire Anglican Communion, and especially to our churches in Central America, that they do all they possibly can to influence their members, their communities and their governments, to help in the steps taken for peace in Central America and by so doing avoid war among brothers and sisters; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of this Convention be directed to communicate this Resolution to the President of the United States and the members of Congress, and the governments of the USSR, Cuba, and Israel.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, before the Chair closes morning business, may I ask the distinguished majority leader what the outlook is for today, how late we will be in session, and whether or not there will be rollcall votes after a certain hour, and the same with respect to tomorrow?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think for tomorrow there is no question about rollcalls. There will be a cloture vote tomorrow morning unless we can agree to do that later today.

Mr. SARBANES. If the majority leader would yield on that point, I would expect that the cloture vote would be in the morning, which would be in conformance with the regular order and in conformance with our proceedings.

Mr. DOLE. I do not have any problem with that. I just say there will be votes tomorrow—and it will come tomorrow morning, early tomorrow morning. I assume if cloture is invoked, there will be amendments and further debate on the bill itself. So I would say we shall be in quite late today and probably quite late tomorrow, because we would still like to dispose of this bill.

I do not know about votes today. I think that would depend on the Senator from Maryland, primarily. I assume there will be continued debate today.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I am quite happy to respond to the majority leader. My own view is that with the cloture motion having been filed, we ought to follow the regular course in terms of our proceeding. Therefore, I anticipate the vote on cloture in the morning—I do not know what time the majority leader intends to bring us in, but whenever that occurs.

If that were to carry—of course, it may not carry, but if it were to carry, that would, in effect, foreclose debate on the motion to proceed except for what is allowed after cloture. That has now been cut to 30 hours in any event. I do not know of any disposition to play that game.

If cloture is invoked and we go to the bill, I have a number of very substantive amendments. They are not delaying amendments and they would really address the matters that we have talked about. My own view, of course, is that the bill is so defective that we ought not to go to it at all, and I am going to develop that further today in the course of the discussion. I should think we would have to spend a fair amount of time on the bill itself if, in fact, the bill is reached.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have no problem with that. Obviously, amendments would be in order if the bill were before us. I wish the bill were before us now so we would not have to go through two filibusters. In any event, there will be amendments on this side, too, as I understand it, in addition to that side, on the bill. That is no great problem. We have alerted Members on this side to expect probably a number of rollcall votes tomorrow. I shall visit with the distinguished minority leader about the possibility of votes today.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

METROPOLITAN WASHINGTON AIRPORTS TRANSFER ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of the motion to proceed to the consideration of S. 1017, which the clerk will state by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1017) to provide for the transfer of the Metropolitan Washington Airports to an independent airport authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, we are now back on the motion to proceed with respect to S. 1017. On yesterday, a number of us opposed to S. 1017 put forth in the Chamber for the benefit of our colleagues a series of arguments about the legislation before us. I want to make it very clear that this debate on the motion to proceed has a substantive dimension to it. I notice the proponents of the bill have not responded. They have not advanced arguments as to why they think the bill ought to be adopted by the Senate or, indeed, even why it should be considered. Their view apparently is that once it is on the calendar, automatically, it ought to be considered. As I argued yesterday, and as I shall endeavor further to show today, I think this legislation is so defective on its face that the Senate ought not to go to it. In other words, the vote which will occur tomorrow on the cloture motion filed last night is not simply a procedural vote. It is a substantive vote.

A case has been made here and is being made with respect to the defects in this legislation. These defects are of sufficient weight that the Members ought to decide that we really do not want to go to it; that the Senate ought, in effect, to say, no, we are not going to take it up. This would send a signal to the Secretary of Transportation that she has to go back to the drawing board, open a series of discussions and negotiations with the affected jurisdictions, and perhaps give Governor Holton a new mandate to enter into conversations with Maryland and Virginia and the District of Columbia and Members of Congress to see if many of the objections that have been raised and the defects and deficiencies in this legislation can be dealt with. In other words, this is not an instance in which debate on the motion to proceed is being used simply to delay without a substantive dimension. On some occasions, we have debated on a motion to proceed simply for delay. It is recognized that, in a sense, the bill ought to come up, ought to be considered by this body.

What I am submitting here and what we are arguing is that there are so many defects in this bill on its very face, there are so many problems, that the Senate ought not to go to the bill. By refusing to go to the bill, we would communicate to the Secretary of Transportation that the effort here to address the question of Washington National Airport and Dulles International Airport has not been adequate, not been sufficient.

Mr. President, one may say to that, why not let the bill come up and then amend it? And, of course, if the bill comes up, there will be a number of efforts to amend it. But the fact of the matter is that in a situation of this sort—where you have to work out carefully an arrangement well into the future, where you are talking about disposing of very valuable and important assets, where there are very complex questions of bonding authority or employee rights, questions of powers and authorities involving the Federal Government and local jurisdictions, where the whole question of regional comity and consensus is at issue—those questions need really to be addressed when the legislation is framed.

It is interesting in this instance that the committee felt that it had to strike out the bill submitted by the administration and insert another version. But it is clear upon review of the committee version that it relied to a very large degree upon the version submitted by the administration. These issues have not been adequately addressed, the things that the distinguished Senator from South Carolina and I and the distinguished Senator from South Dakota and others talked about yesterday, the things that are wrong in this legislation I think are of such magnitude and consequence that the Senate ought not to agree with respect to the motion to proceed. That would be the simplest and clearest way to communicate to the Secretary of Transportation that this effort did not rise to the standard that is necessary in order to seriously undertake to enact this legislation.

I know the distinguished Senators from Virginia disagree with that, but obviously they would disagree with that. This is a tremendous bonanza for Virginia. Unfortunately, it is not fair to the Federal Government and the Federal taxpayer, nor fair to the State of Maryland, nor in my judgment will it over time contribute to resolving the problem of air transport and traffic in the Washington metropolitan region.

So the debate yesterday and the further discussion that will take place today is directed to the point that the vote which will occur on Friday morning, tomorrow morning, on the cloture motion that was filed last night on the motion to proceed carries with it the possibility of sending to the Secretary a very clear signal that this legislation is faulty and that another effort ought to be made to address this problem. I think the simplest and clearest way of sending that message is in fact to do it on that cloture vote on the motion to proceed.

So this is not merely an effort to delay because there is an orderly procedure for bringing such efforts to a close. The majority leader embarked on it yesterday when he laid down the cloture motion, and I clearly recognize that that is within his rights to do under the rules. But there is an extra dimension involved.

Now, the proponents of the bill apparently have chosen not to make any arguments even why they think the bill should come up. Of course, that is their right. But those of us who oppose it intend to lay out all the arguments as to why we think this bill should not come out, lay out what the deficiencies are in this legislation, try to make it clear to our colleagues that there are consequences from this legislation of a magnitude about which Members need to think.

Now, yesterday's discussion, of course, appears in the RECORD this morning, and I am hopeful that Members and their staffs will review it and begin to perceive what is happening. This is not the kind of legislation that ordinarily attracts a great deal of attention. It seems to be localized in its impact. The Secretary of Transportation is very much for it. She has visited around at a lot of offices. The chairman of the commission which she appointed to address this matter has done the same. Of course, the chairman is the very able former Governor of the State of Virginia, and he has also visited with Members to try to lobby on behalf of this legislation.

So what we hope and intend to do today is to develop further the case outlining the deficiencies in this legislation, the defects, its failure to address a range of problems, to make the point that they are so deep and extensive that really the legislation cannot be corrected through the amending process here on the floor, and that therefore Members should reach the conclusion that there is so much wrong with this legislation, there are so many weaknesses in it, there are so many unanswered questions, there are so many problems that have not been addressed we simply ought not to take the legislation up and let the Secretary go back and try again to come up with an arrangement or a formula that makes sense, that meets these problems, that answers these questions, that achieves a regional consensus which is perceived by Members of this body as a reasonable solution.

As I pointed out yesterday on these issues, there ought to be enough room to work out a resolution of them. It is not done in this bill, and there is a need, I think, to go back and the Secretary to engage in further consultations and try to work out a resolution that addresses the problems that are being raised.

So there is a substantive dimension to this debate, and the cloture vote tomorrow will address that.

The discussion on the bill has been substantive from the beginning on this motion to proceed without exception on the part of the opponents of the bill. The opponents have in effect laid out a series of arguments and made a number of criticisms which we think are of sufficient weight that the Senate should conclude that we do not want to take the bill up. We do not even want to begin the process because it is so faulty that what we really need to do is send it back to the Secretary.

This is not a matter of some international import in which it is absolutely necessary that the Senate act and act within the next week or the next month. It is not an issue which carries that dimension to it.

I, therefore, hope that my colleagues will very carefully review the discussion of yesterday and the discussion that is going to take place today as they try to reach a conclusion as to how to vote on the cloture motion which will be before us tomorrow morning. By rejecting the cloture motion we would then send to the Secretary a very strong message that the deficiencies in this legislation are such that it is the view of the Senate that she really ought to make another effort to try and work out the disposition of these airports and address the whole range of issues and questions that have been raised here on the floor.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARN). The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from Maryland. I commend his stalwart stand here on the floor of the Senate in behalf of judicious consideration, rather than political consideration, of a particular matter of importance to all of us. The U.S. Government has various properties and responsibilities.

I do not think anyone in his right mind would say, "Look, we have museum authorities in the United States and all of them work extremely well. Therefore, what we really ought to do in our private possession thrust here in America is to privatize the Smithsonian.

I guess, since the Smithsonian is located in the District and not in Virginia, we should get Mayor Marion Barry a group of citizens in the District of Columbia and let us see how we could put on a fire sale for the Smithsonian. There would be all kinds of invaluable properties there going for perhaps, even up to the billions of dollars.

But I think I could get a group of responsible citizens from the city of Washington who would be glad to take it over for $47 million.

Similarly, with respect to the Botanical Gardens. I could go back home and make a very good political talk on why the United States of America should not be planting flowers when we are running deficits, and what we ought to do is sell off the Botanic Garden and privatize it.

Or the National Zoo. Someone could well contend that one zoo is enough. This one we have up here called the U.S. Congress. Why should we have two zoos. Let us get rid of the one that we have downtown and let us see if we cannot privatize that one.

And down the list, which brings you to the logic, of course, of the responsibility that we have and the trust that we have to the people of America for these two entities, the National Airport and Dulles.

The Washington National and Dulles were developed with millions and millions of dollars of taxpayer's money, far in excess of $47 million. The actual properties encompassed in this particular fire sale is just horribly dreadful. To think in terms of $346 million in bond costs, that we would have to take on under this legislation in order to get what we have already paid for. I could go right on down the list on that particular score.

But since we are discussing the issue of bringing this up for consideration, let us tell the National Congress and the U.S. Senate here this morning what we are not considering, which I think is an important responsibility, and the distinguished Presiding Officer would perhaps from his experience, far greater than this particular Senator—the Senator from Utah is now presiding, our astronaut friend whom I have the greatest respect for, and I think has done a very courageous thing in bringing an awareness to the American public of the importance of our space program here in the United States. He took his life at risk. He took the discipline, the hard training, the sacrifice of time, and everything else because he was that dedicated to our space program.

I do want to associate the distinguished Presiding Officer with my following remarks. I have misgivings, this Senator does, about the conduct of the space shuttle disaster investigation, and the conduct of that particular investigation has disturbed me from the very word "go." I realize the cold weather was a problem, because the Kennedy Space Center is not that far away from where I live in South Carolina. In fact, the previous month in December, we had a nighttime launch at Canaveral and I stayed down just outside the city of Charleston there on the beach. We could walk out in Charleston, SC, and look 300 miles down range in the Atlantic at nighttime, and we observed the night launch.

We do not necessarily have the same cold weather at Canaveral—that was the unusual part—that we have in South Carolina, but my pipes froze on the evening of January 27, the morning of January 28, and I had to pay to repair all the pipes that burst under the house and stopped the loss of water and other damage that occurred.

So, when we were on the floor that afternoon of January 28, I was wondering about the cold and what experience they had. I was rather shocked later to learn of the O-ring failure and how NASA itself had come to observe the damaging effect upon these O-rings by cold weather.

But I was even more greatly and seriously shocked by a statement made by one of the most responsible of all in the system, Astronaut Bob Crippen. I did not hear Astronaut Crippen make that statement, but it was related to me in a telephone conversation and then under sworn testimony by the engineer in authority, the No. 1 man at the Cape for Morton Thiokol, Mr. McDonald. I asked him about what occurred. He went in to, as you all know now, what he observed and knew about the particular O-rings' near complete failure in January of 1985 where the burnthrough occurred not only on the primary but the secondary ring. As a result, the Cook letter had been written which was related in an article this past weekend in the Washington Post by Mr. Cook himself.

Mr. Cook's memo was written in July of 1985. Thereupon, in August of last year, 1985, a special panel was convened by NASA here in Washington. They were so concerned that in November we had in the city of Washington the automotive engineering conference in this city. The NASA engineers and others attended the automotive engineering conference to see if they could come up with some ideas how to confront and solve this problem.

So, it was a known problem, what we say, knowingly, in the law, and, on January 27 when they got ready with the known problem, the head man at Morton Thiokol—not "at"—that is misleading—of Morton Thiokol at Cape Canaveral—this is a very important point—he was the authority to sign off for the contractor. He said, "No, I object to that launch."

And then a very heated discussion came out with respect to the pressure brought by the Huntville group. One Huntsville gentleman, Mr. Hardy, wanted to know what gives down there. We are not going to try to change the launch commit criteria at this time.

You see, that is an important statement to study because the criteria were not being changed. On a more in-depth study, we found out that the O-ring had been made a criticality-one item. But Hardy is thinking that he maybe knows more about the O-ring. He wants to get this shuttle launched.

So he is saying to McDonald at the Cape, "What gives here? This is no time to change criteria." And McDonald is pleading, "I'm not changing criteria. I'm responding to criteria. I'm responding to known facts and I'm not signing off."

I am, of course, paraphrasing.

Thereupon, Mulloy comes on the line and he says, "My God, Thiokol, are we going to have to wait until April to launch?" I do not have the verbatim quote here this morning, but that is what he was saying—"Let's get going."

And even then, with that kind of pressure, Mr. McDonald said "No." And, in essence, they said, "We will fix you. We will go to your personnel office 2,000 miles across the country and we will make this a management rather than an engineering decision."

So, at 11:45 at night, they had the gentleman overruled. Thereupon, the next morning, Mr. McDonald related his three concerns—the O-ring, the ice on the launch pad, and then, of course, at that particular time, the threat high seas posed to the ships and to the recovery of solid rocket boosters. The retrieval boats had been called in to shore because of the high seas early the morning of January 28. When the boosters are thrown off by the shuttle, Thiokol retrieves them because they are reusable. Also, there is a postflight inspection of the boosters to determine what damage, if any, did occur to the O-rings. That is exactly what he had in mind. He had O-ring problems and failure on his mind at that time. And he said, well, at least, as contractors, if you all want to be so managerial—and, of course, I am again paraphrasing—we have to be able to retrieve the boosters.

But they said no, they would not wait until the afternoon of the 28th when the weather would have warmed up and the seas would have calmed. There was pressure.

And I asked Mr. McDonald, "Well, what kind of pressure?" And he said—and this is the answer he gave to the Rogers Commission and therein when he quoted Bob Crippen—"The entire launch approval philosophy was changed or reversed or different for the first time and, instead of the contractor justifying why to fly, the contractor was justifying why not to fly."

Now, here is a very important fact that strikes me. You know, as Senators in the service up here, you become more or less, in a sense, a trial lawyer. We are in hearings every day. That is what is going on now, the hearings in the different committees. And we are hearing the adversary proceedings and witnesses on both sides. Before I came to the Senate, I also had practically another 20 years before the trial bar in my State of South Carolina. So when I am hearing the witness say that, I know that the process, I say to the Senator, is not flawed. Flaws infer a flaw in the cloth or flaw in the metal, something unforeseen. On the contrary, the process was tried and true. Here, instead of flawed, it was violated, and that is important to the investigation.

And, knowing that, when Secretary Rogers came to the hearing that we had—hearing, singular—I asked about launch pressure. However, since that hearing on February 18, I cannot get any more hearings. That is my objection here this morning. They are stonewalling me.

(Mr. PRESSLER assumed the chair.)

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator yield? Who is stonewalling the Senator?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Stonewalling, the chairman of the Commerce Committee, Senator DANFORTH, and the chairman of the subcommittee, Senator GORTON of Washington. We have asked in written requests for hearings and they keep negotiating.

I want to complete that thought and come right down to why, because the case is getting awfully cold. We had, I say to the distinguished minority leader, precedent based on the 1967 investigation of the Apollo disaster. In 1967, we had the Senate investigate, go immediately to an investigation within 10 days after the Apollo accident. We pursued it for 12 months in a bipartisan fashion and what we had, in essence, was a very responsible and responsive investigation.

And, with that particular precedent, we started in here. I am back now to having Secretary Rogers. I am saying, "Mr. Secretary"—he was telling about the staff and almost emphasizing to us, I guess, in the shadows of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings how economical he was going to be. Well, this is no time or place to really be so economical. They need to be hot on the trail and get the witnesses' statements while they are fresh in their minds and while the witnesses are available and the testimony and the evidence is available, which is what I am worried about. I do not know if it is available any longer. Seven weeks have passed.

I was asking the Secretary, I said, "Mr. Secretary, you have got a very diligent and hardworking commission. I could see you could get out and do these things, but you can't really do it all. What you need are field investigators." Five investigators, I suggested, down at Canaveral and 5 at Huntsville, 5 at Houston, and 5 up at Brigham City, and give us 10 here to look at Congress to see whether the Congress brought the pressure, to look at NASA and see whether NASA was being pressured, and look at the White House and see their interest and whether there was any White House pressure.

And the distinguished Secretary said, "This is not any gumshoe operation." I believe in his statement at that time, he said, "I'm not going to have a gumshoe walking around asking some person one at a time." He stated that we are going to have to do a lot of reading.

I said, "Well, now, Mr. Secretary, that is what I am doing is I am reading from the gumshoes of Aviation Week and ABC and the New York Times." And I am leaving out one significant edition, namely, the Washington Post, because, I say to the Senator, I want to get to them later.

But Secretary Rogers did not want to do that. I wanted it right here that minute. We have hundreds of investigators going after the particulars, and it should be, hundreds of investigators going after both the physical and the technical evidence. We have got the Navy and the ships, the Coast Guard, the engineers, the contractors making tests, and this is all good. Hundreds and hundreds going after the physical evidence. I do not know who is going after the human evidence. In fact, I think there is a block on doing it and I felt there has been a block on doing it all along. I do not know that they have asked the White House any questions about their telephone logs, their communications, or anything else of that kind between the White House and NASA, between NASA and the Kennedy Space Center, between the White House and the Kennedy Space Center. All of these things come immediately to mind. Why was the process on this occasion violated?

Now, let me, in order—and I will be glad to try to answer the Senator's question. Then I will go back and make a seriatim, in my way, of trying to develop my concerns.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I apologize to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I welcome the question.

Mr. BYRD. I was interested, however, in what he had to say about the lack of committee action in this matter. I take it that this would be the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOLLINGS. The Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation. The chairman is the distinguished Senator from Missouri, Senator JOHN DANFORTH, and I am the ranking minority Democratic member. The chairman of the Subcommittee on Science, Technology, and Space is the distinguished Senator from Washington, Mr. SLADE GORTON, and the ranking minority Democratic member is our distinguished colleague from Michigan, Senator DON RIEGLE.

Now, we have worked to investigate these matters. Senator RIEGLE and I talked to Mr. McDonald before he was invited to Washington, and he told us he was concerned that his statement given in the private session hearing of the Rogers' Commission on the previous Friday was leaked in part and was not a fair coverage of all he had said.

And it was not a fair coverage of what he had said. He wanted to testify. He wanted to come all the way to Washington to make a complete statement, and he came all the way to Washington to make a complete statement. Therein is the big difference that should be understood.

It was the understanding of Senator DANFORTH, Senator GORTON, Senator RIEGLE and myself that we would take a statement in private. We called ahead to Secretary Rogers, and Secretary Rogers had promised to give us his statement in a public hearing the following week. I think it was the pressure of the Congress that got some of these hearings to be public which I think is one good result.

But otherwise we were going to take Mr. McDonald's statement in private, and by the morning that he was to show up, which was the next morning—we only agreed on the afternoon before, and called him. And to show how anxious he was, he came right away, the next morning, and spent hours in Washington. He was intercepted, and I can only surmise from there.

I know from my particular point, I was called earlier that morning, and asked about the hearing. In fact, I was asked by a Congressman if he could come over to the hearing. I said, "Where did you learn about this?" I was immediately in communication with Chairman DANFORTH saying, look, the bell has rung. We cannot unring the bell. McDonald's presence is in the public domain. I stand for Government in the sunshine. I do not want to be postured as taking, for some unknown reason, statements in private. The unknown reason, of course, was that it was going to be taken in public the next Tuesday, but we wanted a complete statement. We were fearful about the change that could occur under certain pressures or by lapse of memory or anything else. I am not ascribing anything improper to the individual witness himself, Mr. McDonald, but we were worried about that.

It was highly important to get that full statement. We needed it then, and would not wait again for the Commission. At least Senator RIEGLE and myself both felt that way, and felt very strongly about it.

When we got around to see Mr. McDonald and to taking his statement, we could not find Mr. McDonald. I was told he was hidden somewhere, had been hiding since 12 o'clock for over 3 hours, and that I could talk to him on the squawk box. I said, "I will not demean my position as a U.S. Senator to talking on squawk boxes to anyone. If you folks still want to get his statement in private—I want it in public—I will withdraw so you at least can accomplish that. I am the one who wants a public statement. I do not have to be present if you choose to continue. I do not need to hear his statement. I have heard the gentleman. He has talked to me." So I did withdraw.

So we all know now I did not take the statement. In addition to hiding with all the witnesses, and that kind of shenanigans which I have not seen up here in 20 years, we then asked for a hearing—meanwhile, Dr. Graham called to talk to me. He called several times. I said, "I will be glad to hear you in public Dr. Graham, but not in private." At that point, Dr. Graham was scheduled to testify at a hearing the ensuing Wednesday on the NASA fiscal year 1987 budget request. Senator RIEGLE and I suggested this slot be used for another oversight hearing. However, Senators GORTON and DANFORTH canceled the scheduled hearing.

So Senator GORE, Senator RIEGLE, and Senator HOLLINGS under the rules as three members of the committee asked that it be rescheduled so we could fulfill our oversight responsibility. Here was the witness, Dr. Graham, who said he wanted to be heard. Here was the ranking member saying he wanted to hear him. But here was the chairman and the subcommittee chairman stonewalling. They did not want to have a hearing concerning oversight of the accident. And in the negotiations that had been going on too long, they said, "You go ahead and just ask them about the budget, but do not ask them anything about the needs that go in behind that budget." We have the oversight responsibility.

I have a great, a deeper, and a more lasting responsibility than Secretary Rogers has. I have to not only find out what all he is looking for, but I have to justify what I find, and I have to support it in my vote. I have to continue on.

We want to continue on with this space program. We want to reestablish the credibility.

(Mr. PRESSLER assumed the chair.)

Mr. BYRD. If I may ask, is the Senator saying to me that the committee has only had one hearing, or one meeting or no meeting or will not hold meetings?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Senator, the answer to your question is yes. We have had one meeting. We have been told by Senator DANFORTH if we find any fault with something wrong with the Rogers Commission, then maybe we can have another hearing on the score. His rationale, of course, is I do not want to have confusion, to have two investigating committees. There is no confusion with NASA. They are making their investigation along with the Rogers Commission. There is no confusion there.

But for responsible Senators to call for hearings to bring out into the open, and in the public light the investigative part of the accident, we are told "No." I can see going off the record in private if Members want to express personal opinions and draw up a report. But we have always used the Government in the sunshine, and an open process to investigate up here.

We did not think anything but the truth should come out, and if we are at fault in the Congress, or they are at fault in NASA, or they are at fault in the White House, whatever it is, that is going to dance around the fire.

Let us get to the point. They use that nebulous excuse about confusion, and they said something about grandstanding. One time the chairman used "circus." The only circus, Senator, I have seen around here is when they secreted the witness, and however they brainwashed him, they had him intimidated. It was a different McDonald on the squawk box than it was talking to me on the telephone. He was afraid to talk to me. I said maybe I am the problem. I will get out. I guess they told him that fellow is trying to get on TV or something else of that kind. Not at all.

I have not said anything around here. I could have been on more TV programs than you have ever seen.

We are trying to get to the root of this particular problem.

So McDonald will not talk.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I will not ask the Senator to yield any further. He has made reference to the rule, and to the "three Members" requirement in that rule. So the distinguished Senator is fully aware. I am not seeking to edify him or anyone else. But if he would allow me, I would like to read into the RECORD at this point the language of rule 26 which is pertinent, and it might be helpful if I did read that into the RECORD, not that the Senator has to be educated on this. As a matter of fact, he and I have talked about the rule a good many times in the past. He has been here for a long time. He knows what the rule is.

I quote from paragraph 3 of rule 26. It is as follows:

> If at least three members of any such committee desire that a special meeting of the committee be called by the chairman, those members may file in the office of the committee their written request to the chairman for that special meeting. Immediately upon the filing of the request, the clerk of the committee shall notify the chairman of the filing of the request. If, within 3 calendar days after the filing of the request, the chairman does not call the requested special meeting to be held within 7 calendar days after the filing of the request, a majority of the members——

This may be the problem area. I do not know.

Mr. HOLLINGS. That is the problem area. They made it a partisan thing.

Mr. BYRD [reading]:

> A majority of the members of the committee may file in the offices of the committee their written notice that the special meeting of the committee will be held specifying the date and hour of that special meeting. The committee shall meet on that day and hour. Immediately upon the filing of the notice, the clerk of the committee shall notify all members of the committee that such special meeting will be held and inform them of its date and hour. If the chairman of any such committee is not present at any regular, additional, or special meeting of the committee, the ranking member of the majority party of the committee who is present shall preside at that meeting.

I think I need read no further.

I thank the distinguished Senator for letting me read that into the RECORD. The problem is, as he has indicated, as I understand it, in getting a majority of the committee to act. I infer, by what the distinguished Senator is saying, that there is some problem in that regard.

I think what he is doing here is a service. I am not sure that the Senate really knows, or at least a majority of the Senate really knows why such hearings have not been conducted already. It is the responsibility of the Senate. We have to act on the NASA budgets. We have the responsibility of oversight under the Constitution. I think the Senator is trying to proceed with what he perceives to be his responsibilities in that regard.

It would seem to me that there ought to be a majority of the committee, before the evidence gets cold, which would have a meeting. That ought to be done. In the interest of our Nation's space program and in the interest of the lives of people who are going to continue to be involved in that program, there ought to be committee meetings or hearings going on now, it seems to me.

Mr. HOLLINGS. What we have is that we have to respond to our responsibility in a catch-22 situation. We are told by Chairman DANFORTH if we find something wrong with the Rogers Commission, then maybe we can have some hearings. In order to do my job, I have to find fault with the Commission. I am not running around trying to find fault. I have some misgivings about the way they are doing it. But in large measure, they have been working around the clock, they have brought out these points, and they have traveled about. They are absolute experts. There is no question about that.

Every Presidental commission has a dual role. They serve as a jury for the investigation, and they are eminently qualified to do this. There is nobody who would reflect in any way on that particular score.

I have enjoyed the questions, particularly Sally Ride's question that she has asked, with her eyebrows and her facial expressions. That meant more to me than anything else.

But, they also have another role, which is just as important, of investigating. What you need in that particular instance is field experts. Let us call them gumshoes. It is those who are used to taking statements from witnesses and going around one on one asking questions. "Where were you? Did you call anyone? Did you receive any calls? How long were you in this particular post?"

Then there are negative statements such as when they say, "I do not know anything." You get that statement.

You keep coming down and then you bring all those statements in from all the investigators and correlate them here at headquarters, so to speak, in Washington where they are doing the job.

We had 91 such field investigators on Three Mile Island. The best I can hear is that the Commission has a staff of 13, and the staff are mostly lawyers, PR people, et cetera. Then they have a computer into which all the testimony and information is fed to find discrepancies. What we need is a human computer. I can get you some from over at the Department of Defense who know how to investigate, from the FBI, and from other agencies of Government, such as the Internal Revenue Service. They know how to ask witnesses questions and go right in on an experienced basis.

I doubt if the majority of the Rogers Commission ever went around and investigated a day in their lives.

Mr. BYRD. If the Senator will yield, I am sorry I have to leave but I understand what he is saying. I will certainly read the RECORD. I do compliment the Senator, not only for his statement here today but also for his dedication to duty in trying to pursue this matter.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I thank the distinguished leader. Let me complete that thought as to my suggestion. I have to find fault with the Rogers Commission before I can investigate and perform my responsibility. But I bring Secretary Roger up and we ask him to provide the information and he says, "I am not furnishing any. I might respond to some questions from time to time. But, you cannot have the statements, you cannot have this or that."

So I cannot find good or bad. Since I cannot find, I cannot find fault. If I cannot find fault, I cannot have any hearings. They have you cut off and it just moves on and the case gets cold.

I have some things that I want to emphasize that are being discussed. For example, the original, January 28, version of the State of the Union Address President Reagan was to give on the day of the disaster. First they said there was no copy, that there was nothing available. They did not know what we were talking about. Then ABC followed it down and got what was supposed to be the talk. Now I am told just in the last few hours that the White House has apologized to ABC and said, "Well, we did not give you all the talk."

Well, it is obvious they did not give all the talk. You can see that from what we were furnished in the first instance.

The incredible part, and I do not believe it so I say incredible, is they say—and I know the Senator has to leave the floor—that NASA asked that the President of the United States in that State of the Union Message to touch on Christa McAuliffe and her pioneering in space and how this was the forerunner of spaceflights in the 1990's. They would have you believe that that specific request by NASA was thrown aside, that it did not get to the speechwriters. Instead, they want you to believe, the President of the United States thought it was important enough to mention a scientific experiment being conducted on the Challenger but not to mention Christa McAuliffe, the very person that started the teacher in space program.

These are the kinds of questions that go through the lay mind in America today.

We are not asking those questions. We are told about computerization of statements but we are failing to ask the hard questions.

I do not know that you can get them, but the Commission did ask one person, "Did you bring pressure?" That is what I am talking about. You do not ask a conclusion. You let the conclusion be drawn from the various facts about the calls, the actions, the letters, and whatever else comes out, and then the conclusion is to be made by the Rogers Commission or our U.S. Senate, whether there was extraordinary pressure that caused a violation of the process.

Mr. BYRD. If the Senator will yield again, this is a strange way of doing things, as I see it. I do not understand why the Senate and/or its committees have to wait to see if someone is making a mistake. That does not fulfill our responsibilities. I am sure the Senator feels that way about it. He has said so time and time again. I would hope the committee would have hearings.

We are going to have to find these things out for ourselves. Whatever the Commission finds out will be helpful, and I think they are doing a good job. But at some point in time the questions are going to be asked: "What did you do? What did the Senate do? What did the Senate committee do? What did your investigation turn up? What did it tell you?"

I again thank the Senator.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I thank the distinguished leader. I appreciate it very much.

Along that line, I might refer to the thought the distinguished leader touched upon.

Our ranking member, Senator DON RIEGLE, has written a letter, I am told, and asked that certain witnesses be allowed to appear in a segmented series of at least four hearings, where we could touch on different subjects, and fulfill both our authorization and oversight responsibilities. The witnesses that we would like to have are listed. I keep on being told that, "We are looking at it. Yes, you might get your hearings."

Of course, important time is passing now. We are only asking the conclusive question of, "Did you bring pressure?" The obvious answer is, "No."

I might refer the Senator from Arkansas to something that really points up what he has referred to.

I do not know what happened to Woodward and Bernstein. There is a very peculiar attitude.

Here the American Broadcasting Co., goes and brings out just exactly what we were trying to find out about. The Chicago Tribune, after they learned from the ABC investigation, headlined it "NASA Sought State of the Union Plug." Find that in the Washington Post, not just the headline, but the story.

No, sir, They would be on that like a June bug.

Whatever it is now, they are on Imelda Marcos' shoes and dresses, her clothes. But the important thing to the American people, where we have lost seven brave Americans, is they cannot find out anything about the state of the Union plug. Let us read that since I mentioned it. People do not know this in the U.S. Senate. It was sent over by NASA a few weeks ahead of time. I am told it was signed by Phil Culbertson. I have been asking to hear from him.

He is the one who was the No. 1 man at the Kennedy Space Center the day of the launch. He has yet to testify. They have not brought the No. 1 man at the Kennedy Space Center on behalf of NASA before the Commission. He said there was not any pressure. Why should there be pressure? Maybe he was the one bringing the pressure. He signed off on this NASA draft statement.

Can you not see me as Director of NASA, the head man, sending this to the White House and saying, "Draft input for State of Union Message?"

I wish I had the exact date here. I am told it was in January, the same month. The accident happened on January 28. This happened the same month. Here is the exact quote.

Tonight, while I am speaking to you—

This is what President Reagan is supposed to be saying according to NASA folks—

a young elementary school teacher from Concord, New Hampshire, is taking us all on the ultimate field trip as she orbits the earth as the first citizen passenger on the Space Shuttle.

Christa McAuliffe's journey is a prelude to the journeys of other Americans and our friends around the world who will be living and working together in a permanently manned Space Station in the mid 1990s, bringing a rich return of scientific, technical and economic benefits to mankind.

Mrs. McAuliffe's week in space is just one of the achievements in space which we have planned for the coming year, however. The U.S. Voyager spacecraft has just this week visited the planet Uranus and sent back striking images of this distant world after a two billion mile trip in space. Later, we will participate in a worldwide study of Halley's comet, launch the Hubble Space Telescope, launch the Galileo space ship on its way to Jupiter and participate with our European partners in sending the Ulysses spacecraft to explore the poles of the sun.

Our commitment to continuation of a strong civil space program through such projects as the Space Station, space transportation, space science and the technology required for the programs of the 1990s, is an investment in the future of America's greatness in space and in the young men and women of this nation who will be the leaders of tomorrow.

Mr. President, I want to yield in 2 minutes to the Senator, but I think I want to make a coherent presentation to see if we can try to make some coherence out of this question of the sincerity and genuineness of my particular concern. I go now to the Chicago Tribune article that I referred to earlier by headline, which had this article on the morning of March 13:

Nearly three weeks before the space shuttle Challenger exploded, acting NASA administrator William Graham suggested that President Reagan include a passage in his State of the Union Address citing the achievements of the shuttle and its celebrated citizen-passenger, teacher Christa McAuliffe.

In a memo to the White House dated Jan. 8, 1986—

They did have the date. These investigative reporters, these gumshoes of the press have been doing a better job. The Commission did not have this date. They do not want to be gumshoes, they are going to be scientists and they are going to miss the real cause with their great science.

. . . January 8, 1986, and titled "draft input for State of the Union message," Graham suggested that Reagan highlight McAuliffe for taking America on "the ultimate field trip."

The memo was solicited as part of a routine government-wide effort to seek ideas from the various agencies.

I shall divert from that particular article to say I would like to know of the other submissions they got from the other agencies. I would like to know what is so routine that they get from the other agencies that is so readily disregarded, where the President would have one of his great initiatives, a teacher in space, have everybody down at the Kennedy Space Center on a particular Sunday morning. For the originally planned Sunday launch, the Vice President of the United States was due to be there. When it was delayed, he was waved off, but they had other dignitaries there. This particular Senator had schoolchildren hooked up on Tuesday, January 28, from South Carolina. There were millions of schoolchildren all hooked up throughout the United States. There was tremendous interest, all engendered by the White House. Now, all of a sudden, the White House goes cold, colder than that old O ring. You cannot get it to respond.

I can tell you here and now, Mr. President, they said the memo was solicited, just routine, just routine talk, all of a sudden, a routine flight with scientific experiment but not a schoolteacher. Going back to the article:

When the Challenger exploded 73 seconds after launch on Jan. 28, killing McAuliffe and six astronauts, the President postponed for a week his annual message to Congress, which had been scheduled for delivery that night. The NASA draft referring to the nation's first ordinary citizen observer in space was never used.

But on Feb. 26, nearly a month after the tragedy, White House spokesman Larry Speakes said that there wasn't "any thought of ever putting anything" about the shuttle mission in the State of the Union "except referring to the kid's [a student] experiment on board and except referring to the commitment to the space station.

"Those two things were in the speech from the start," Speakes added during the morning White House press briefing. "Nothing connected with the shuttle launch, and that story ought to go away."

"That story" was a reference by Speakes to rumors that there was pressure from the White House to launch the shuttle in time for Reagan to cite McAuliffe's mission in an annual message used to sum up his administration's accomplishments—pressure that might have caused the launch to be made on a day when there were increased hazards.

At the Feb. 26 briefing, Speakes branded the speculation about pressure "the most vicious and distorted [rumor] I have ever heard. [I'm] not only denying it, I'm saying it's a rumor perpetrated by the press."

Now all of a sudden the press is at fault.

I might note that on March 12, when ABC released this story, Dr. Graham was not available for comment. He was out of the country. He had been available before that, running up and down in the Halls, calling to try to see me.

You could see the fellow. Now all of a sudden when we want to know what he did about a memo, he is out of the country. We cannot find him. They have not called him. He has not testified.

I know he met with me in private in the office of the Secretary from Washington [Mr. GORTON] and said there was not any pressure, there was not any concern. He did not tell us of this memo. He did not act as though there was any concern, any connection whatsoever, yet he had to know of this memo at the particular time and he did not tell us.

In the memo from Graham, who was not available for comment Wednesday night, it was suggested that Reagan tell Congress and a prime time national television audience:

"Tonight, while I am speaking to you, a young elementary school teacher from Concord, New Hampshire, is taking us all on the ultimate field trip as she orbits the Earth as the first citizen passenger on the space shuttle.

"Christa McAuliff's journey is a prelude to the journeys of other Americans and our friends around the world who will be living and working together in a permanently manned space station in the mid-1990s, bringing a rich return of scientific, technical and economic benefit to mankind. Mrs. McAuliffe's week in space is just one of the achievements in space which we have planned for the coming year."

Shirley Green, NASA's chief press aide, confirmed Wednesday that a speechwriter in her office, Vera Hirschberg, wrote the passage in early January after Reagan's Cabinet secretary, Alfred Kingon, sent a routine message.

They keep on using that word "routine." They all get to be routine.

• • • to executive agencies and departments calling for ideas for the President's State of the Union speech.

Now all of a sudden all they want to really ask from NASA is a matter of routine. That is another question in my mind. Was it routine or was it not routine, or was there a particular interest there?

Going back to the article:

Senior White House officials said Wednesday neither Reagan nor his top aides ever considered including the material in his speech and repeated their denial there was any White House pressure on NASA to make the ill-fated Challenger launch.

"I never even saw it," said White House Communications Director Patrick Buchanan, who oversaw speechwriting efforts for the State of the Union Address. "It was filed and forgotten."

The memo was addressed to Kingon.

They did not say the memo was signed off by Phil Culbertson. It does not say that in the story, but we found this out. And he was a man down at the Cape, too. So he is the leading man. He submitted the memo.

We have in politics the famous couplet:

Like Cato, give his little senate laws,
And sit attentive to his own applause.

We have that in science, with the White House. We send over the memo and race down to the Cape. Could it have been—I am asking; I do not know—could it have been pressure by the very man who sent the memo saying:

I have sent the memo. I have a chance the President might do it. Let's get this thing off this morning so by the afternoon we can have it in his talk.

That is a logical, reasonable question to be asked.

A draft State of the Union speech dated Jan. 28, prepared before the shuttle explosion, was made available by the White House Wednesday night and contained only a brief, one-sentence reference to the Challenger mission.

The passage about the Challenger referred to a young science buff whom Reagan introduced as a "citizen-hero" during his address and did not mention either McAuliffe or the achievements of the space shuttle itself.

"We see today the dream coming alive in the spirit of discovery of 21-year-old Richard Cavoli," the draft speech said. "All his life he has followed the path of science and medicine. Today the science experiment he began in high school was launched on the space shuttle Challenger."

Then they go on in the story meanwhile talking about recovery of the remains there, but I know there was another particular quote because it was asked over there at NASA. And I now leave that Chicago Tribune article.

I ask unanimous consent that the article in its entirety be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Mar. 13, 1986]

NASA SOUGHT STATE OF THE UNION PLUG

(By George de Lama and Storer Rowley)

WASHINGTON.—Nearly three weeks before the space shuttle Challenger exploded, acting NASA administrator William Graham suggested that President Reagan include a passage in his State of the Union Address citing the achievements of the shuttle and its celebrated citizen-passenger, teacher Christa McAuliffe.

In a memo to the White House dated Jan. 8, 1986, and titled "draft input for State of the Union message," Graham suggested that Reagan highlight McAuliffe for taking America on "the ultimate field trip."

The memo was solicited as part of a routine governmentwide effort to seek ideas from the various agencies.

When the Challenger exploded 73 seconds after launch on Jan. 28, killing McAuliffe and six astronauts, the President postponed for a week his annual message to Congress, which had been scheduled for delivery that night. The NASA draft referring to the nation's first ordinary citizen observer in space was never used.

But on Feb. 26, nearly a month after the tragedy, White House spokesman Larry Speakes said that there wasn't "any thought of ever putting anything" about the shuttle mission in the State of the Union "except referring to the kid's [a student] experiment on board and except referring to the commitment to the space station.

"Those two things were in the speech from the start." Speakes added during the morning White House press briefing. "Nothing connected with the shuttle launch and that story ought to go away."

"That story" was a reference by Speakes to rumors that there was pressure from the White House to launch the shuttle in time for Reagan to cite McAuliffe's mission in an annual message used to sum up his administration's accomplishments—pressure that might have caused the launch to be made on a day when there were increased hazards.

At the Feb. 26 briefing, Speakes branded the speculation about pressure "the most vicious and distorted (rumor) I have ever heard. [I'm] not only denying it, I'm saying it's a rumor perpetrated by the press."

In the memo from Graham, who was not available for comment Wednesday night, it was suggested that Reagan will tell Congress and a prime time national television audience:

"Tonight, while I am speaking to you, a young elementary school teacher from Concord, New Hampshire, is taking us all on the ultimate field trip as she orbits the Earth as the first citizen passenger on the space shuttle.

"Christa McAuliffe's journey is a prelude to the journeys of other Americans and our friends around the world who will be living and working together in a permanently manned space station in the mid-1990s bringing a rich return of scientific, technical and economic benefit to mankind. Mrs. McAuliffe's week in space is just one of the achievements in space which we have planned for the coming year."

Shirley Green, NASA's chief press aide, confirmed Wednesday that a speechwriter in her office, Vera Hirschberg, wrote the passage in early January after Reagan's Cabinet secretary Alfred Kingon, sent a routine message to executive agencies and departments calling for ideas for the President's State of the Union speech.

Senior White House officials said Wednesday neither Reagan nor his top aides ever considered including the material in his speech and repeated their denial there was any White House pressure on NASA to make the ill-fated Challenger launch.

"I never even saw it," said White House Communications Director Patrick Buchanan, who oversaw speechwriting efforts for the State of the Union Address. "It was filed and forgotten."

The memo was addressed to Kingon.

A draft State of the Union speech dated Jan. 28, prepared before the shuttle explosion, was made available by the White House Wednesday night and contained only a brief, one-sentence reference to the Challenger mission.

The passage about the Challenger referred to a young science buff whom Reagan introduced as a "citizen-hero" during his address and did not mention either McAuliffe or the achievements of the space shuttle itself.

"We see today the dream coming alive in the spirit of discovery of 21-year-old Richard Cavoli," the draft speech said, "All his life he has followed the path of science and medicine. Today the science experiment he began in high school was launched on the space shuttle Challenger."

According to Buchanan and other White House aides, Kingon never brought up the Graham memo in staff meetings nor showed it to Reagan's retinue of speechwriters.

Meanwhile, divers off Cape Canaveral, Fla., continued to retrieve remains of Challenger's crew compartment and crew members Wednesday.

Also, a local medical examiner charged that NASA and the Air Force kept "essentially a blackout of communications" with his office after last Friday's discovery of human remains from Challenger.

Brevard County Medical Examiner Laudie McHenry issued a statement at noon Wednesday saying the blackout had ended two hours earlier, and his office would "be present" during examination of crew remains, in accordance with Florida law giving him such responsibility.

NASA later confirmed the arrangement, saying in a statement that the space agency has "invited" McHenry to participate in the forensic examinations of Challenger crew members.

Though NASA changed its policy toward the medical examiner Wednesday, it still refused to release any information about crew or cabin recovery until retrieval and identification is complete. However, United Press International reported that a salvage ship carrying wreckage from the crew cabin and crew remains docked late Wednesday.

On Wednesday, Air Force officials began barring reporters from the Patrick Air Force Base hospital where NASA officials had said crew remains would be stored.

A military source, however, indicated that remains may be moved to another facility, possibly to the county medical examiner's laboratory. The base hospital, the source said, may be too small and ill-equipped to handle the examination.

Navy Lt. Cmdr. Deborah Burnette, press aide for the underwater recovery effort, said NASA engineers were studying two fragments of solid rocket boosters to determine whether they were from the left or right side and whether to lift them. Both were photographed from manned submarine Sea-Link-II.

The first piece is 10-by-14 feet and was found in 800-foot-deep water 40 miles northeast of the cape. The second piece, 4-by-5 feet, was in 650 feet of water 37 miles offshore. The latter was of greater interest because it was closer to where pieces of the right booster have been found previously, Burnette said.

Two engineers from rocket manufacturer Morton Thiokol Inc. are aboard the submarine.

As Morton Thiokol engineers assisted in the debris identification, a spokesman for the Chicago-based company said that a former Morton Thiokol executive has come out of retirement to take command of the company's beleaguered space operations division.

Morton Thiokol Vice President Thomas Russell said Edward Dorsey Jr., who left the company in 1984 after 25 years, would become vice president and general manager of the space division, replacing Calvin Wiggins, who will become Wiggins' deputy.

As investigative and retrieval work continued at the cape Jim Mizell, one of NASA's most knowledgeable technical spokesmen, said he would take a temporary leave of absence. Mizell denied rumors that he was being reprimanded for briefly discussing possible conditions of the cabin and its computers Monday, during NASA's self-imposed silence about the recovery effort.

He did not say when his leave would begin or end but said that his job "appointment" as a retired NASA engineer permitted him to work only 130 days per fiscal year and he was nearly at the limit.

Mr. HOLLINGS. We do not want to just put part of these things in the RECORD. I thank the distinguished Chair.

Now I go to the actual ABC News program, and I quote from it, on the evening of March 12 when they finally found out about this and broke the story:

Dr. Graham is out of the country but his aid Charles Kupperman told us "it's ludicrous to think there was any pressure because of a planned speech."

Now, that in and of itself is ludicrous, in my judgment, a ludicrous statement by Charles Kupperman. It is a very serious thing. It is laughable that they think there was no pressure because we know there is pressure. We are just trying to find out from whom, from where it came. We know it is not just general pressure of schedule that some of them have talked about and Astronaut Young has referred to in his memos, launch schedule pressure.

We know there was specific launch pressure, not just the schedule pressure this particular time, but as the Astronaut Crippen has said, it changed the entire philosophy at the Cape whereby the contractor, rather than justifying why to fly, had to justify why not to fly.

Now, on that particular point, let us not forget the other contractor. The other contractor was Rockwell. On the morning of January 28, they checked the ice and they said it was unsafe to launch.

At no time in the history of NASA launchings have we ever had a launch over the objection of a contractor. And herein, Mr. President, we have a launch over the objection of two contractors and the original man responsible at the Cape still refusing to sign off. That should not be missed by my colleagues as we move along and try to unravel the story and find out where it comes from.

I mentioned some thoughts. For one, we had an exchange just a week ago over on the House side with respect to Dr. Graham. They could get him over there. And I guess they pledged to only ask abut the budget, and that is what he testified about. The distinguished astronaut, Congressman NELSON, BILL NELSON—and I am paraphrasing from memory. I wish I had it. I did not realize we were going to get into it here and have this interest we have this morning—but when Dr. Graham indicated there might be a holdup on commercial flights and the commercial nature of the launches and the particular program, he came back and he said, "Dr. Graham, I want you to know that we here in the committee on the Congress are 100 percent for the commercial nature of our Space Program."

Well, No. 1, that is a mistake if he said it was 100 percent. I do not know whether he said 100 percent in Congress. If he said 100 percent in committee, he could have been accurate. I am not trying to find fault with BILL NELSON. He is an outstanding Congressman, an outstanding astronaut. He, too, showed courage and dedication to go up in that shuttle.

But when he said we are 100 percent committed, not this Senator, to commercial payloads, I rather look upon the entire shuttle phase of the Space Program as research and development. Our launches should occur in accordance with the program of research and development not commercial pressures to keep up to financially pay for it.

The American public are going to have to understand that this is not a commercial venture to make money but still very, very much in the research and development stage.

No. 2, when you look upon an administrator who is in charge of a program here in the Federal Government in Washington who is looking for his budget approval and the authorizing chairman is seated before him and he says "You better get with it and you better go commercial," then that is pressure. It is inadvertent but it is pressure. We all bring pressure from time to time and we understand it.

So herein we are not disregarding that there could have been pressures or calls. I will get my telephone logs and see whether this Senator on the Space Subcommittee on the Senate side was calling and said, "Let's get it up there" and whatever. We must look at other telephone logs. Could the pressure come from Congress? Could the pressure come from NASA itself?

You have, and I mentioned it over a month ago, the institutional pressure which is obvious to me. They want to show and prove their programs and they could well have brought it on themselves.

The only thing I wonder about is what they call uncharacteristic the conduct of Hardy and Mulloy at Huntsville. That was totally uncharacteristic, I am told, of those particular officials in the Space Program at Huntsville, because we just never did have anybody overruling or chastising or saying "What gives" or when we are going to launch in April and going all the way up and have them overrule and chastise a very responsible engineer at the Cape, Mr. Alan McDonald.

That did not look to me like regular pressures or schedules, but it could be or it could be interworking between staffers at NASA and staffers at the White House. Therein I want to know about. I do not want to walk up and say to a staffer "Did you bring pressure?" The answer is no. I want to know who did you contact, when did you contact them? And they have a long list of those who have not been asked any questions, and it is 7 weeks since the tragedy, and I have a list of those at the White House.

I am glad now that the chairman of the subcommittee is here on the floor because he can elaborate. He has repeatedly tried to get hearings scheduled and has requested officially of the leadership of our Committee on Commerce, Space, Science, and Transportation, the names of those particular witnesses.

But I think it should be understood that we have been stonewalled in my opinion. Their reason is we do not want to have a circus, we do not want to have confusion, we do not want to have grandstanding. I have been up here 20 years and never been accused of it, and neither has the Senator from Michigan. We are still mature individuals. I think if we are grandstanding the media would pick it up quicker than any Senator would and they would say so in the newspapers, and they would blast us away from any kind of grandstanding. We are not in secret. We are in public and we are subject to the criticism of the public and if they saw a serious measure, the loss of life, and tremendous national tragedy that we have all had to experience here, anybody that would get out and try to take political advantage or grandstand or have a circus, or whatever else, they would immediately lose all credibility, support, and respect and should lose all credibility, support, and respect.

Let me at this particular time, Mr. President, yield to the distinguished Senator from Michigan on this score and I think he can complete some of the thoughts that I initiated here.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator for yielding.

As he has noted, I serve as the ranking minority member of the Space Subcommittee, and I have many of the same concerns that we have to find out exactly what happended and the truth and the whole truth is really the only thing that we can settle for. Piecing the truth together is not an easy, task no matter who does it. It has not yet been done in this instance. So it remains to be done.

I would like to just review a little bit some of the history that leads up to today.

I did not come to the floor with any prepared remarks and so I am going to touch on some things that I think bear on both the points that the Senator from South Carolina has made and other related issues that I think ought to be said in the context of the discussion that has already taken place here this morning.

But if one goes back to the accident itself, I think only now the magnitude of this disaster is becoming clear. It was obvious that there was the loss of seven magnificent astronauts, one of course a civilian woman and mother of two children, but in addition to that, we lost at least 3 billion dollars' worth of vital national security assets. In addition to that, the Space Program has now effectively been shut down and it will be shut down for a period, it appears, for at least a year and perhaps a good deal longer depending upon the time that it takes to reconstruct exactly what happened and to work out appropriate remedies to various problems and to have those remedies put in place is going to take some period of time.

One of the future space projects that the United States has been embarked on is the building of a space station. Because of the tragedy, that work has been interrupted. We should know that the Soviet Union, for example, has been proceeding now for a long period of years with a space station effort and in fact are well along with that. There was news just within the last 2 weeks that they are putting their astronauts, cosmonauts as they call them, up in their space station. So they are moving ahead at a time when we are shut down, and we are shut down because of this accident.

So this is not a routine matter. This is not a casual matter. This is not an accident of a minor scale. This is an accident of enormous consequences to the country where there are major strategic implications. The financial aspects are multi billion-dollar issues.

Just yesterday in the Senate Budget Committee we made provision on a tentative basis, not taking final action, because we do not know enough now to be able to take a final step, but we took tentative action, to set aside the spending of at least $3 billion on a replacement orbiter, and yet we have not had any kind of serious hearings helping to put us in a position to know whether or not that is really the course of action that the country ought to take.

All of this leads to the question of why the U.S. Senate is not proceeding in the normal orderly fashion to try to understand what happened here and what the policy and budget implications are.

I will say that we have had discussions and letters go back and forth, some from me to my counterparts on the other side, some with the Senator from South Carolina and I together to our counterparts on the other side, requesting that we get started in a serious way to lay out the factual record as to not only what we can determine was related to this particular catastrophe but also to begin to take and draw from those facts the implications on urgent policy decisions that we have to make, programmatic decisions, budget decisions, procedural decisions and decisions that we cannot possibly make in a meaningful fashion and a proper fashion until we have done the groundwork, until we have assembled a body of information that we feel that we understand and that we have the confidence in that we can make recommendations and take those recommendations both to our colleagues in the Senate and at the same time in a sense to the country as a whole so that we can make whatever national judgments now we are prepared to make on the future of the Space Program.

I must say I have served here in Congress now 20 years, as the Senator from South Carolina has, and I recall no situation quite like this one. I have never found it so difficult to work out in the normal course of business an understanding about how to proceed with a serious piece of congressional work.

We are just having a very, very difficult time doing it and it is not clear to me why. I do not think there is any justification for it, frankly. What is invoked as the reason is that, well, there is a Presidential inquiry underway and we ought not to do anything presumably until they finish their work.

Well, people can make that point, but we have our own duties to perform. We have parallel responsibilities that do not relate in any way to what the Presidential Commission is doing. And, as a matter of fact, they have already taken their look at some of the issues that have been raised today. They have already had public hearings. I attended those public hearings to listen to the cross-examination of witnesses having to do with the launch procedures and the activities leading up to the decision of the launch and so forth. So that ground has already been plowed publicly by the Commission. So even in that area, as sensitive as that may be, it is not something that we would in a sense be getting into before them or in a way that would complicate their activities.

Our problem is that we have basic legal obligations ourselves, constitutionally imposed duties, both in the area of oversight and in the area of budget, that we are not exercising. And I am upset about it. I am upset about the fact that we are not exercising them. There is no excuse for it. None whatsoever. We ought to get moving.

I feel I have been very patient about it, by my patience is just about at an end because that has not produced any results. We have had one or two private meetings here or there, and they have some limited value. But that is no substitute for the fundamental work responsibility that we are obligated to carry out and which we are not doing, frankly. We are at a dead stop at the moment. A dead stop. We are not doing anything in a serious, systematic way in terms of pulling together the body of information that we need to make the kind of policy decisions and forward budget decisions that this country has to now make. It is irresponsible of us not to be moving at least in a routine manner, but I think in something more urgent than that.

This is an extraordinary situation and we ought to be putting this ahead of other things. We ought to be clearing off our calendars in order to get down to work in a serious way to start to assemble the facts that are out there and to call in the people that we need to hear from.

I do not mean NASA people. That is only part of it. We need to talk to outside suppliers. We need to talk to space experts who can talk to us about our policy options for the future, about the space plane. We have a whole series of interlocking issues now that have been forced upon us that we must address and answer.

This was not true in the same sense 2 months ago before the accident. At that time we were on a different course. But the accident has changed that and it imposes a burden of responsibility on us as a Senate that, frankly, we are not meeting—we are not meeting. And I am at a loss to say why.

People ask me why we are not moving. I cannot give the answer to that because I do not know a good answer to that. We should be moving. We should be moving in an orderly fashion.

When the Presidential Commission came in on one occasion some weeks ago to report to us as to the fact that they were in being and they were starting their work, I posed the questions in a very constructive way, I felt, to former Secretary of State Rogers, the chairman of the Commission, who I think has been pushing the Commission hard. I salute him for the work that he has done in that capacity as they have been moving along.

But I asked at that time if it would be possible for us to be able to share at least the accumulation of factural information as it was being developed, because we had our own need for that. We need to be in a position to try to figure out where we go from here and what kind of budget decisions and recommendations that we are going to make. And we are not able to do that if we have to wait until they finish. And they are supposed to run for 120 days. Well, but they may not be done in 120 days; it may take longer.

But if we are going to wait for that length of time before we start in any serious way, what we are doing is we are handicapping ourselves and we are handicapping the whole issue in terms of being able to understand it and act on it in a timely manner.

So I said at that time, and I have said since in other conversations with former Secretary Rogers, that I think we can work out procedures here that are fully understood so that there is no possible problem of any kind of conflict back and forth between the two efforts. They have one assignment that they must meet, but we have parallel obligations that we must meet. And, in fact, we should be able to share information as we go. And why not? Why should we not be able to share information? What is there here that cannot see the light of day? What has to be hidden? What has to be kept out of public view? After all, these are public activities, paid for by the public. So, any suggestion along that line just does not hold water in any case.

But nobody is looking for a conflict. I certainly am not. I want to be able to work and get our job done, in parallel with the Commission, without having any problem with respect to conflicts with them. And because we are so far behind now and they have already plowed a lot of this ground anyway, I do not think there is any legitimate argument that can be made at this stage of the game that says that we cannot begin in a thorough and systematic way.

Now, with respect to the point that the Senator from South Carolina raises with respect to pressure to launch, there is absolutely no mistake about it. There was pressure to launch. The Commission has, in effect, said as much time and time again on the record and it is well known and it has been widely reported by a number of other people who were involved in the process and adjacent to the process. And it is clear to this Senator that that was the case.

Now, where that pressure came from, whether it was too ambitious a schedule in terms of too much to try to accomplish in too short a time that caused pressure, internal pressures within NASA, external pressures on NASA, we do not know today what the full scope of those pressures were. But they were extraordinary and they led to this disaster. The procedures were turned upside down. That has been confirmed to us in public by the Commission itself.

This is the first time where a recommendation not to launch has not been accepted by NASA and pressure has been applied to turn that decision around. There is no other precedent in the entire history of NASA, and it has been so testified in the public hearings of the Presidential Commission, where this has happened. So this is an extraordinary event and procedure that has produced, as I say, an extraordinary tragedy. So we must get started here in the Senate.

I am not going to put it in the RECORD today, because I have been trying to work with my colleagues on the other side and I am going to continue to try to work with them, but I, for one, have sent a memo to my counterpart on the subcommittee suggesting a course of hearings that I think we ought to begin quickly and which would begin to fill out the record and give us the factual information that we need to have.

Every day that goes by puts us further behind the curve in terms of being prepared to make intelligent policy recommendations. We are talking about multi-billion-dollar strategic decisions, as well as decisions that relate to the safety of the astronauts. And John Young and the other astronauts have made it clear that they are plenty concerned about the procedures that have been working in the past. Are we going to sweep that aside? Are we going to put that aside? Is that something we should take a look at? Are we going to invite the astronauts in to talk? If we are not going to ask them in, what is our basis for not doing so? Who would we be protecting? We certainly would not be protecting the astronauts, and they are certainly the ones we ought to be protecting first, not last.

I am frank to say that we are seeing it is very, very difficult to get anything moving here. We have just had to go through the exercise, in the Budget Committee yesterday, where we put in a tentative mark for replacement of the shuttle Orbiter and we fenced the money because we are not in a position to make a recommendation of any solid consequence at the moment.

But how do we solve that problem if we do not have some hearings around here and get the responsible people in and ask the appropriate questions and get the answers? Why are we not doing this? We do it on everything else. What is there about this particular situation that is causing this reluctance to take even the first step that would be the normal step for the Senate to be taking to try to figure out where we go from here? I do not know. I am at a loss to explain it.

As I say, I have served in both parties, in the House and Senate, for 20 years. I have never seen a situation like it. I have just not seen one like it. I have never seen it so difficult to get the normal order of work process going. We are just stalled. We are stuck. Things are not moving and there is really no excuse for it.

But I would just finish by saying that I do not think it is right that we are in this situation. I think the country is injured by it. I think our national interest is badly served by the fact that we are not doing the proper work now in a timely basis that we ought to be doing.

As I say, I did not come over here with prepared remarks because I had not intended to speak today. But, having heard the Senator from South Carolina raise these issues, I felt it was important to add these additional thoughts.

Mr. HOLLINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I thank the distinguished Senator.

First, I will make two points, and I will yield the floor. One is with respect to the matter of ancillary concerns which comes up now, Senator. That is the Senator's responsibility, and my responsibility; that is, the investigative reporting that is being done by the Miami Herald. I hold in my hand a headline story, Sunday, March 16, a little bit earlier this past week, "NASA Is Wasting Millions, Audits Reveal."

So in addition to the responsibility of what caused the disaster, we need to determine what is the cost of the repair, what is the proper policy with respect to one shuttle, or two or three more shuttles, or are we going to what we call expendable launch vehicles, and thereupon what about the space station? Now we have an additional responsibility; that is, they say if you think the Pentagon is bad with $600 toilet seats, go on over to NASA, and you will find worse. Perhaps we have not been looking as closely as the Senator and I should have been looking.

We are going to have a look into that before we appropriate this year the millions or billions that the President is asking for to make sure they are not wasting money.

One way to reestablish credibility in this particular agency is to get a pro on board. This is no time for on-the-job training. Get a pro on board that the disciplines and personnel of NASA have confidence in.

I commend the administration. They are bringing back Dr. Jim Fletcher. But they move like molasses. I do not know why we cannot get hearings, and why they don't move Dr. Graham aside. The gentleman misrepresented himself to me, and I do not want to have to frankly contend with him.

But when I asked him, "Is there any evidence, Dr. Graham, to substantiate the report that Morton Thiokol objected or opposed the launch," his answer was, "No." All of the evidence pointed in the other direction. His answer, "No," of course, was obviously false. There is nothing but evidence in that direction. For example, there was one statement before the Rogers Commission where the witness who now is up at Brigham City stated that "there was not a single prolaunch statement in that room." He was Roger Boisjoly. That gentleman with the other 12 engineers the evening before—it was not a split decision on safety—says there was not one positive prolaunch statement in the room.

Second, Dr. Graham misled me when he said again all the evidence pointed in the other direction. And I said, "What was that evidence?" And he elaborated saying, "Well, the official who normally signs off at the Cape gave us written recommendation for a launch." False; the man who normally does it at the Cape was Allan McDonald. That is why he was complaining to Senator RIEGLE and to Senator HOLLINGS. They overruled the man who normally signs off at the Cape, and went 2,000 miles across the country at quarter of 12 p.m. on the evening before the launch to get approval. As we have since heard, it was now a management decision rather than engineering, and we cannot just be contending with safety. We have to get to management on this one. They overruled the poor gentleman.

So I want to get Dr. Fletcher on board because they have confidence in him—the astronauts, all the scientific personnel, and the Congress. I do not think it would take any time whatsoever to confirm him over here, and I do not see what the delay is. He was examined by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Senator, for the SDI and the Fletcher Commission. He just completed that task. I do not know why they have to drag their feet.

But there is something wrong in this thing. I do not know what it is. I am trying to find out. When you are given the talk from the White House, they give you part of the talk, and not all of the talk. First, they say there is no talk. Then they say, if there is one, it is not available. Why would they not make the draft State of the Union Address available for a month. All the media has been asking for that particular address. Then when they finally give it to ABC, they only give them part of the talk. Then when you can see it is obvious that a part is left off, then they come up with the rest. Meanwhile, they are still maintaining that absolutely there was no idea of mentioning anything about Christa McAuliffe in the address. I do not believe it.

Mr. President, what I have done today in a letter to Fred Fielding, White House counsel, is requested of the White House the appropriate telephone logs as best I can. I cannot get any witnesses, but I can try to see if the White House will give us anything conclusive with respect to pressure.

We asked some weeks ago at the Kennedy Space Center for their telephone logs and we received them, and we are now making a study of those.

We asked, also, for the ones from NASA. As I indicated above, I have communicated with the White House this morning to get the telephone logs of the White House, to see what calls and what communications were made, because that is the only thorough way to try and determine if there was any pressure.

Someone, sometime, somehow, the tragedy will be ironed out.

My question of Secretary Rogers was studied and respectful and had historical concern. I said: "Secretary Rogers, I don't want to be investigating the Rogers committee 20 years afterward, like we are investigating the Warren Commission and people are writing books. Let us be absolutely thorough on this particular score and go into every facet and get your field investigators out there."

If he would do the job they are doing on obtaining the physical evidence, with all the Navy and all the ships and all the engineers and all the tests, with the physical exertion, with all the Commission members traveling hither, thither, and yon—I could not travel all those places if I were in charge of it—get the field investigators and know how to take the statements of everyone involved, because the meaningful statements put out on this score come from the witnesses themselves who said they could not sleep at night. To whom did they say that? National Public Radio. The witnesses say, "We want to make a statement somewhere, to somebody." It was National Public Radio receiving those calls that got them to interview the particular witnesses, who have yet to be identified, necessarily, in the field of press and journalism. The radio authorities do not identify those particular individuals who gave the statements; but I am certain that if we could bring witnesses and statements around, it would not take us long, from the quotes made, to begin to identify some persons that may have already been quoted. But they are very dramatic statements.

I have a record of the National Public Radio interview, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRANSCRIPT OF NPR REPORT—FEBRUARY 20, 1986

NPR reporter in Louisville: The Presidential panel investigating the shuttle Challenger explosion continues to focus on the effect of cold weather. Late yesterday, the head of the panel, William Rogers, said three top NASA officials did not know about serious concerns voiced by Morton Thiokol engineers the day before Challenger was launched. Thiokol builds the shuttle's solid rocket boosters. Photographs have shown a jet of fire streaming from a joint in the right-hand booster rocket seconds before the explosion. NASA officials have stated that Thiokol managers approved the launch, but, Rogers said, a number of company engineers still felt the crucial seal between the booster segments would not hold if they were too cold. We have two reports, the first from NPR's Daniel Zwerdling (?) in Huntsville, Alabama.

NPR reporter in Huntsville: A Morton Thiokol engineer sits before me, his eyes getting red with tears. "I fought like hell to stop that launch," he says. "I am so torn up inside I can hardy talk about it, even now." But here's the story, according to this and other company engineers I talked to, of what happened the day before the launch. Top NASA and Thiokol officials refuse to talk about it. It's about noon at company space shuttle headquarters in Brigham City, Utah. Several key engineers learn that temperatures around the shuttle launch pad in Cape Canaveral are unusually low, colder than they have ever been just before a launch. They meet hurriedly, urgently, in company hallways, and they all agree that they've got to warn top management fast that the shuttle could be in serious trouble. A handful of worried employees crowd around the desk of Vice-President Robert Lund and they lay out the evidence. If the temperatures in Florida don't get a lot warmer, they say, then the crucial seals which hold the rockets together might fail during takeoff. Says one engineer, "we all knew what the implication was without actually coming out and saying it. We all knew if the seals failed, the shuttle would blow up."

6:00 p.m. A bigger, more formal, meeting in one of the company's main conference rooms. About a dozen engineers are there, along with four top managers, pouring over charts and photographs of rocket seals and joints. They all agree that it's too risky for the shuttle to take off.

8:00 p.m. They call NASA officials over a special telephone conference network and, one by one, four key Thiokol engineers lay out the troubling evidence:

Point Number One: Both NASA and company engineers have known for several years that when the shuttle starts to take off, tremendous forces work the joints where sections of the solid rocket's put together. And some of those crucial seals don't work right.

Point Number Two: The colder the weather, the worse the seals work. In fact, they emphasize, when the shuttle took off in Jan. 1985, in 53 degree temperatures, the coldest it's ever been, till now, half the seals in both solid rockets were damaged.

Point Number Three: Thiokol's own laboratory studies show that as temps drop below 50 degrees, the seals dramatically lose their ability to hold the rockets together. And tomorrow, at Cape Canaveral, the engineers warn, it's going to be only around 30 degrees. Thiokol executive Bob Lund wraps up the presentation to NASA with the company's official recommendation: do not launch the shuttle tomorrow. The NASA officials listening on the telephone lines are shocked. "I am appalled", say George Hardy of NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center in Huntsville, ALA., "I am appalled by your recommendation". Another top Marshall official, Larry Mulloy, argues with the Thiokol engineers. He challenges their figures. He says the company doesn't have firm enough proof that the seals will fail in cold weather, but Thiokol engineers vehemently disagree, at some points almost shouting with anger. They insist that NASA should postpone the launch until the weather climbs into the 50's and at that point, according to one engineer, NASA's Mulloy exclaims. "My God! Thiokol, when do you want me to launch, next April?"

It's 8:30 p.m. now. Thiokol managers put NASA on hold on the telephone network, and they ask their staff engineers one more time, "You're sure about this?" "Absolutely," the engineers say, and virtually no one in the conference room disagrees. But now Thiokol's general manager Jerry Mason speaks up. "Look," he says, "this has got to be a management decision." So, while a dozen engineers look on, fuming with anger, Mason asks the three other managers what they want to do. They each nod O.K., let's go ahead with the launch. "Who knows why our managers overruled us?" one engineer tells me now. "As you know, our company's competing with several other corporations to get future shuttle contracts. I can only guess," the engineer says, "at the enormous pressure they were feeling."

8:45 p.m. Thiokol general manager Mason takes NASA officials off hold, and he tells them, "O.k., we'll approve the launch after all". "Then sign a document right away," NASA's Mulloy tells them, "and send it to us by telefax." Although one top Thiokol manager, Allan McDonald, who's been taking part in the conference call from the Cape, refuses to sign the paper, the meeting breaks up. The engineers go home feeling downtrodden, and defeated, and terribly worried. "I kept having fantasies that night," says one engineer, "that at the moment of ignition, the shuttle would blow up, instantly. See, we thought that if the seals failed, the shuttle would never get off the pad. There'd just be a big fireball, and everything would vanish. I was so scared, I didn't even want to watch the launch." But the next morning, the engineer joins fifty other colleagues back at company headquarters in the same conference room where they'd argued the night before. They're all watching the countdown together on a large projection tv. When the shuttle lifted off the pad, he says, "I thought gee, it's going all right, it's a piece of cake. And when we were one minute into the launch, a friend turned to me and he said 'Oh God, we made it, we made it'. Then a few seconds later," the engineer says, "the shuttle blew up. And we all knew exactly what happened." I'm Daniel Zwerdling, in Hunstville, ALA.

NPR reporter in Brigham City, Utah: A Morton Thiokol engineer here says he prayed as he watched shuttle Challenger lift off from its launch pad. We can't tell you his name, his job title, or even the color of his hair. His job may depend on this secrecy. But we can tell you something of what he feels, what others may feel, about the right stuff gone awry. On Jan. 28, this man prayed for some divine act that would safely guide Challenger into space. He worried that the seals in the solid rocket boosters would not function properly in the chilling morning air. He feared disaster, but as Challenger rose from earth, and as all seemed well, he began another prayer, one of thanks. But in mid-prayer, the spacecraft exploded. He sat quietly, and cried. Now, three weeks later, that launch haunts him. This Thiokol engineer suspected the danger, joined with his colleagues in trying to reserve the launch decision, and now feels regret that the did not do more. This is a space shuttle worker who has had the utmost respect for NASA, who in the past has been frustrated by NASA's extraordinary conservatism, which he says always puts safety first. But as he recalls the decision-making process that led up to the launch of the Challenger, he grows silent, and wonders aloud why this time was different. "NASA had a brain spasm," he says, "and forgot their code of conduct." He bristled as he quotes NASA's Lawrence Mulloy, saying "My God! Thiokol, when do you want me to launch, next April?" and then he turns the anger inward. He says, he should have stood up, answering if that's when its warm, yes. But he didn't. Now he's left wondering what else could have or should have been done. Depression has set in, and this proud space program engineer now talks of meeting with psychiatric specialists he says Morton Thiokol will provide. Though he claims NASA managers coerced Thiokol engineers and managers into approving the launch, he blames his fellow Thiokol workers and himself for not arguing more adamantly, for not insisting on a postponement. Last night he read in a local newspaper that vandals scrawled a phrase three feet high across a RR overpass: "Morton Thiokol murderers", it said. The engineer shakes his head, rises and walks into another room to watch a television report, but turns away when that haunting image is shown again. "I should have done more", he says, "I could have done more". I'm Howard Burkets in Brigham City, Utah.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, referring to those particular interview records of national public radio, it will be seen that there were certain engineers involved in this who were so concerned that they used the expression that they thought the shuttle would explode on the pad. They thought the shuttle would explode on the pad! It would not even go off. There is real concern of those involved, to show you the realism and seriousness of what they are talking about. We are not making up stories.

They said their prayers. At the time of lift-off, one turned and said: "Thank God, there she goes." An associate said: "Like a piece of cake." "Thereupon, it exploded, and all of us in the room knew why."

That was made weeks and weeks ago. That is the human part of this that I am talking about.

We are assigning hundreds, perhaps thousands of people, trying to recover the remnants in the ocean, to develop the remaining pieces of the shuttle and the booster rockets, the individuals themselves. We are trying to make tests now about the effects of the cold on O rings, putty, and solid rocket boosters. They were already made last year. We do not have to make new tests and put it out as a new story, like this morning, that something new was discovered. It was not new; it was known.

You had them praying because they thought it was going to explode on the pad.

So there it is, and there is where we have not been in depth, to really find out all that really happened after this thing occurred—not speaking lightly—after this tragedy occurred; that we did not get on the human part of it and find out who all was involved and why it was violated.

Mr. President, I saw momentarily the distinguished Senator from Missouri, our chairman of the committee and his staff director, Mr. Allen Moore, come to the floor and then to the cloakroom. I know they are aware of my comments. I would like to be around if they have some comments. I would like to be able to answer any questions, and I would like to have the opportunity to reaffirm my feeling on this particular score. So I will yield the floor at this time.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, let me comment on the proceedings today.

As we move through this second day of extended debate and filibuster on the motion to proceed, it is obvious to me that the purpose of the Senator from Maryland is to delay and obstruct these proceedings.

This morning, my friend from Maryland talked about his substantive discussion of the issues. Throughout this day, we have heard hardly a word about the airport legislation, but we have heard a great deal about zoos and botanical gardens, the space shuttle program, and the tragedy of the Challenger.

The reason why I think we see this strategy of delay is that it is apparent that the opponents of this measure cannot prevail on the merits.

Maryland opposed the establishment of Dulles in the early 1960's; and through the years, Maryland officials have shown competitive hostility to the development of Dulles and National.

Today, the opponents of this measure are attempting to prevent the Senate from working its will. The opposition to this legislation is limited to a handful of Senators at best, as evidenced by the debate.

It seems that the opponents of this measure want to keep Dulles and National on the Government welfare, or, as the British would say, "on the dole." The opponents want to make sure that these airports remain shackled by Federal control.

The opponents of the measure want to prevent these airports from being run by a local authority, as all airports in this country are managed.

Finally, the opponents of this measure want to prevent these airports, Dulles and National, from becoming the modern, first-class jetports that our Nation's Capital requires.

I hope that the opponents of the measure will permit the Senate to work its will.

I look forward to a debate on the issues that have been raised today. I intend, at the appropriate time, once the Senate turns to the consideration of this measure, to meet the concerns that have been advanced, to set the record straight on a number of important points, and I look forward to the opportunity to engage my friends and colleagues in a full discussion of this important legislation.

Mr. President, I am prepared for the question.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, has the Senator yielded the floor?

Mr. TRIBLE. If there are no further requests at this point, it is appropriate for the Chair to put the question to the body.

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator was speaking and stopped speaking but continued standing, and I am asking the Senator whether he has yielded the floor.

Mr. TRIBLE. It would not be my intention to talk further. If it is the intention of my colleague from Maryland to speak at this point, the floor is his as far as this Senator is concerned.

Mr. SARBANES. In other words, the Senator has yielded the floor?

Mr. TRIBLE. Indeed.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia, who just said a few remarks, among other things said that there are not very many opponents to this legislation. I would only note that the people who have spoken against it outnumber those who have spoken for it thus far in the debate. In fact, it is only the Senators from Virginia who have spoken for it; and the odds—just in terms of odds—are pretty sharply against them thus far.

Mr. President, it has been asserted that we are only in a procedural situation, and I have submitted to the Chair and to my colleagues that there is substance involved here. What we have tried to show in the course of yesterday and today is that the defects in this legislation are such that it ought not be taken up by the Senate and the proper place to make that point is on the motion to proceed to the legislation.

In other words, if the legislation is so faulty, if there really has been a failure on the part of the Secretary to work out a number of the difficult problems and pressing questions that are involved in this issue, it seems to me that the wisest course of action is for the Senate not to take it up and to say to the Secretary of Transportation, in effect, "Well, you've got to go back and try again."

It is not accurate, as my colleague from Virginia suggested, that there is an animus at work here toward his State. What is accurate to suggest is that if the airport facilities in the two States are to be in a competitive situation, that competition ought to be a fair and reasonable one, and that a particular jurisdiction should not gain unfair advantage through an inequitable piece of legislation.

Now, Mr. President, I want to discuss some of the provisions of this legislation, S. 1017, because I think it is fair to say that many have not had an opportunity as yet to really get into the legislation in detail and to begin to ask questions about particular provisions. There is an overall impression about this issue which people have. You have the Secretary of Transportation saying that she is for it and calling people and urging them to be for it, and, of course, the Secretary of Transportation is a powerful figure in the President's Cabinet because there are a whole range of other programs over which the Secretary of Transportation has jurisdiction and authority, programs that are important to Members and to their States and to their localities.

We have pointed out at the more general level a range of problems. First of all, the return to the Federal Government for disposing of these assets, a paltry $47 million. I do not know anyone who argues that that is really a fair price. Everyone recognizes that as a giveaway. And, of course, the true figure that ought to be paid ranges in quite a broad range but you are talking about 10,000 acres at Dulles. You are talking about turning over a federally built access road that cost $60 million, the road alone. The road alone cost $60 million. You are talking about two major airport facilities, both of which are profitable and returned a substantial profit last year.

Second, it is clear that by lumping the two airports together in one authority and giving Maryland only 2 of 11 members, that is grossly unfair to Maryland. This legislation allows the airports to cross-subsidize one another so that the profits of one can be used to underwrite the activities of the other, therefore sharpening the competitive disadvantage of BWI which seeks to compete with Dulles. You have leveraging possible here where the access to highly desirable slots at National is traded off for the provision of service to Dulles even though the carrier might not otherwise without that tying arrangement choose to make that decision.

And then, of course, you have, as was raised yesterday, the question of noise. Mr. President, I want to take a minute on that because I find it extremely disturbing what has transpired. The Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation—the committee of jurisdiction in this subject—reported this bill out on September 11. Two months later the committee ordered reported by voice vote a committee amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute previously ordered reported. And the report states:

> This committee amendment would transfer to the independent Airports Authority created by this legislation full responsibility for regulating airport aircraft noise at National.

So the committee came along—this was the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Virginia, as I understand it, who is a member of the Commerce Committee, and he added this noise amendment putting into the Airports Authority the responsibility for regulating airport aircraft noise at National.

Now, this is an authority dominated by the State of Virginia. The bill submitted to the committee, drafted by the Holton Commission and submitted to the committee, provided, and I quote:

> That the nighttime noise limitation standards currently set out in 14 Code of Federal Regulations 159.40 may not be amended.

The proposal was to carry over and freeze into place the regulations with respect to nighttime noise.

The junior Senator from Virginia got an amendment in 2 months after the fact to give the authority over noise to this Airports Authority. The noise problem at National has been a pressing one over the years. Planes are required to follow a course over the Potomac in order to try to minimize the noise impact; the way they turn on takeoffs and landings has a great deal to do with who is impacted by the noise. It has been a source of great concern to constituents in both Maryland and Virginia and the Maryland and Virginia Members of Congress have tried to work together to place some restraint on the noise. A curfew was put into place that begins at 10 in the evening and runs until 7 in the morning to try to check this problem.

Now we find, through this late-starting amendment, the authority being put in the Airports Authority with respect to noise, and that is an authority which Virginia dominates. It is no wonder that Marylanders are apprehensive that the burden of this noise is going to be directed toward Maryland, which has only 2 out of 11 members of the authority that will be deciding what the regulations are going to be with respect to nighttime noise.

The choices with respect to nighttime noise are, either you curtail it overall or, to the extent you have it, it is directed equitably toward Maryland or Virginia or inequitably toward one or the other. I think it is reasonable to be concerned and apprehensive about what is going to happen when you have an authority that has 2 Maryland members on it out of 11 and has 5—2½ times as many—Virginia members.

Mr. PRESSLER. Will my colleague yield for a 3-minute statement I wish to make on this point? I do not know where it would fall.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I am happy to yield. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to my colleague without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I want to say on this very point regarding membership of the commission that it is very important to small States in the Midwest and the West that there be more Presidential appointees on this commission or that it be designed in some fashion so that it will not be controlled by one State. Let me explain why. I see the senior Senator from Virginia is on the floor and I would welcome his response to this.

In my State of South Dakota, we used to have a direct flight from Sioux Falls to Washington, DC. There used to be a direct flight from Sioux City, IA, to Washington, DC. Part of the reason that there is not a direct flight now is that the Washington, DC, airports like to give prime landing times to the big jumbo jets from Los Angeles or Chicago or London. We can fill our planes up, but ours are not big, jumbo jets. Nevertheless, my constituents have business to do in Washington, DC. We do not want to land all the time during prime times, but minorities should have some rights.

In the case of the District of Columbia airports, those citizens from smaller States are at a disadvantage. Let us say that we pass this bill and, 5 years from now, a group from the chamber of commerce or from the labor unions of South Dakota come to me and say, "Senator, we are getting very bad treatment. Airplanes want to fly into Washington, DC, from our State but we cannot get landing times that are favorable."

I can say, "Well, I don't have anything to do with it. It is controlled by a board that is controlled by the State of Virginia, so go see the Governor of Virginia."

That will not be a very good answer for me to give for two airports that are basically close to Washington, DC. Therefore, I have filed an amendment and I am going to file another one today providing that the State of Virginia not have five members but have a lesser number, equal to the number that Maryland has and equal to the number that the District has, and that the President of the United States should appoint more of the members from across the country, with the advice and consent of the Senate. Then I can do something about it if there is a problem at the airports.

Some people might say, well, why not do this in New York or Florida? Let me say, if my constituents need to fly to New York or Florida, it is probably a business trip or a pleasure trip; therefore, if there is a problem, that has to be worked out on a business basis. But coming to Washington, DC, is a little different. People have business before the Interstate Commerce Commission; they have a forestry problem; they want to come and see their Senators and Congressmen; they want to petition their Federal Government. We, in Congress, must keep some control so that if a problem arises at these airports, not just for the people in this area but for the rest of the country, we have some say in it. In this bill, we are effectively giving complete control over those two airports to one State, however you slice it.

Let me say that I like the State of Virginia. In my 12 years in Congress, I have done a lot to help Members from Virginia with projects in their States. But these two airports have a national significance.

Let me say also that my part of the country, South Dakota, has been treated badly in the airline deregulation situation. We have lost a lot of our air service and we have lost in rail deregulation. What transportation companies want to do is take the richest routes, the most populous routes.

But there is also a public service and a national defense interest in a national transportation system. That is how our country was built up. What we are doing with this bill in terms of giving complete control over those two airports to one State diminishes that transportation system.

If there is a problem, and I cannot see all the problems we might have, but I am citing one—the assignment of landing times to planes that come in from across the country—we are going to find the big population centers have a big advantage over the lesser populated areas. Maybe that is not a concern that Members of this body have, but I think every State has some small cities that have airports and they cannot all have direct flights into Washington, DC. In some cases, from some parts of our country, perhaps there cannot be a direct flight every day, perhaps there can be one every 3 days. But much of the decision that is made on the part of an airline, what goes into their decisionmaking process, is what is available in landing times, how they are going to be treated.

If that is made by one board with more members from 1 State, the other 49 States are going to suffer.

Also, there may be other issues that we have not even yet defined. The point I am making is that my amendment will increase substantially the Presidential appointees. Let me notify the Senate that we are still negotiating over the numbers. It has been suggested there might be two from Virginia, two from Maryland, two from the District of Columbia, and five appointed by the President.

If the President wanted to appoint all his five from Maryland, Virginia, or the District of Columbia, I suppose that would be fine, but I think the advice and consent of the Senate would be such that it would come from across the United States and put a national input into decisionmaking at these airports.

I also think they should be sold down the line for a fair price and I think that the time has come for us to consider getting the Government out of this business. But we have set up a plan here that gives windfall to one State under the price that it is being sold for and it gives a windfall under the bonding provisions. However, those two things do not bother me as much.

The most important issue is that I want, as a Senator, to be able to explain to my constituents who say to me: "There is a problem at the airport. We cannot get a direct flight that is able to land at a good time there. Therefore, the airlines don't want to fly there because they want the big jets to get the prime landing time."

They should give most of the landing times to the big jets. But the minorities also have rights, and I am speaking for a minority, a smaller State and a distant State, but a State, nevertheless, that has constituents and citizens who wish to come to petition their Government. That is why I am offering an amendment to this bill which will provide for a change in the composition of the governing board which will not allow one State control. I know that some people say this is a Maryland and a Virginia fight. It is much more than that.

Every State in the Union and territory has citizens who come here.

In fact, there were five groups from my State here yesterday who came by air and they all had to go through at least one airport to get here. That may have to continue. But the quality of air service into Washington, DC, is partially decided by how those planes are treated when they land, what landing times they are given, and a lot of other things.

There is absolutely nothing wrong with letting the President appoint a majority of this board. He can appoint good people. Are we to suggest that only people from Virginia can make judgments on these airports? Certainly I think our senior colleague from Virginia, with whom I have worked so much and who is interested in smaller cities, I am sure, in the Midwest as well as in Virginia, would share sentiment in this with me.

But I want to say that my concern here is about transportation and the quality of transportation, the ability of citizens to petition their Government, and the way we tend to overlook smaller cities, small States, and so forth. That is what the Senate is for.

It is here that, under the great compromise of the Constitutional Convention, the rights of minorities were to be protected, and I find myself speaking for a minority that is not usually recognized as a minority, the traveling public who wants to come to Washington, DC, to petition the Federal Government.

If my public wants to travel to other places for vacations and business, that is another matter. But Washington, DC, has a different nature. There are people who have to appear in person before the FCC, who have to appear regarding railroad abandonments before the ICC, who have to appear in person before some of the courts here, not to mention testifying before congressional committees.

So that is the principal reason for my interest in this legislation.

I am working with Senator HOLLINGS, Senator EXON, and others, on legislation. I filed an amendment yesterday. It is my feeling that the authority which we will propose, will most likely be comprised of two from Virginia, two from Maryland, two from the District of Columbia, and five to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. I do not know exactly how those numbers will come out, but we are open to suggestions.

I see my senior colleague from Virginia here. Would those numbers be agreeable to him?

71-059 O-87-40 (Pt. 4)

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I say to my distinguished colleague that throughout this initial phase of consideration of this legislation, the managers of the bill have determined that it is in the best interest of the Senate that we await the consideration of the bill before such time as we would address the substantive issues.

We are quite anxious to move along on this matter. We are available as soon as the Senate determines whether it will continue deliberations on the motion to proceed or get to the bill. It is my hope we will get to the bill and that we will consider the Senator's amendment along with the others.

Mr. PRESSLER. I thank my colleague.

I hope my colleague understands that it troubles me to be on the opposite side of an issue from him, but I hope he will understand that. We in the minority on this matter, we from the small States, whose citizens have to travel to Washington, DC, are fearful that we may be overrun, so to speak, by the large cities, the big States, the great industrial centers.

I have seen our air transportation devastated. I have seen the one direct flight to Washington ended because of the fact they could not get landing rights at a particular time. They say, you come at night or you come at a time that did not fit, but the prime times are reserved for the jumbo jets and the big planes, even though our planes are full. So our people have to stop in Minneapolis or St. Louis or Chicago and change planes and come in. That is about a 2-hour delay.

The point is I think we should have a right to have some direct flights, maybe two or three a week. But I am fearful that if this board were controlled by the members of one State we would have no input.

My constituents would come to me and say: "Senator PRESSLER, why don't you do something about this? When this bill was on the floor, why didn't you do something about it?"

I am trying to do something about it. It would be my feeling that before we proceed we should have the ground rules, we should know what we are proceeding on. Is this indeed a matter that our colleagues understand? Because under the rules of the Senate, the motion to proceed offers an important protection to minorities. Indeed, one might say those of the minority have a responsibility to protect their rights by engaging in debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of important legislation like this.

So I speak for a minority, not a minority that is listed as a minority, but a minority that is very much a Western, small State, similar to the one represented by my colleague from Virginia in some cases.

So, Mr. President, I thank my colleagues.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PRESSLER. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. I think the Senator is making a very important point. It seems to me that we have made efforts here to discuss this legislation substantively, which the proponents do not want to do. This matter really should have been put in a posture that when Members looked at it and it was brought to us, each problem had been addressed and had been worked out.

This, it seems to me, is a desire to move along and in effect have people forfeit their rights before the substance has been fully addressed. It is my contention that this legislation is so flawed that the Senate ought not to take it up and ought to ask the Secretary, in effect, to try again to address the concerns that are being raised, the very legitimate concerns which the Senator from South Dakota has just outlined. Those should have been taken into account before the legislation was ever put before us.

The effort to try to steamroller this thing right along so that in fact the issue may never be addressed it seems to me is not fair. That is why I think the vote tomorrow on the motion to proceed to cloture is a very important vote.

I think it is possible on that vote to say to the Secretary of Transportation, "There are a lot of things in this legislation that you have not addressed, that you need to address, and you should take it and work it over in light of the concerns, problems, and questions which have been raised by Members of the Senate in the course of discussing the substance of this matter."

Mr. PRESSLER. May I say to my colleague, if he would yield, that if this legislation is passed in this form, I predict that in 3 or 4 years we will be having a hearing in the Commerce Committee as to why the smaller cities in more distant States are not being served properly. Indeed, they could even be smaller cities in upstate New York or in Virginia. And we will be told that, "Well, let's call the fellows in this authority and ask them." Well, they are not accountable in any way to us, and they will be acting solely in the interests, I suppose, of Virginia, by whose Governor, I presume, they will be appointed.

The point is the rest of the United States also has an interest in these two airports. Now, if this were an airport in New York or Florida or California, I would say we do not have a right to see more Presidential appointees. But there will be problems brought to the Commerce Committee. We will be having a hearing and will be helpless to do anything about it.

So somebody will say, "Why didn't you do something about this when it was in the Senate?" One of the few times small States can do anything about such matters is on the motion to proceed. And unless we can get some commitments on this during this period, we will be completely steamrolled once we are operating simply by majority vote. And that is what the rules of the Senate are about.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I fail to appreciate how small States are going to be steamrolled simply because we are not joining in the substantive issues on the motion to proceed. If the bill is before this Senate, subject to amendment at that time, the interests of small States and all States can be considered.

I see here on the floor the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Missouri, and I wonder if he would be kind enough to address the Senate on this issue of the procedure and the present posture of the Senate; namely, currently deadlocked on the issue of the motion to proceed.

There have been statements made here today inferring that perhaps this bill was ill-considered by the committee over which the distinguished Senator from Missouri presides.

Mr. PRESSLER. I have not in any way suggested that.

Mr. WARNER. Maybe I will withdraw that. I did not mean it in a negative context at all. But let us hear from him.

Mr. PRESSLER. I have spoken very highly of the chairman of the committee on more than one occasion.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thank the Senator. And he is welcome to continue. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I know that Senator PRESSLER has the floor. I would just say that this is a bill which has been of great interest to members of the Commerce Committee. Senator TRIBLE, especially, a member of the committee, has spent a great deal of time on the bill. We feel that it has been thoroughly aired in the committee. We also feel that the long-term health of both National Airport and Dulles Airport are very much at stake. These are the only two airports, I believe, the only two commercial airports in the country that are owned and operated by the Federal Government. They are, therefore, unique.

One of the problems that we found with both of these airports is that, because they are owned by the Federal Government, the Federal Government has been much more tight-fisted in providing for capital improvements than would have been the case had they been operated by a governmental entity other than Uncle Sam.

I know in our State of Missouri we have had major airport work done in St. Louis. Kansas City built a new airport in the last decade. But National and Dulles are sort of rocking along without real improvements. And the concern is that, in a Gramm-Rudman era, it is going to be very difficult to see the healthy development and maintenance, even, of Dulles and National unless the ownership is changed.

So it is the view of the majority members of the Commerce Committee that this is something that is quite important for these two airports and that it would put them on a par with other airports in the country and that we should get on with it.

I thank the Senator from South Dakota for his time.

Mr. PRESSLER. I thank the Senator for his kind words. Let me say that I have enjoyed working with him on this and other issues. But I hope he would consider joining us in changing the composition of the authority somewhat and give the President more appointees.

I would agree that the goal of selling it is a good goal, but we are essentially giving one State control of it. I said earlier that my State used to have a direct flight to Washington, DC, but it has been discontinued because they like to give the prime landing times to the jumbo jets from the larger airports. We do not want to elbow anybody out, but certainly the minorities have some rights. My constituents want to come to Washington, DC, to petition the Government.

So, assuming it is our goal to sell the airport, would the chairman of the committee consider becoming a cosponsor of my amendment to increase the number of Presidential appointees, certainly with the advice and consent of the Senate? Let us say, have two members of the commission from Virginia, two from Maryland, two from the District, and five appointed by the President of the United States. That would not impede the sale. Would my colleague become a cosponsor of my amendment? We would love to have the weight of your name on the amendment.

Mr. DANFORTH. I appreciate the honor that has been tendered me. I am not prepared to entertain that thought right now, but if we can get on with the bill, pass the motion to proceed, I will certainly think about it.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota has the floor.

Mr. PRESSLER. I would just conclude this by saying that 4 years from now the Senator from Washington or Missouri or South Dakota may have a group of constituents who come into their offices and say, "There is something terrible going on out at the airport that is unfair to my part of the country." It is unfair to the planes that come from Washington State, for example. And the Senator from Washington will have to say, "Well, there is a board of Virginians. The Virginians. Rally 'round the Virginians. Go see the Virginians, because, as a Senator, I don't have anything to say about that."

That is what I am concerned about. There is a national scope to these two airports. I do not think that Virginia or Maryland or the District should be cut out. Indeed, they would have the majority of votes together.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I say to my distinguished colleague, there is a national scope right now; namely, that the taxpayers of the United States of America are caring for these airports and the main thrust of this legislation is to relieve them of that burden.

Mr. PRESSLER. Then let us pull together a package and reach agreement so we could sell it.

Mr. WARNER. I would also say to my distinguished colleague that we have on each Senator's desk a report here of the Committee on Commerce and the vote was 12 to 4 to report this bill out.

I ask a question of my colleague, the chairman of the committee. Was this matter in any way handled, this particular piece of legislation, inconsistent with the traditions of the committee in handling other pieces of legislation? Was it forced through, rammed through?

Mr. DANFORTH. No. The history of this bill is that there was a hearing on June 26, 1985. There was a second hearing on July 11, 1985. The bill was reported on September 11, 1985, by a vote of 12 to 4, and an amendment to the bill was reported on November 14, 1985. So there were two hearings and two days in which it was considered in markup.

Mr. WARNER. Does the Senator know of any instances when witnesses asked to testify or Senators asked to appear that they were denied that request?

Mr. DANFORTH. I do not know.

Mr. PRESSLER. I have never suggested they would.

Mr. WARNER. If I may say in reply, and maybe I misunderstood, the Senator said the minority rights of small States are being thwarted here on this motion to proceed. That troubled me a bit. Just what did the Senator mean by that, if I understood him correctly?

Mr. PRESSLER. I meant that the minorities in this particular situation will have a very hard time getting into National Airport, in many instances, because all the times will be left to the jumbo jets.

Mr. WARNER. Let us look at the motion to proceed. That is the matter that is before the Senate. How are the interests of the Senator's constitutents in any way being reduced?

Mr. PRESSLER. Because, under the rules of the Senate, our chances of getting an agreement before proceeding are much greater.

Mr. WARNER. Let me ask the Senator, what is the agreement we are trying to reach before we proceed?

Mr. PRESSLER. That the composition of the board be changed to give more national representation.

Mr. WARNER. That is a substantive change to the pending legislation which would have to be addressed by the Senate as a whole during the course of its consideration of the bill, and that is the precise reason we want the bill brought up.

Mr. PRESSLER. But is it not true, under the Senate rules, frequently people seek such an agreement before they proceed. Our State would have absolutely nothing to say about this afterward.

I have five groups from South Dakota here. In fact, at this very moment, there are constituents waiting to see me in the Senate reception room who flew here through the State of Missouri, went to St. Louis and probably had a nice meal, and continued on their way.

But they could have flown here directly under some other circumstances.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I have been asked by the distinguished chairman if he might have the floor to address another subject. As a courtesy, I think we should accord the chairman that privilege. But I would like to meet privately with my distinguished colleague, the Senator from South Dakota, to go over what rule it is the Senator can invoke at this time that would better assure the interests of the minority groups as opposed to proceeding on the bill

Mr. PRESSLER. Perhaps my colleague would like to become a cosponsor of the amendment. We can work that out.

Mr. WARNER. No. Let us get down to serious business.

Mr. PRESSLER. We could have five members. We suggest two members from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. I understand.

Mr. PRESSLER. We could have two from Maryland, two from D.C., and five appointed by the President, or more appointed by the President.

Mr. WARNER. Let us at this time accommodate our chairman. And the Senator and I can discuss the rule of the Senate which the Senator says provides greater interest for the minorities.

Mr. DANFORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDREWS). The Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES] has the floor.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, if I can inquire of the intention of the Senator from Maryland, I would like to proceed for a few minutes on a different topic.

Mr. SARBANES. I have no objection to that.

Mr. President, is the Senator going to address the topic of the Senator from South Carolina which he discussed earlier?

Mr. DANFORTH. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. I understand the fact that at the time the Senator from South Carolina spoke he indicated he awaited the pleasure of the Senator from Missouri, and wanted to be here. To allow him time to get here, I wonder if we can put in a short quorum call.

Mr. DANFORTH. The Senator can do whatever he wants. He has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri make a unanimous-consent request that he have the floor for a limited time without the Senator from Maryland losing his possession of the floor?

Mr. DANFORTH. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, the Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, this morning while I was in my office visiting with a fairly large group of constituents, it was called to my attention that a debate was taking place on the floor of the Senate relating to the work of the Commerce Committee and responsibilities of the Commerce Committee with respect to the space shuttle disaster, the oversight of the NASA Space Program, and the Shuttle Program.

I see the Senator from Washington on the floor now. I think it is appropriate for us to set forth our analysis of the situation.

Mr. President, shortly after the shuttle disaster, President Reagan appointed a commission consisting of 13 individuals to investigate the shuttle disaster. Those 13 individuals are chaired by a former Secretary of State and U.S. Attorney General. Among the members of the Commission are two former astronauts, and a Nobel laureate in physics.

The 13-member Commission has been given 120 days to conduct its work. It is now I think something like 1 month short of its deadline. It is in the midst of conducting its investigation.

From all indications, the investigation has been very comprehensive. Indeed, it has consumed approximately, the full time of the Commission members. And they have had available to them a staff of some 20 people, including technicians.

Mr. President, Senator GORTON, who is the chairman of the Space Subcommittee of the Commerce Committee, and I are of one mind on this issue. The Space Program and the shuttle disaster in particular must receive the very careful scrutiny of the Senate, and of the Commerce Committee. We have made it clear from the beginning that it will receive that careful scrutiny. We have made it clear that the Commerce Committee will be holding hearings, a number of hearings, and hearings at length on the question of this tragedy.

There is no doubt that we have a responsibility to explore this matter in great depth. There is no doubt that we must look at the future of the program to determine among other things whether a new Orbiter or fourth Orbiter would be required, whether any additional costs should be incurred with respect to the design of the solid fuel rocket, whether there is a reasonable and realistic launch schedule, and whether NASA has felt itself under some kind of pressure to exceed a rule of reason with respect to getting these launches underway.

All of these matters must be examined by the Commerce Committee, and they will be examined in great detail, and at great length.

Mr. President, we have felt it very important that our committee not get in the hair of the Rogers Commission during its investigation. We have felt it is very important that we do not undertake what would be widely viewed as a Keystone Cop operation at the time the Rogers Commission, with its 13 members, are attempting to do their job.

Mr. President, some weeks ago Senator GORTON and I were approached by Senator HOLLINGS and Senator RIEGLE, and they wanted to have a hearing at which a Mr. McDonald, who is an employee of Morton Thiokol, and other Morton Thiokol people would be brought to Washington to meet with the committee.

We approached Mr. McDonald. He did come to Washington. And on the day that he came to Washington to have an informal meeting with the Commerce Committee, it turned out that members of the Commission, the Presidential Commission, were in Utah to interview Mr. McDonald.

Mr. President, that was an instance of the Commerce Committee getting in the hair of the Rogers Commission. That was an instance of our interference with the work of the Commission. I think that it was a mistake for us to invite Mr. McDonald to Washington at that time. But we did it in order to accommodate the Senator from South Carolina, and the Senator from Michigan. We try to be accommodating.

Mr. McDonald did come to Washington. He did come to the Commerce Committee offices in the Russell Building. He was told that there was a large crowd of press gathered outside my office where we were to meet him.

He said, "That was not my understanding. I did not understand that there was to be a public meeting. I did not understand that I was to run the gauntlet of the press. And I do not choose to testify. I will testify before the Commission next week." And I do not blame him, because what was created outside my office on that day, not by me or anything I did—we never notified the press in our office—was a carnival atmosphere.

Maybe that is the way we should conduct business here. Maybe we should have media events, call the press, and have circuses. But seven lives were involved here, the future of the program is involved, and the reputations of men and women who work for NASA and work for its contractors are involved.

It has been my judgment, and the judgment of Senator GORTON, who can speak for himself, that the professional work of the Commission should go forward without the interference of the Commerce Committee, and without a circus atmosphere being created.

We are going to have meetings. As a matter of fact, Chairman Rogers—was it last week or the week before?—came to my office and met with four members of the committee. All members of the committee were invited to that meeting. Only four showed up. He came to meet with Senator GORTON and me and with Senator RIEGLE and Senator ROCKEFELLER. He spent an hour with us, bringing us up to date on what the Commission was doing. Undoubtedly, he will be coming back.

The staff of the Commerce Committee, the majority staff, has been in touch over the last 2 weeks with the minority staff of the Commerce Committee to work out dates for hearings. The majority staff has attempted to clear dates with the minority staff. We have done that in good faith. We have suggested specific dates to the minority staff.

We have been in touch with the minority staff with respect to those kinds of issues that we should focus on in the hearings. We believe that we should focus on the future of NASA, its budgeting, its procedures. We do not believe that we should be conducting an exposé; but if other Members want to conduct an exposé, fine. Let them show up at the hearings we schedule. There is not going to be a lack of hearings.

This is a very serious matter. It involves the Space Program, which has been the pride of this country, and it involves the reputation of good men and good women who have worked on the Space Program.

I want to express my appreciation and respect for the Senator from Washington, who is the chairman of the Subcommittee on Science, Technology, and Space of the Committee on Commerce, in whose views I concur completely. I wonder if he has any comments to make at this time.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I should like to express my agreement with the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the Commerce Committee on this subject and to commend him.

I had not realized this morning that a debate over the motion to proceed to a discussion of the future of two airports located in the State of Virginia would be transmuted into a debate—or perhaps it is more accurate to say a trashing—on the part of the Senator from South Carolina of the work of the President's Commission on the space shuttle disaster. Nevertheless, it became such a debate, or, until the Senator from Missouri showed up on the floor of the Senate, a monolog on that subject.

It will be appropriate for me to begin my remarks by expressing my total and complete confidence in Secretary Rogers and in the members of the Commission who were appointed with him by the President of the United States to investigate the causes of the disaster to the space shuttle Challenger and to make recommendations arising out of their finds.

The Senator from Missouri is entirely correct that that Commission is composed of 13 distinguished Americans: a former member of a Cabinet of the United States; Nobel laureates; astronauts, both present and former; members who are highly qualified, both in character and from professional background, to engage in that investigation.

The Commission has hired a highly qualified professional staff. I do not believe that it can insult either the Senator from South Carolina or the chairman of the parent committee or this Senator to say that they are much more qualified than we are, or than the staff of the Senate Commerce Committee is, to undertake that investigation.

I have not only been pleased with the progress of the investigation; it is my conclusion that it has proceeded with more thoroughness and more rapidity than I would have expected possible at the time it was appointed.

I may point out, Mr. President, that this is not, by the remotest sense, a political or a partisan debate. The position which has been so carefully expounded by the chairman of the Commerce Committee, and in which I concur, is the position of the House full Committee on Science and Technology, which also has complete confidence in the Rogers Commission and which has also made the decision that it should not interfere in any respect with that investigation.

Secretary Rogers has been willing to speak both by telephone and in person in our offices with both the chairman of the full committee and with this member on the progress of his Commission's work, at any time, at our request.

On several occasions, we have extended those meetings to include, by invitation, all other members of the Commerce Committee. The Senator from South Carolina has flatly refused to attend any such meeting or to ask any questions.

I am particularly upset with his bringing up the hoary chestnut that there may have been some kind of interference on the part of the White House with the launch decision of the space shuttle Challenger. Had he been willing to attend meetings with Secretary Rogers, he would have learned, as the Senator from Missouri has, that Secretary Rogers and the Commission were greatly concerned with that question; that they have inquired into it, and have not found a hint—not the slightest hint—of any such interference. In fact, I believe it relatively safe to say at this point that the problem with the decision to launch the Challenger was not that any pressure or any decision was made too high in the chain of command in the administration but that it was clearly made at too low a level in the chain of command. What I have found to be shocking, what Secretary Rogers has found to be shocking, is that important considerations relating to that launch never got to the individual in NASA itself who was responsible for making the decision.

Secretary Rogers has now informed us that he hopes to have a preliminary report ready by the 18th of April, approximately halfway into the 120-day life of the Commission.

It is my view that it will be more than appropriate for the Subcommittee on Science, Technology, and Space to hear directly from Secretary Rogers and from other members of his Commission, upon the release of that report, to ask any questions which Members may have, to point out any leads which they may feel the Commission has not followed, and generally to encourage the completion of the report. To do so prior to that time, as the distinguished chairman of the Commerce Committee has said, can only interfere in the workings of a distinguished, able, and competent Commission, rather than to enhance a sober and careful investigation into what went wrong and a sober and careful set of recommendations as to how to prevent that kind of disaster in the future.

I may say, Mr. President, that while the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. RIEGLE] has in some respects, but not in all respects, supported the position of the Senator from South Carolina, by and large I have regarded his participation in this process as having been constructive.

As he pointed out himself a little earlier today on the floor, at my suggestion, he has favored me with a detailed letter recommending a course of action for the subcommittee; asking for a series of hearings relating to the work and to the responsibilities of the subcommittee and suggesting either individuals or people from particular organizations from whom it would be appropriate to hear. I found his set of suggestions to be highly constructive and to state both valid concerns and a highly valid set of questions. I am in the process of responding to them in detail, but I can state rather simply that I agree with the primary direction in which he wishes the subcommittee to focus its efforts in the future.

I suspect that the order of hearing from given individuals on given subjects may well be changed somewhat by the schedule of the Rogers Commission itself, but the general direction of the advice of the Senator from Michigan is something that I find to be constructive and to be valid.

The function of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Technology, and the function of its Subcommittee on Science, Technology, and Space is the future of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. It is up to us to determine whether or not there should be changes in the structure of that agency. It is up to us even more fundamentally to determine the future of the space program. This morning, we held the first of a set of hearings on the proposal of the President to move forward into the next generation of space travel and to develop that aerospace plan. It is very specifically our function to determine whether or not we should authorize a replacement for it.

I have not made a firm and final decision on that subject yet, though clearly, I think the evidence at this point points in that direction. We shall do precisely that.

We are not anxious to engage in a splashy media event, we are not anxious to trash the reputations of good, thoughtful, and hard-working Americans. We are anxious, we are desirous to see to it that NASA is strengthened and, to the extent that mistakes have been made, those mistakes are rectified. We intend to make recommendations to the Senate of the United States about the future of that agency in a sober, objective fashion.

I am sorry that the Senator from South Carolina, who, 2 months ago, said we should be hiring gumshoes, by which I take him to mean private detectives, to wander around the bars in Florida to see whether or not they could dig up some kind of dirt, persists in feeling that that is an appropriate course of action. I do not. The chairman of the committee does not. We have confidence in the work of the Commission. We will have a series of hearings on appropriate subjects and we will, at an appropriate time, make recommendations on the future of NASA to Members of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. HOLLINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRASSLEY). The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, let the Record show that I have only been here momentarily, about 3 minutes. I had heard that the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Missouri—after they had been in the cloakroom and been on the floor when we were here earlier today, did not come to the floor and engage in an intelligent discussion. Rather, they waited until lunchtime, when we had gone to lunch, and appeared on the floor now and directly disappeared. I take it they are in the cloakroom, and whether they appear or disappear, we shall soon learn.

Necessarily, I asked the staff exactly what the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Missouri had to say and there were three or four subjects: One, that I was trashing the Rogers Commission; two, that we were interfering with the Rogers Commission investigation; three, that they had set some hearings but we had withdrawn or refused to have the hearings; and four, I was not willing to participate with the Rogers Commission because they had had a meeting with him last week and I did not attend.

Then I got on the floor just now when the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. GORTON], who has been stonewalling this thing, used the expression in a very low voice—I could barely hear it—but he said gumshoes, that the Senator from South Carolina wanted private detectives to wander around bars in Florida.

I do not know where his imagination comes from, Mr. President. Field investigators, at the behest of this Federal Government, prey daily. They prey daily over the income accounts of the citizens of America under the income tax law; we know they prey daily with respect to the crimes and offenses that may occur with respect to drugs and other activities; they prey daily with respect to taking statements in antitrust cases. They prey daily in all the fields of the former attorney general from the State of Washington.

The Senator from Washington knows better. You do not, when you talk of field investigators, necessarily talk as though it is a social or domestic case, for private detectives to go into individual lives and find out at bars who has been seen with whom and that kind of thing. What we were talking about, and talking about it in a very meaningful way, is the need for field investigators to check into the human evidence. Today is March 20 and I still do not know the official employment record of the Rogers Commission. I would like to know how many field investigators they do have.

I did not come to the floor today to "trash" the Rogers Commission. On the contrary, we wanted to assist, particularly from this Senator's standpoint, and say let us get out there and get this case while it is hot in the context of memories being fresh and reactions as to who was there and who was not and what was said and what was not said, and put these statements on the record.

We have that regularly happening with everything else and with respect to the cost and diligence—again, referring to the physical side, we see that they have been very diligent, because everyone has come in—in the exact kind of bipartisan and nonpartisan spirit of cooperation that the Army, the Navy, the Coast Guard, the engineers, the contractors, every one. I take it, it has moved right on in without all of this dilatory nonsense that you have to hear on the floor of the U.S. Senate about not willing to participate.

When the gentleman refers to not willing to participate at a meeting last week with Secretary Rogers. I would like the record to show it was about 40 minutes before Secretary Rogers was to show in the chairman's office that I was notified. I have been to one of these office show-and-tell operations and it seems like a manifest intent on the part of the leadership of our Commerce Committee, the responsible Senators, Senator GORTON and Senator DANFORTH, to, yes, conduct a parallel hearing in the Senators' offices, where they can talk to the various officials from time to time but not bring anything out onto the public record. In that light, I have, made my position known with respect to the witness, Allen McDonald, who in one instance was very pleased and ready to talk to me the evening before and within less than 24 hours—within 18 or 17 hours—he would not talk except through a squawkbox.

I do not know what the Senators told him, what the staff told him, because they had the whole operation and the gentleman secreted for 2 or 3 hours. I am told he got here at 12 o'clock and he had the lawyers, Morton Thiokol lawyers, with him. I'm unsure what they told him—but I know now that he did not want to talk because they said so.

He was not willing to participate—and I am not willing to participate in that kind of nonsense. As I said this morning, I would rather have this investigation out in the public as we do with other investigations, every other investigation I have been involved with in the U.S. Senate. We are not the FBI, we are not the Internal Revenue Service.

We are the public's servants and agents to examine issues of public interest in the open. We have made a fetish out of putting Government in the sunshine. When I first came to the U.S. Senate, we used to have markup sessions in private. Now, with the markup sessions and the conference committees and everything else, it is a good initiative to have it on the public record. And rather than have rumors, I felt as Mr. McDonald felt; he wanted to make a public statement, I wanted to hear a public statement. I did not want to hear private testimony that would be misinterpreted; there was a need for a record so that everyone could react to and be interested and learn from it.

So the truth of the matter is, when I said I did not want to meet privately with Dr. Graham and he wanted to still meet, I said then I would meet publicly in a hearing to address his concerns. I just figured as a policy for this particular Senator that I better stick to the condition that information be exchanged in hearings. For anybody connected in this particular matter, I would be glad to meet with them publicly and hear what they had to say and know because we are not private servants; we are public servants. And that still stands. I would be glad for Secretary Rogers to come up and appear as he did once already, when he took umbrage at the fact that I wanted field investigators, investigators described as private detectives to wander around bars. You can see the lack of reasonableness on the part of the Senator from Washington referring to these investigators in that extreme fashion. That is utter nonsense. So therein I have to answer his assertion, but I do not know the exact wording—I wish I had been here—about my refusal to participate.

Today, there was a NASA authorization oversight hearing that covered just the Aeronautics budget and the Orient Express. It had nothing to do with the shuttle. It had nothing to do really with the space program. It had to do with the only area of the NASA budget not affected by the disaster and a new initiative concerning an aerospace plane or Orient Express. As for other hearings suggested by the majority, they have always said, "Well, yes, let's have hearings but . . ." And then they list all their conditions. The principal conditions were that you could not mention the accident, you could not mention the investigation or, in other words, you could not perform your duty of oversight.

That is pure and simple just exactly what has occurred to date. They are anxious to have hearings now because they know they are getting caught up in the stonewall activity. We do not have any conditions on hearings. Sometimes in the U.S. Senate we have a dispute about witnesses and whether they really add anything to the record, whether or not they are capable in the context of being expert and should be heard. There will always be some discussion with respect to witnesses called to testify. But in this particular case they are saying, we are going to have a hearing but we are not going to have a hearing. They want us to just stick to academic concerns, fiscal amounts, how much it is to fix the shuttle, how much it is for the space station, how much it is for one shuttle replacement. They want us to just physically go in and ask a few financial questions without any idea about the policy and the impact of the accident and its investigation on policy and budgetary matters.

As a fundamental question, we need to know whether the space program is a research and development program, whether it is a Government operational program, whether it is a Government commercial program, and what is the intent of the Congress and this Government toward our space program in light of the accident.

If it is, as has been indicated just within the last 10 days over on the House side, to be a commercial program, then we are immediately embroiled in the question of commercial viability. And when you get to commercial viability you get to cost benefit. And when you get to cost benefit, then you begin to cut the pattern to fit the cloth. Then you will know whether or not you have enough money and whether they are going to make enough money and whether under that kind of pressure of making the money or the program paying for itself it is a right decision at this time, looking at space as research and development.

The Senator from South Carolina looks upon the space program as a research and development program. We are still in the research stage. I am not a genius or a knowledgeable person on this particular score. I am only telling what I have heard from the best of astronauts, the best of scientists, the best of the engineers and those engaged in NASA, how they look upon it. I will ask Dr. Fletcher, if they will bring him up this afternoon and we can confirm him, "Doctor, as the administrator of NASA, do you look at the space program as presently in place as a research and development program or are we beyond the stage now of research and development and into commercialization? Are we now making the judgments more on the basis of fiscal viability and worth or the cost benefit ratio?"

So with respect to the preconditions, you bet your boots we have not agreed to have a hearing which is not a hearing. And they have been very, very secretive, in a sense sneaking around. They are the ones putting voices on the squawk box and hiding witnesses and then talking about private detectives to wander around bars. I am going to have to get private detectives to find these U.S. Senators before I get through with this thing.

Who is doing the sneaking around and setting the conditions?

So we have not refused. We have been asking, and so there will be no misunderstanding, the distinguished Senator from Michigan has laid out in black and white in a three-page letter just exactly what witnesses would be called, who we think would be worthy of calling, and at what stage of the investigation they should be called and what subject they should cover.

So we have not been nebulous or evasive or refused. On the contrary, we have had to almost spell it out like in the classroom in a school case of some kind so there will be no misunderstanding.

Now, Mr. President, the staff has told me of the word "interfere," that I had interfered with McDonald on the day that Allen McDonald came to the U.S. Capitol here in order to make his statement or testify, that I had interfered because the Rogers Commission was in Utah looking for him.

Now, let us dwell on that in a very serious manner and let me emphasize what I know here without even looking at these notes because I remember well where we were seated in the Senate Chamber that day, we being Senator DANFORTH, Senator GORTON, Senator RIEGLE, and myself, at approximately 5:15 to 5:30 on the afternoon prior to Mr. McDonald coming, the following morning, to Washington. Senator RIEGLE and I asked Senators DANFORTH and GORTON if we could get a deposition from Mr. McDonald and have him testify. As a counter to our request that we bring Mr. McDonald, Senator GORTON and Senator DANFORTH said:

> Let's see if the Commission will bring him up and have him heard in public. Won't that suffice?

So Senator GORTON left the Chamber and came back and said:

> I have just talked to Secretary Rogers and he will hear public testimony from Mr. McDonald next week. So what about that?

Well, we said we still thought we ought to get the full statement, as I related this morning, and so the invitation was extended. The invitation was extended by none other than those charging the Senator from South Carolina with interference, Senators DANFORTH and GORTON.

If there was any interference, it was not on my part. The invitation to Mr. McDonald came from Senator DANFORTH and Senator GORTON, the majority, and Mr. Allen Moore, the Director of the Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee of the U.S. Senate who made the call to Mr. McDonald inviting him to come.

Mind you me, remember this particular important fact. The important fact was that Secretary Rogers knew we were inviting Mr. McDonald to come, and he was still promising to hear him publicly. So the Commission should have known if he was to be interviewed by members of the Rogers Commission the next day in Utah. Mr. McDonald did not mention it to me later that evening. He did not feel like he was being interfered with by leaving Brigham City, UT, or wherever he was living, and coming to Washington the following morning. He came to the District of Columbia at the request and the direction of Senator DANFORTH and Senator GORTON.

The members of the Rogers Commission might have had in mind wanting to see him, but they had seen him on the previous Friday during a closed session at the cape. They had a full statement from him. That is why we were here on the floor the afternoon before discussing the appearance of that particular witness here in Washington. The Commission had already gotten a full statement from him but they were only leaking parts of it. They were not putting out the full statement.

So we were not interfering but, if there was interference, it was at the behest of Senator GORTON and Senator DANFORTH as well as ourselves to get the gentleman to come to Washington to make his full statement. I will add that at no time on the squawk box or otherwise did he indicate he was interfered with. He stuck around town until later that afternoon. I take it he was here at least until 4 o'clock or later, so he was in Washington for 4 hours, from 12 until 4 o'clock or later. He came here, my understanding is, voluntarily. He was not subpoenaed in any fashion. In fact, he asked to come and make at one place and at one time before a responsible group a full statement so everybody could hear it. It was his idea and request that it be made in public, and he did not feel like he was interfered with.

Now, there is an ailment or disease around this national Congress, particularly here in the U.S. Senate to use buzz words and rejoinders that somewhat bespeak the testy nature and cynicism of the Senators themselves. If I disagree with your statement, there is honest disagreement. We have votes up and down. There are regular opposite sides to be taken on important questions. We do not call that trashing the other Senator. And when I disagree with the Rogers Commission about not hiring field investigators, getting out into the field as thoroughly as they have gotten the physical evidence and getting as much information and evidence as they can on the human side that is not trashing the Commission. We need to know from whence the pressure came and who and how was it brought. In my opinion, the Commission has not been as diligent on that score. I disagree with the Rogers Commission. I had this in mind in the early stages. I admonished Secretary Rogers at the time.

I have served on Presidential commissions with President Hoover, under the Hoover Commission investigating the intelligence activities of this Government 30 years ago. It was cited nationally for that particular work. I served at the appointment of President Eisenhower on the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. I served at the appointment of President Kennedy on the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. I served at the appointment of President Carter on his Growth Commission. So I have been appointed from time to time to serve on Presidential commissions.

Commissions necessarily or generally speaking, I would say, are made up of important personages from over the country and they come momentarily. They all have full-time assignments, work, professions, otherwise, and so they come here on sort of a crash basis, giving up their time and their income to dedicate their services to the people of the United States and its Government.

What they do, generally speaking, they take the particular agency or entity and listen to those witnesses who are already arranged by staff to appear. Knowing that, that is why I initially engaged Secretary Rogers saying, "Mr. Secretary, let us not wait for NASA to come and give you what you want to hear. On the contrary, get some field investigators down to the Cape right now and find out some of these things for yourself. We have witnesses getting ahead of you."

For example, we had National Public Radio who went out and got those statements they reported concerning the feelings of the involved Thiokol employees and the discussions that preceded the launch.

I said:

> You are going to get behind the curve on the field investigation and you are going to end up answering all the reports in the newspapers. You are going to be investigating the investigators rather than investigating the incident itself.

So true it is, I have differed to some degree with the approach of the Commission. But that is not in anyway to trash Secretary Rogers, to trash the Commission, or to trash its members.

The Senator from Washington, making that statement, is a clever politician. He knows if we can put a Hollings reputation against the reputation of these outstanding Americans who are serving on that Commission and get the argument to be who is right or wrong or who is trashing whom, the Commission members will win out. People could care less about the Senator from South Carolina.

But, of course, the Senator from South Carolina has that responsibility to make suggestions, especially when he sees from his own hard experience in Congress, in Washington, in investigations, and in Presidential commission experience, that this is an unusual situation where unusual pressure caused the violation of a proven process. I am not running around saying trash the Commission. I am saying to the former Secretary of State, Secretary Rogers, whom I respect, "Mr. Secretary, I think you better get out there and uncover the human evidence." That is what I said at the hearing on February 18 and that is what I have continued to insist upon. I might suggest that over the 7-week period since the accident. I am more nearly right than mistaken or wrong because what has come out has not necessarily come from the Rogers Commission. For example, we now have the fact that, yes, NASA, which has not been called to testify, was trying to bring pressure on the White House to include a reference to Christa McAuliffe in the January 28 State of the Union Address.

You read NASA's suggested language and that address and make your own judgment. There is not any doubt in my mind.

We now have Mr. Phil Culbertson, who signed off on the proposed NASA language saying he had not brought any pressure. Well, the acts speak louder than his words. I think if I had signed off on this and had known this statement was getting to the White House, I would want to try to get that shuttle launched before afternoon so it could be referred to in the President's State of the Union Message.

We now have, thanks to ABC, a copy of that particular talk from the White House. They first said there were not any copies, and then when they did provide a copy, they gave an incomplete copy. We have that from the free press and ABC, the American Broadcasting Co., and we can move right on down the various statements released by other news sources that we have had from public radio and the Houston Post.

We did not know anything about the feeling of the astronauts until two stories were published by the Houston Post.

So I differ, yes, with the Rogers Commission. They seem to have heard about it the week before, again not saying anything about it, and now as a result of the free press in this country we know how Astronaut Young feels about these things and as a Senator with oversight responsibility what I ought to be looking into. This is important to me. The Rogers Commission has not given it to me. The Houston Post has given it to me. And we continue on with the particular statements and other bits of information that have come out as a result of the posture taken by this Senator that what we need is some field investigators.

I have personal friends on that Rogers Commission.

I wish I could remember the names because I only momentarily could watch them from time to time on C-SPAN when the public hearings were held. There is a distinguished gentleman from Boeing, Mr. Jutter, that asked some very, very important questions, I thought. I was waiting for some good, important questions to be asked. I remember the gentleman from Stanford, Dr. Walker. He had some very interesting questions and approaches and thoughts. He appears very capable and very outstanding. The Nobel Prize laureate, Dr. Feymann, is the one who is giving credence to the concern we had about the effect of cold temperatures on the O-rings. He has had an obvious effect and made an impression on his fellow commissioners.

We have had, as I said earlier this morning, Astronaut Dr. Sally Ride, whom I have had the pleasure of meeting and being with at hearings before. I have the greatest respect for her. I said her reaction to some of the answers were very similar to this Senator's reactions, having attended many hearings. She was not necessarily in a position at the time, however, to follow up. But the hard, followup questions need to be asked and many times they were not. But the questions and the expressions of the commissioner herself, Dr. Sally Ride, really taught me a lot. I was very interested in her reactions.

I was also interested in the manner of Astronaut Armstrong and Mr. Acheson, whom I know and have the highest respect for.

So HOLLINGS is not trying to trash any commission. That is just a red herring since they hope the news media will try to turn this into a personal fight of somebody trashing a commission that had not had a chance to really make its report.

There is only so much you can do in a certain time. If I had the responsibility that Secretary Rogers had, as I said to him at the hearing, I would have to embellish my whole effort. I would have more than a staff of 12 and a computer to look for contradictions. I would have field investigators, human computers, to investigate. If I could get me two or three good field investigators—I mentioned investigative reporters like Sam Donaldson and others—I would have me a staff. I also would have lawyers who could develop the hard followup questions so we could get to the truth. That is the whole idea. We are not trying to embarrass anyone. We are not trying to indict anybody.

I was asked in one instance about a grand jury investigator. I said, "We are not interested in crime. We are intersted in the process itself, in trying to become educated and understand exactly what went on." When you mention there is any kind of criminal liability, you immediately obscure not only the intent and the responsibility of the Congress, but the witnesses themselves immediately begin to clam up and modify the positive nature of their statements.

I also would like to respond to the comment of Senators GORTON and DANFORTH that I engaged in a monolog this morning. Yet they don't appear willing to stay on the floor this afternoon and engage in an intelligent discussion. How do you avoid a monolog? That is just the way they have got the catch-22 on the Rogers Commission. I can have a hearing if I find fault with the Rogers Commission. But I cannot find fault with the Rogers Commission because I cannot find. The Rogers Commission will not tell us anything.

Well, trying to do that, they want to have a little quiet session, but they will not tell the Senators and the American public, so I have to stand as a Senator without that information. Then we are on the floor, and they pass through and walk into the cloakroom. They do not want to engage in the discussion on this matter. They want to allege that I am engaged in a monolog. They are not even on the floor.

So we are not trashing any commission or interfering with its investigation. We are not refusing to schedule hearings or refusing to participate. And certainly, we do not have anything in mind about private detectives wandering around bars in Florida.

I would like field investigators to go where National Public Radio went and get those same statements. We have subpoena powers in the U.S. Senate. The Rogers Commission does not. If there are any reluctant witnesses, because you have some previous statements given, you can subpoena those witnesses and then have them give their depositions or statements to the staff investigating for you. You can then arrange the hearings in accordance with the particular statements on a subject to be covered in a coherent fashion. But I would like to have someone out at Brigham City, UT and someone down at the Cape. I would like to have someone to look into the statements made by witnesses that we have heard. For example, I would like a statement from Mr. Mulloy on the important question of pressure. I want him to answer my questions and not read a prepared statement as he did before the Rogers Commission. I saw that with my own eyes on TV.

I know, in a regular court of law, that you would not be allowed to read your answers. It immediately struck me that here the witness was very glib in coming forth and had all kinds of statements to be made, but when you got down to the key one, he had a lawyer's statement written out for him to repeat. That bothered me. Yes, I watched that kind of activity before in my own experience. So I would get really a full deposition from that gentleman and find out who he had seen, who he had talked to and why, and let him respond to why he had to give a written answer to the important question before the Rogers Commission.

So these are the kinds of things that we need to bring out. I am sorry that Senators DANFORTH and GORTON want to prove their point that I gave a monolog by abandoning me on the floor and not talking with the Senator here. They can continue to stonewall, but I can tell you here and now we are going to get an investigation. They cannot avoid us.

As Joe Louis said, "They can run, but they can't hide." The American people do not want political or partisan activity on this score. They want thoroughness. And we get pretty thorough when we have the adversary proceedings here in the U.S. Senate, a majority and minority, and we take our positions. I, obviously, have not reacted as a minority member, but, rather, as a Senator dedicated to the Space Program.

I started, as Governor of South Carolina 25 years ago, the nuclear space commission in my State. I have seen the early liftoffs and launches. We have had the astronauts come in. We have been very proud of Charlie Duke and Charles Bolden, the astronaut from Columbia. And, of course the distinguished, as any could possibly be, Ron McNair.

Ron McNair, the astronaut lost on this particular shuttle flight, was from Lake City, SC. Just a few months ago, last year, he gave a talk for the Senator from South Carolina, this spokesman, in Spartanburg at the Spartanburg High School. He was a volunteer in the sense of trying to inspire. He would go around in his particular area, in the Sixth District of South Carolina, into the public schools, on his own, and tell the students of the opportunity and the challenge, of the hard work and everything else, and how he got ahead. He was the finest example any of us had ever seen. As bespeaks of that, the city of Lake City had dedicated its main street as Ron McNair Boulevard. This was done before his loss during Mission 51-L. That was significant for a black citizen to have a main street in a small, rural town of South Carolina, named after him. So we were very much interested in the Space Program and continue our interest in the program and we are participating in the various activities of the Space Program.

For example, in May of this year, the city of Columbia, SC, will celebrate its 200th anniversary. So great is the interest that we have in South Carolina in this program and of this particular Senator is best evidenced by the fact that we had revolved the bicentennial celebration around the Civilian Space Program. Out at McIntyre Field we were going to try to get a capsule and other space materials. Actually, we had from NASA headquarters the commitment on an appearance by Christa McAuliffe. Yes, Christa McAuliffe, the first teacher in space, was coming to Columbia, SC, in May of this year for the bicentennial.

So this Senator has been interested and his State has been interested in the Space Program and we continue that interest in a very serious and a nonpartisan way.

Referring to another comment made on the floor today. Senator DANFORTH indicated that if I had attended the Senate session with Secretary Rogers last week, I would know there was no White House pressure. What he failed to indicate was that during this session. Mr. Rogers indicated he was considering requesting White House phone logs. The Rogers Commission is still investigating whether or not there was pressure to launch, and this is what we should be doing. How could I have learned from Secretary Rogers last week that there was no White House pressure? I would not be a competent Senator to bring the distinguished Chairman of the Commission in before he himself had investigated the White House, before he had looked at the logs himself, before he had talked to the individuals involved, and before he identified the required information as I did in the communication I sent to the White House this morning asking for those logs. I do not think I could intelligently conclude that there is pressure or is not pressure. I do not know. We have been careful to say so.

But we have been careful also to point out that there is circumstantial evidence, as we call it in a law case. There is direct evidence that you get from a witness, perhaps in many cases an eye witness, or "I saw," and "Yes, he killed the man," or he did this, he did that, or he brought pressure. Yes; I do not expect every witness to come forward in this particular investigation and say, "Yes; I am the one that brought the pressure to cause them to violate the process." I do not expect that. I do not expect that, of course, of Secretary Rogers. Nevertheless, Senator DANFORTH said if I had been there last week with Secretary Rogers, he would readily give me the answer that there was no pressure to be brought.

So we are looking into the impartiality, and the mechanisms of this Commission. We are going to make that a requirement. I now know they are using certain individuals in this investigation that under the Rogers rule of independent investigation should not be involved.

We will have to look into that if the distinguished Senator from Missouri is going to put me to the task of investigating the Rogers Commission. I did not want to do that. I just wanted a complementary investigation as Senator RIEGLE pointed out this morning. I do not want to duplicate, to waste time, to waste effort in an all-important measure of this kind. But to do this I must know what the Commission is doing. In that manner, we could make an intelligent decision about the issues we need to discuss at our hearings.

On yesterday afternoon, your U.S. Senate Budget Committee, in a bipartisan vote, voted out a budget. In that budget there is a provision for the space effort. The provision in there is a pure guess. We cannot know. We are trying to decide on a figure. We had to sort of guess and ruminate in our minds, yes, there would be less launches this year. So there would be some saving of money. Let us not run overboard with that idea because the scientists, the engineers, the talent, and the personnel that you really need in the space agency have got to be kept on even without the launches. We have to keep these research programs going. Some will be used in an alternative fashion with what we call the expendable launch vehicles. We are going to try to pick up and play catchup ball on that score. So, yes, we will save money, but not all of the money that some of the Members think.

We also want to know what the cost is of repair and replacement. There was a $500 million figure, there was a $350 million figure, but we have not been able to get into that cost at all in any particular hearing. We just had to guess at that. We had to fence an amount of $2.7 billion for a new orbiter and to make the necessary engineering fixes to get the shuttle back in flight.

I say fencing because we had to agree as gentlemen that we could not spend anything until it was authorized. We could not authorize until we could conduct hearings, and we could not conduct hearings until Chairman DANFORTH and Subcommittee Chairman GORTON, who are stonewalling, stop the stonewalling and let us get on with the business and the work at hand.

So these amounts had to be included in the budget resolution in a conditional fashion. In that budget where you see the real problem, you are not looking for other problems, other stories, or whatever it is.

I am frustrated. I am dismayed this afternoon to come back to the floor to hear that the Senator from South Carolina was accused of interferring with the Rogers Commission when Mr. McDonald came here at the invitation of Senators GORTON and DANFORTH. I am dismayed to learn that I had refused hearings when I had been asking for them, putting them down in black and white without conditions, and they do not want to mention those conditions. I am dismayed to learn I was not willing to participate—when I have been participating. The difference is I want to participate in the investigation and not participate in their stonewall. They are right. I am not going to participate in that stonewall. And lastly, I am dismayed about comments that I was "hashing" the Commission.

How we love words in the U.S. Senate. When I got up here, the first thing that hit me was the word "dichotomy." You do not have to have an argument. You have a dichotomy with the other Senator. Then nothing is ever stabilized. The only thing constant about change is change itself. But here in the U.S. Senate everything is destabilized, like something is stabilized. If you do not like a thing, it is destabilized. Last year a new word surfaced, "egregious." If anything was wrong, it was egregious. I had to keep looking that word up. Now if you disagree with a Senator on the approach on a particular issue, you just do not vote yes or no. You trash them.

We were before the Budget Committee last week. I had presented an alternative budget and laid it out. The President's budget was then placed on the table and we put it to a vote. It was voted down 16 to 6. But all along, the proponents were for the budget. They said they we are trying to trash President Reagan's budget, to trash him. Ask the Republicans on the Senate Budget Committee that voted against the President's Budget whether they are trying to trash their own President. I think not, and equally I do not think the Democrats were trying to trash President Reagan. He missed the mark by $16.1 billion of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Everybody knows that. Having missed the mark that much and asked for an inordinate increase for defense without paying for it, with no revenues, there was no way we could pass a budget of that kind. Sure enough, on the House side it was voted down by a vote of something like 312 to 12. Thereupon, again, many withheld their vote because to even vote on the President's budget was to trash the President.

We have come to a sad state of affairs when the President puts an initiative and you call it to be voted upon, and then they run off like children crying, oh, you are trashing the President. The President is supposed to put a budget up here. I guess we are supposed to bow, genuflect, and say what a wonderful magnificent thing it is, and if you have any words of opposition, just remember you are going to be painted into a corner as some demagog trashing the President.

Now comes that same political strategy that goes good on a 10-second bite on evening TV, saying we are trashing the Rogers Commission. We are saying, Mr. Rogers, get on the job and get just as astute on the human side, over at NASA headquarters, over there at the White House, at the Pentagon, and right here in the Congress and get the facts on where did the unusual pressure come from.

Why were Mr. Hardy and Mr. Mulloy so intent and adamant on this particular score? Why did the other gentleman, Aldrich, down at the Cape say, "I thought an objection was just a concern?" You do not talk that way. If you are at an airport, think on this a minute, if the lay public has any interest at all, what we have is one of the most serious, one of the most dangerous, and one of the most venturesome matters that we have ever experienced in space flight, and particularly the shuttle launches.

A parallel in my mind would be, for example, a security officer at an airport. Let us assume, and paraphrase practically what happened on the morning of January 28, at the Cape.

Let us assume, you are a security officer and I come with a weapon and you stop me at the airport. On the monitor, my supervisor at Huntsville sees you stopping me but says, "What are you trying to do?" "I am appalled."

I have come with a weapon and you have stopped me, but the supervisor on the monitor at Huntsville says, "I am appalled. That man doesn't look like a terrorist."

Another supervisor says: "What's the matter there, airport security? When do you want me to take off or fly this plane? Next April?"

That, in context, is basically what happened to Allen McDonald, who was the security officer for Thiokol at the Cape.

Thereupon, when you, as security officer, refuse to pass me through with that weapon, they then said: "Ah, we're going to get you. We'll show you this is not really a security matter.

This is a personnel or management decision."

So they at 11:45 in the evening, they get written permission overruling you to permit me to board the plane. Thereafter, the next morning, even though written recommendation for launch has been had, which, if you read it closely, is one of these lawyer statements with all the misgivings in it to protect themselves, they say: "It's still not safe. Why don't we wait until it becomes safe later today?" They say, "No, we're going ahead."

In addition, we have another security checkpoint. I come through there with a weapon, or another person comes through with a weapon, and that security checkpoint says, "No, you have to stop." The particular supervisor sees you on the TV and says, "Let him on through." Afterwards, the supervisor says he thought the guard was expressing a concern rather than an objection.

Airport security is no place for split decisions or engineering arguments or safety arguments, and certainly launchtime is no place for split decisions on safety.

On the contrary, it was hardly split, because Boisjoly, who was the witness up at Brigham City that night, with 12 other engineers, said there was not one positive pro-launch statement in that room.

So they go ahead over the two contractors and launch in this instance, pass me through security into the airport.

That is the kind of factual situation that we have with the shuttle tragedy and that is what worries this particular Senator and why he wants to fulfill his responsibility and conduct hearings on the shuttle tragedy.

Mr. President, I am delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from New York.

(Mr. D'AMATO's statement appears later in the RECORD.)

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I would like to refer to the Washington Metropolitan airport system, National and Dulles Airports. I shall go to one important point I do not believe we covered very thoroughly. That is the matter of the Federal Aviation Administration's airport and airways trust fund. There is a unique kind of provision and approach in this particular fund.

First, you have to go to the fundamental law. When we asked Secretary Dole and the authorities at FAA why they do not just take money from the trust fund, they said it was against the law. It could be, from a reading, that they are correct. It is a doubtful question because it is a circuitous or oblique fashion that it comes to be the law—specifically the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1982. In section 503 under subsection 21, the money is going to sponsors.

It says:

Sponsors mean: (a) any public agency which either individually or jointly with one or more public agencies submits to the Secretary in accordance with this title an application for financial assistance and any private owner of a public use airport who submits to the Secretary in accordance with this title an application for financial assistance for such airport.

Then you go to the previous section or stipulation entitled "Public Agency" and see how that is alleged to be.

Public agency means a State or any agency of a State, a municipality or other political subdivision of a State, a tax-supported organization, or an Indian tribe or Pueblo.

Looking down those things, we are not necessarily an Indian tribe or Pueblo. We are not a State or an agency of a State or municipality. We are not a political subdivision of a State.

Then we look under tax-supported organization and, knowing of the deficit and the debt, I doubt if we could describe the Federal Government as a tax-supported organization, or at least the Federal Aviation Administration and the Department of Transportation do not describe the Federal Government as a tax-supported organization. I do not know what else supports it. I would allege it to be. But they seem to think that they are not a tax-supported organization. Under that provision, the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration is not permitted to make any grants to either National or Dulles.

Now, you can see what I am going to get at later on, which is how do we get the money to the particular airport, comply with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and at the same time not have to have an offsetting reduction. If we can put in a particular measure later on to describe the Metropolitan Washington airports as public airports, I am confident then, with a sense-of-the-Senate resolution, we would get some moneys to these particular airports. You would not have to pass an appropriations bill because it is sitting over there making interest on the investments.

Right now there is a proposal in the particular measure at hand by Senators TRIBLE and WARNER to the effect "the Metropolitan Washington airports shall qualify as a 'public airport' under the terms of the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1982, shall be eligible for Federal assistance on the same basis as any comparable public airport operated by a regional authority, and shall be considered to have accepted a grant on the date of transfer."

So they do not want to do it. They say they cannot do it. They recommend though in that particular provision exactly what the Senator from South Carolina has been requesting since early last year when we first started discussing this particular problem.

Now, when the FAA master plan for the two airports identifies almost $1 billion in capital needs, why not change this law and use the trust fund moneys? Other airports get the moneys.

I was curious to know how much money had been allocated for airport development just last year, in 1985. We do not have a bit of trouble with the Federal Government supporting local airports. We supported the local airport in Kahalui, Hawaii, to the tune of $24.3 million. The Department of Transportation and Secretary Dole did not give them any legalistic runaround or Miami any runaround. They gave them hard dollars, $23.1 million to Miami. They are local airports. Houston, $23.1 million to Houston. Atlanta, $18.5 million to Atlanta. There is Allanta. It got $100 million when Jimmy Carter left. There is another $18.5 million there. Let us give $118 to National, the people's airport, or $118 to Dulles. Either one of those airports are just as big in size and operation as the Hartsfield terminal and facilities in Atlanta, GA. You would have the $250 million on an equal basis.

In fact, talking about on an equal basis, I am not going to write a civil right, but I am going to sure talk of the equal rights of the airports. And when they say that these airports can get the moneys but the public cannot, then I think it is discrimination and under the due process clause we are being denied the grants. Maybe we ought to bring a legal case against the Secretary to make her award the money and not give me that legal excuse. I would ask the staff to look into that particular proceeding. Everybody is suing everybody in this land. We are the most litigious society ever, and since everybody seems to say you have to sue in order to get anything done, maybe we ought to start suing and quit trying to pass laws up here.

Los Angeles, they did not have any trouble, $16.5 million; John F. Kennedy Airport in New York, the old Idlewild, $16.3 million; Newark Airport, $12.6 million. This was all just last year. They had a busy session over there granting money. This is the Santa Claus group in Government. I heard about UDAG and Social Security and Pentagon giving grants hither, thither, and yon. I had forgotten about this one. This is a better one right under my nose, and I have not been paying enough attention to it. Fort Lauderdale, $11.7 million; St. Louis, $11.1 million; and Phoenix, $11.1 million.

That was the total grant program just to the cities I have listed. I am confident there are many, many more. In fact, total obligations reached

$939.6 million—$1 billion right there. A billion dollars a year, and as Senator Everett Dirksen said: "A billion here, a billion there; before long that runs into real money."

Well, you see, the users, the individual users are discriminated against because, as a user of the Atlanta Airport, I am allowed to participate in an $18.5 million grant. I had to go through there just week before last. They canceled a flight to Charlotte, NC. I was lucky to catch something to Atlanta and get there late but at least we got there the same day. So at Atlanta, as a passenger, as a citizen of the United States under the due process clause, I am able to experience the benefits of the Federal Aviation Administration, but I am discriminated against and not allowed due process when I go through National Airport.

Now, there is a Government dedicated to e pluribus unum, equal justice under the law. The users of all airports have created a $7.7 billion balance in the trust fund. I have, as a Member of the U.S. Senate, put in a good 15-year contribution to the two biggest airports belonging to all the people of the United States but I am denied the benefits under this particular law, which I think is unconstitutional. Under current law, they describe "public airports as being only State-owned or municipal-owned airports.

And you know, Mr. President, when we asked about that, can you imagine Federal authorities saying that would be a conflict of interest. They get on a highhill of ethics and they say to receive money and to give it out for the public of the United States of America is a conflict of interest. I can see the interest but I cannot see the conflict.

Where in the Lord's world do they get these officials to come up to Washington? I do not know where they find them. They are ingenious. Here I am, I have a public responsibility for the Federal Aviation Administration to administer the airport and airways trust fund for O'Hare, the other airports around—I guess Midway could get some money under this one, but not at Washington National and Dulles. Why? Go over and ask them. They will tell you because it is a conflict of interest. They get the money from the users of the airports; they actually use the money from the user. It is a conflict of interest, since they are the ones to receive the money, to also pay it out to National and Dulles. It is not a conflict of interest to give it out at Atlanta airport and to the other airports around, in Houston and all these others, Miami, Los Angeles, Newark, Fort Lauderdale, Phoenix, all around the country. It is all right to give it to those particular airports, but to give to the people's airport is a conflict. I can see the interest in it. I am interested in it. I can see what is supposed to be, under their oath of office, an interest. I would think in order to do this they would take an oath to go ahead and do this and get the funds out to the airport. But they say no, since they get the money, they cannot pay it out. They do get the money but they do not pay it out. Interesting, is it not.

I never heard of such a thing in my life.

Now, Mr. President, it is really not a conflict of interest since they are the ones who are showing no interest at all. It makes absolutely no sense.

We have had a need for renovating these two airports for numerous years, but they will not come up and they will not even ask for the money. They will not even put in a recommendation. They can immediately describe it as an eligible request for airport funds. But they cannot recommend, as they are doing here through the Secretary of Transportation, a provision of law so that they can receive public moneys from the airport and airways trust fund to improve Dulles and to improve National Airport.

I have not been able to understand the particular goings on about this measure.

I agree very positively with our colleague from the State of Maryland that it is premature to present this particular measure for debate. What we have, in essence, is a fix. They have gone around and have gotten all the votes. They worked a year in order to get them. There has been a general disinterest. People have more important things, such as the Contra vote. They have more important things, such as the deficits and the budget, various things we have to respond to.

The airports are not coming apart. They are being operated. Everyone says the operation is, generally speaking, efficient. We need improvements. We need additional parking facilities at National. We need infield facilities at Dulles.

At National Airport, just let it rain or have a little bit of snow on a Friday afternoon and your best bet is to try Baltimore.

I know from hard experience.

At National, people get in and out of the cars and the way that traffic is configured coming in from all over the cities, they just run into a big, honest traffic jam. Then you sit there by the hour and hope they are holding the plane or the flight is running late, whatever it is. When you get up there, hours late, you find your flight is gone and there is not another connection. You are liable to spend an extra day and miss your appointments.

So if we have that kind of weather, instead of turning right where Washington National Airport can be reached in 15 minutes, turn left and reach Baltimore in about 40 minutes. It is much more reliable.

We need parking facilities and improvements at Washington National. We have needed them for quite some time. But the Secretary of Transportation, who is so astute to go around asking Senators in their offices for their votes, and she is hard to deny when she appears, has yet to ask the President of the United States for any kind of funds to do the job. She says the only way to have it done is through some kind of political authority whereby we are going to have to really respond to the nuances and thoughts of the State of Virginia, Richmond.

In spite of these needs, Secretary Dole has requested only $7 million in the last 2 years for capital development of the two airports. Are we to assume that, given the capital needs of these two airports, that this amount is adequate? Obviously not, Mr. President. Those figures merely reflect another attempt by the administration to forgo its responsibilities in favor of spinning them off to others.

Because the President has not stated or asked for the money to make these improvements, Congress had not thought about the needs of National and Dulles and they have not recognized those needs. Those who have recognized them have been reluctant to ask for the money.

As President Reagan, the Secretary of Transportation is a bright and resourceful individual. She knew that by underfunding the capital accounts for these airports there could be no alternative for Congress but to approve her plan to spin these airports off a local authority without money. She and everyone else could then point out the mess out there and say, "See, there is simply nothing we in the Federal Government can do to solve the problem."

I will only add here the previous reference made, it is because there is a conflict of interests.

But, Mr. President, I am here to challenge our distinguished Secretary of Transportation on that notion. We are told that the only solution is the sale of these airports to a local authority, an act which is really a giveaway of valuable Federal assets. This legislation calls for the sale of both airports for a mere $47 million—$47 million to be repaid over the next 35 years. This is hardly a windfall for the U.S. Treasury.

It is not like we are talking about expensive long-term liabilities to the Federal Government. The airports themselves are making money. Last year, the two airports generated over $10 million in surplus revenues returned to the general revenue fund. The year before it was $17 millon.

On that particular score, we can just allow a little measure. If you wanted to see some response to responsibility, rather than taking the profits made from us who are paying our way to go through, let the two facilities, through the Federal Aviation Administrators, retain these funds rather than returning them to the general revenue fund so we can finance Mrs. Marcos in dresses and shoes in the Philippines under the Foreign Assistance Act. Rather, let us give it to the users of Washington National Airport and Dulles. They can take that money and immediately, with that kind of revenue coming in each year, easily launch the improved facilities that are so badly needed.

During this time of fiscal austerity, when we are on a collision course and must decide the future funding of our national defense, health care research, and a multitude of other programs critical to our national welfare, we are being asked to give away for a pittance two valuable airports.

A mere $47 million clearly pales in comparison with the valuation estimates other impartial experts have made.

The Grace Commission, which was appointed by the President to save our Government money, valued the two airports at more than $300 million.

Just that $300 million amount brings to mind the replacement value. We all know that you could not replace those airports for $150 million apiece at all. It would take $300 million apiece right now, and more. You have anywhere from $600 million to $1 billion, as evidenced by the letter from the National Taxpayers Union. You have 1 billion dollars' worth of property being given away for $47 million, and that is the airports. That is not just the reconstruction of those runways, the hangars, and terminal facilities. But, rather, the 10,000 acres for development, highly profitable development land, in the State of Virginia around Dulles, and the 60 million dollars' worth of access highways to be thrown in to boot.

This valuation by the Grace Commission has made the Holton Commission figure of $47 million actually look ridiculous. Even the cautious General Accounting Office testified last year that after reviewing the Department of Transportation's accounting records, it found that the Department of Transportation had undervalued the airports by some $61 million. GAO said that using DOT valuation techniques, which it did not endorse, the sale price even under the Department of Transportation's own valuation systems and approach was $108 million.

The Governor of Maryland, of course, as we referred earlier, realized this was a good deal when he saw one, so he offered to double the asking price to $94 million, and nobody would take it. They just will not treat a serious offer made in a serious fashion. But he would be delighted to get that. We could at least get $47 million more. But no one gave serious consideration to Governor Hughes' proposal.

During the Commerce Committee consideration of this legislation, the supporters of the sale argued that it was impractical to consider increasing the price tag. They even said that to finance the sale "could so burden the new authority that it could not afford to undertake in a timely manner the substantial improvements, a major justification of the transfer proposal."

Now, I do not know how they could not finance the sale that would so burden a new authority. I just do not understand that rationale at all, particularly when we have an authority and we have a responsibility to finance the Government right now with the money in its pocket. They are saying, because they have no interest, it is a conflict of interest.

Let me ask my colleagues today, if this is the case, why are we even considering this legislation? If these airports cannot compete on the open market, if their value cannot be used for fear of making airlines landing fees too high to attract service, then why are we taking time to consider selling them?

Mr. President, not only are we giving these airports away, but in the years to come, under this bill, taxpayers, air travelers, and the U.S. Government will end up tremendous losers, and the Congressional Budget Office bears me out on this.

For example, the FAA officials have told me that a modest amount of work, which would begin to turn these airports around, could be done for $250 million. By "modest," they mean the construction of a new midfield terminal at Dulles and the renovation of terminal space, parking, and access roads at National. It would not include money for the purchase of additional land or the construction of a new runway at Dulles. It is based simply on what is needed to allow these airports to operate at peak performance.

To obtain this money, the new authority would be empowered to issue tax-exempt bonds, but bonds cost a great deal of money; that is, additional funds have to be generated to cover the net interest during construction, the debt service reserve, and issuance costs.

As a Governor, I handled hundreds of millions of dollars in Government bonds. I know they take a great deal of time to issue. They take a lot of lawyers. They take opinions and, in many instances, in any kind of case charged, questions might be asked to review the legal procedures, and the petition before the court, the finding by the court. And even though the finding is agreed with, in order to make the bond salable, they thereupon appeal it on up and you carry it all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court. So, at the time of issuance, you go and say, "Here are my bonds and don't ask for legal opinions. The Supreme Court has already ruled on them." Now, that is the best way to get the highest rating and the highest returns on the issuance of bonds. That particular procdure is looked upon as salutary and desirable.

I asked the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office to undertake the analysis of the cost of the bonds. The Congressional Budget Office found that, in order to generate the $250 million needed to accomplish the development at the airports, the new authority would have to issue $346.2 million in bonds. That is almost $100 million, Mr. President, in extra costs that would not build 1 square foot of terminal space, nor would it create one additional parking space.

And who is going to pay for the extra costs? Well, the average person who will use these airports over the next 30 years. These are the same people who have already contributed to the aviation trust fund through the 8-percent ticket tax that is now being collected on flights in and out of these airports. But, because of the position by the Department of Transportation on a conflict of interest, it is not being spent on their development.

And, as an individual citizen who is in a position to sue because I have experienced damage, in that I cannot receive the benefit that other users and payers of that particular tax pay into the fund because I am traveling through a Federal airport and I am not getting the equal protection of the laws under the Constitution. I am denied those benefits. So I am paying my money out and I am told by the Department of Transportation, "Just keep on paying, but don't expect any more benefits because we are not going to give it to you. We are going to make you pay all over again by running this through an authority and make you pay all over for the next 30 years."

Because bonds are now tax exempt, they have not gotten into—they got into municipal bonds and put that bond market in panic, but they did not get into the airport bonds yesterday in that Finance Committee—they end up costing the U.S. Treasury, because the bonds are tax exempt, some $366.3 million in lost Federal revenues.

Now, you talk about waste. How many toilet seats—I wish somebody who is a good arithmetic student would just divide the $600 into the $366.3 million in lost Federal revenues. I have heard Senators run all around the floor talking about Cap Weinberger's $600 tiolet seats. Look at how many that would be just lost revenues under this authority—$366.3 million in waste. We do not talk about the waste that occurs on the floor of the U.S.

Senate, but I am told fairly reliably that you could buy 610,000 toilet seats.

Now, think on that for a while, what we could get under here if we just go ahead and use the other $250 million if that is in the pot—excuse me.

We have it over there already and why not spend the $250 million? It is allocated for that use. It is in the trust fund. Instead, under this wishful procedure of the Secretary of Transportation we are going to lose for the taxpayer $366.3 million in Federal revenues.

Mr. President, let me emphasize what this means. The new authority will have to issue $346.2 million in bonds. When you add the $346.2 million to the lost revenues of $366.3 million, it will cost the taxpayers $712.5 million to get $250 million in construction.

So let us subtract the $250 million from the $712.5 million and we get $462.5 million.

This legislation should be entitled "The $462.5 million waste, fraud, and abuse bill." That is exactly what it is. There is no other way to describe it.

When Senators are running around talking about trashing, let us talk figures. Here is $462.6 million that I can save by just using the present trust fund for the people's airport. It would not be going to Charleston, SC. It would not be going to Richmond, VA. It would not be going off into some Senator's hometown. On the contrary, it would be going to all the people of the United States—Dulles and National Airports.

And, instead of doing that, we want to spend $462.5 million and just waste it. And who does it go to? It goes to lawyers and politicians.

Now, you know I do not resent politicians getting money, but I sure hate to give any more to lawyers—$462.5 million. Your can see all the lawyers that they will hire there and the PR people and everything else like that. They will go in with some program. Of course, they will charge it to the users of the airport.

You can land in downtown Tokyo, and the next thing you are going to see is an ad, "Develop your plant at Dulles." I do not know how you say that in Japanese. I will try tomorrow before we have a vote to learn how to say that in Japanese, but "Come to Dulles." And everybody bring your plant there because we have a lot of fat, free land that if you put an industry there, that is what we want. We can create jobs, and we can all get reelected because we have had a giveaway of 10,000 acres. We are willing to scatter plants hither, thither, and yon. And after all we have already exported the jobs of the United States of America enough. I am going to get into that subject as we proceed on this particular debate.

But I will be glad at this time now to hear from the Senator from Maryland who has given a lot of thought and effort. There is no Senator more dedicated and serious in purpose of doing a responsible job than Senator SARBANES from Maryland. He has worked hard on this. I cannot help but feel some comfort in not only bringing in the cost feature in the giveaway, but to my colleagues also. But I am working in tandem with the leadership of Senator SARBANES. I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I appreciate the kind words of my able colleague from South Carolina.

Mr. President, I want to address again—because I did not have an opportunity to complete my discussion of it earlier—the question of noise, and control over noise that would exist in this Airports Authority.

As I indicated earlier, a late-starting amendment put the authority to deal with noise in the Airports Authority. The bill as originally submitted provided that the nighttime noise limitation standards currently set out in the Federal regulations may not be amended. That was stricken by the committee.

As originally referred to the Commerce Committee, the bill would have transferred the nighttime noise standards to the new Authority stipulating that the rule cannot be locally amended during the 35-year lease term. During committee markup, an amendment was offered establishing the existing standard as a noise ceiling but permitting the new Authority to frame a more stringent noise standard; in other words, to place greater restraint upon it.

That amendment in the end was not acted upon, and in the final development of this matter an amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, the junior Senator from Virginia, was adopted in a 4-minute meeting of the committee on the 14th of November, which may or may not have had a quorum present.

It is an interesting question which in effect transferred the power to set the standard to the new Airports Authority, but with total flexibility with regard to that standard. In other words, they were not to be held at least to the existing standard but were in fact given the discretion, or the latitude, to have a looser standard—in other words, more noise, many more flights well beyond the curfew hours.

This amendment was adopted 2 months after the bill was reported from the committee. And the reason it is of such concern is because the noise problem associated with Washington National Airport has been a very serious one. As a matter of fact I had worked in concert with Virginia Members of the Congress to try to address it.

Now this amendment places the authority to promulgate this ruling and set the standard completely in this Airport Authority dominated by Virginia—5 of the 11 members. Maryland has two.

The decisions that the Authority makes on flight path, on hours, on the directions in which planes take off and land have a major impact on the noise pattern that people experience, and the hours that planes operate.

Mr. TRIBLE. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. SARBANES. Surely.

Mr. TRIBLE. That is not the right or prerogative of the Authority. That is the power retained by the FAA. The Senator's premise is simply incorrect.

Mr. SARBANES. What authority is it then that has been transferred by the Trible amendment on noise? What was it that was transferred?

Mr. TRIBLE. The question of routing of airplanes——

Mr. SARBANES. How about the curfew, the 10 p.m. to 7 a.m. curfew that now exists and that was put in after a great deal of difficulty? Would the Airport Authority under this bill have the power to ignore that curfew?

Mr. TRIBLE. The amendment simply gives the Authority some operational flexibility and if changes are made must be de minimis in character and do not in any real or substantial way affect the noise in the region.

Mr. SARBANES. How does the Senator reach that conclusion in light of the language? Is the Senator telling me that this Authority could not abandon the curfew?

Mr. TRIBLE. The first point that I want to make in response to the Senator is that several times during the course of this debate the Senator has incorrectly said that the Authority has the right to direct airplanes, and determine their line of flight. Then he goes on to argue that this Authority which he believes is too heavily weighted in the direction of Virginia is going to impose more noise on Maryland.

That is simply incorrect. The Authority does not have that power. That power resides with the FAA.

Mr. SARBANES. What authority, then, did the Senator give to this airport group on pages 38 and 39 of the bill?

Mr. TRIBLE. The power that was given the Authority deals with the nighttime noise rule for National Airport.

Mr. SARBANES. Am I correct that the Authority can now do whatever it pleases?

Mr. TRIBLE. No. That would not be a correct reading of the amendment.

By this amendment, and by the colloquy in the committee between Senator GORE and me, it is very clear that the Authority cannot do whatever it pleases. But this amendment does give the Authority some operational flexibility in view of new technologies, quieter aircraft, to make operational decisions. But the committee was very clear and very explicit that those decisions could not, in any substantial or meaningful way, increase the level of noise in the Metropolitan Washington area.

Mr. SARBANES. I hear what the Senator is saying, but that is not what the bill reads. The powers of this Authority are not determined by the statements that the Senator makes. The powers are determined by the legislation which Congress may enact.

The bill that was submitted to you in the beginning contained a provision that the nighttime noise limitation standards currently set out at 14 CFR 159-40 may not be amended.

In deference to the work of the Holton Commission—and of course I disagree with a number of their recommendations—in this instance they did try to protect what had been achieved with respect to inundating the people along the Potomac flyway with noise. So they had that provision in the bill submitted to the committee. You took it out, and there is no restraint of that sort.

Given that, and given the language at pages 38 and 39, I do not see how you can conclude anything other than that the Authority has the power to make these changes. Where is the limitation? Where is the restraint?

Mr. TRIBLE. First of all, the practical effect of this does give the Authority operational power to adjust, in an insubstantial way, the nighttime noise rule. The practical effect of that would be that a regional authority, including Virginians and Marylanders, and citizens of the District of Columbia who are genuinely concerned about the noise, could well make the rules stricter, and that would probably be the result if changes were made.

Mr. SARBANES. Of making it stricter?

Mr. TRIBLE. That there are new technologies and that this airport ought to be able to accommodate new aircraft in a manner that offers some flexibility to management, as long as the noise burden on the metropolitan area is not enhanced.

Mr. SARBANES. The bill does not say that, I say to the Senator. The bill does not contain a provision that says the Authority has the power to change the noise regulation as long as the consequence of changing it is to diminish noise.

Mr. TRIBLE. Well, let me read to the Senator the language that was agreed upon by Senators GORE, LONG, TRIBLE, and other members of the committee—after a long discussion about noise, the impact of noise on the metropolitan area, and the concern we all have that the noise burden on the citizens of the metropolitan area is not to be increased.

The committee notes that noise—

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator inform me from where he is reading?

Mr. TRIBLE. I am reading from the Metropolitan Washington Airports Transfer Act of 1985, the committee report, and I am reading from page 14.

The committee notes that noise at National, and particularly noise between 10 p.m. and 7 a.m., has been a controversial and divisive issue. In transferring responsibility for the nighttime noise standards—at National to the Authority, the Committee expects that the Authority would waive the existing standard to allow aircraft operations above the standard only in limited circumstances and only when proposed operations exceed the existing standard by a minimal amount. In such cases, the Committee expects the Authority to seek compensating reductions in noise created by other operations of the carrier seeking a waiver, so that the overall impact of noise is not increased.

That is what is transferred, not the right and authority to say how planes land and take off, I say parenthetically.

Mr. SARBANES. I say to the Senator that, first of all, that is extraordinarily loose language, if you are trying to control this noise problem. Second, in any event, it is only language in the committee report and it is not language in the bill. This is merely the committee expectation, and the expectation itself is wide open, really. In effect, it concedes that the Authority could waive the existing standard to allow aircraft operations above the standard. It concedes that. It does say that it should be only in limited circumstances, but it concedes that power, to begin with, to the Authority.

I think it is clear from the statute that this Authority has now the power—given the amendment that you added 2 months later, after the markup—to do as it pleases. There is some committee report language here. As I say, I do not find that very restrictive; and even if it were restrictive, it is still not in the bill. It does not legally bind the Authority.

This Authority, if it once gets going, is going to have a life of its own. The governing document is going to be this law. If you go to court with it, this is what the court will look at—the provision of S. 1017.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may respond to his statements?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield.

Mr. TRIBLE. This Senator shares the concern expressed by the Senator from Maryland and that of our constituents about noise. Noise in the metropolitan area is indivisible. It affects us all. No one has worked harder during his public life to restrain the noise that affects us all than I have.

Mr. SARBANES. Why would the Senator, then, support a proposition that would allow noise higher than the existing standard?

I want to leave aside the other point the Senator made, which is that if you can work out some arrangement whereby you have actually diminished the amount of noise, maybe you need some flexibility to change the regulation. Of course, you could write that into the law. But this language, itself, concedes that you would allow aircraft operations above the standard.

Why would the Senator support noise above the standard that many of us have worked so hard to get in place in response to the problem that the constituents on both sides of the Potomac, in Maryland and Virginia, have felt and have been impacted by?

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may answer his question?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield.

Mr. TRIBLE. First of all, let me say that it was my view, and that of a majority of the members of the committee—Republicans and Democrats alike—that this airport authority ought not be placed in a straightjacket. It was our belief that this airport authority should have basically the same rights and powers that other airports exercise, day in and day out, to provide quality service to the traveling public. To that end, this amendment merely transfers to the new Authority the same responsibility for regulating nighttime noise as all other airports have, as all other airports in the Nation exercise.

Let me go beyond that.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield right at that point? Because I think that was a very straightforward statement by the Senator and it has a rationale.

In other words, he is saying, "Look, other airport authorities in the country can set the standards for noise; they can run their airport all night long if they want to run their airport all night long, and I think this authority ought to be able to run its airport all night long if it decides to do that."

Mr. TRIBLE. I disagree with that, Mr. President.

Mr. SARBANES. Well, I disagree with that. I think we fought too hard to get a standard controlling noise to come along now and say, "Well, this airport authority ought to be like any other airport authority and ought to be able, if it chooses to, to exceed the noise standard which was finally put into place."

This noise standard should have been held onto and the Senator's amendment did not do that.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield.

Mr. TRIBLE. Let the Senator from Virginia complete his answer and I shall be happy to engage the Senator from Maryland in further colloquy.

The point simply is that this airport authority ought not to be placed in a straitjacket; it ought to be granted basic operational flexibility. To that end, this amendment does transfer to the new authority the responsibility to regulate nighttime flights. That is a part of the overall noise equation, but only one aspect of it.

Because the committee was concerned about the burden of noise on the citizens of the metropolitan area, the committee was very clear in the language of this bill to set forth our view that although this authority should have some operational flexibility, decisions ought not to be made that would in any real way expand or increase the noise in our area.

Now, it is my view, quite frankly, that if one understands how regional airports work, one would view this as a primary means of reducing noise, not expanding it, because this airport authority will be composed of people who live in the Washington metropolitan area. That, indeed, is a requirement of this law. These are people who deal with airplane flights every day of their lives—as travelers, yes, but also as residents who are concerned about noise.

That airport authority is simply not going to take action that in any way is going to add to the noise burden in this community. It simply will not occur. I think the Senator is raising a red herring here in advancing that proposition.

Moreover, I simply point out that decisions affecting the flight patterns of aircraft—whether they fly over Virginia or Maryland, whether they fly down the Potomac River—will not be made as the Senator has suggested, by the Airports Authority; rather, they will be made by the FAA. That is a continuing responsibility of the Federal Aviation Administration.

Mr. President, I think this amendment makes sense. In no way do I believe that it will add to the burden of noise in the Washington Metropolitan Area. It is for that reason that I supported it with the majority of the members of the committee.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, let me read the minority views of the Committee on Commerce with respect to this amendment on nighttime noise restrictions at National Airport because, in my view, it is clear that the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, in effect, makes it possible to impose a greater noise burden on the people who live along the Potomac. The flight patterns in there, because of the configuration of the airport and the river, impact heavier on Maryland than they do on Virginia. So, in any event, even if the flight patterns are kept as they are, an increase in the traffic is going to have a disproportionate impact on Maryland.

What the Senator has done here is open up a loophole through which the airlines can fly, the consequence to be paid by the person under the flight pattern who is disturbed by this noise.

The minority on this amendment—this is the amendment on nighttime noise restrictions at National Airport put forward by the Senator from Virginia—said the following:

> The provision giving the new airport commission power to revise the nighttime noise restrictions at National was added by the Committee as an amendment to S. 1017 a full 2 months after the bill was originally ordered reported. It will most certainly result in the eventual easing of those restrictions and an increase in late night flights into Washington's principal airport.
> Why is this amendment needed in the first place? Current FAA regulations specify that all flights in and out of National after 10 pm and before 7 am are restricted by noise levels. The original approach endorsed by supporters of S. 1017 was to freeze these rules in place for the 35-year duration of the lease. Then the same people who claimed that the Holton Commission had worked out every detail of the bill, turned around and wanted to amend it. Since no one has proposed an earlier curfew at National, we can only conclude that the reason for giving the local authority this power is to pave the way for more late night flights.
> Originally, the Committee agreed to try to resolve this issue on the Senate floor. However, supporters of the bill panicked at the thought of 100 Senators, many of whom live in National's flight path, having the opportunity to debate this issue and discovering the truth about it. That's why the decision was made to schedule a second markup and add the amendment at the Committee level, thereby hoping to bury it from view.
> This amendment is simply another reason why this bill should be defeated. And it should alert others in the Senate who are suspicious about the effect this legislation will have on air service in Washington.

I submit, Mr. President, that if you were really desirous of protecting the people against noise but wanted to give the authority the flexibility to protect them even more—in other words, to have a more stringent standard—that could easily have been written. That is not what was done in this amendment and, as the Senator from Virginia himself has admitted, his premise was that this authority should have the full range of power just like any other airport authority. What that means is, once it has that range of authority—and that is exactly what it is given by this bill—it can move in either direction. And as the minority views say, it will most certainly result in the eventual easing of those restrictions and an increase in late-night flights into Washington's principal airport.

Later, as they point out, since no one has proposed an earlier curfew at National, we can only conclude that the reason for giving the local authority this power is to pave the way for more late-night flights.

When it happens, if it happens, and I am working assiduously to see that it does not, and the people along that flight path are disturbed by noise that transcends these curfew restraints, the genesis of that problem will be the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

It does not answer this point to say that it was desirous to give them flexibility to have a tightened standard because you could have required the existing standard and then provided flexibility for a tigher standard. That is not what was done. The existing standard has been abandoned despite years of efforts by Members of Congress, by citizen groups, improvement associations, individual citizens impacted by this noise, both in Mary nd and in Virginia; years of effort t get that standard, and the standard is out the window. And the authority has the power to do less or to do more. But as the minorty report says, "No one has proposed an earlier curfew at National. We can only conclude that the reason for giving the local authority this power is to pave the way for more late night flights"—something that will be highly sought after by the carriers and by the Airports Authority.

Think of the premium you can place on that. Think of the economic impact of that.

Now, the Senator says, well, the members of this authority are going to live in the Washington metropolitan area, and, therefore, they will personally be sensitive to this problem.

The bill does, in fact, say in talking about the membership of the authority that they shall reside within the Washington standard metropolitan statistical area, except that the member appointed by the President shall not be required to reside in that area.

I simply point out to the Senator that the size of the Washington metropolitan statistical area compared to the size of the flight path in and out of National Airport is comparing a large magnitude with a very tiny area.

First of all, even if they lived there, we would not know that they would be upset, but the chances are very high that they will not live in that flight path. Only a very limited portion of the metropolitan area's population is in that flight path and impacted.

So what the Senator's amendment has done is really reopen the noise issue and I would think that all of the citizen groups that have been so concerned about this matter in the past, the individuals who have been almost driven out of their homes in some instances, would recognize a very important protection that was finally achieved for them is now being lost.

One other point, Mr. President: I have been looking at Virginia's enabling legislation to create this regional airport authority to acquire Washington National Airport and Washington Dulles International Airport from the Federal Government. I take it, as I understand it from the Senator, the authority would have power to promulgate rules and regulations, including a rule and regulation on noise; is that correct?

Mr. TRIBLE. The authority would have the right to determine the hours of operation.

Mr. SARBANES. And it could adopt a rule or regulation in that regard.

Mr. TRIBLE. It could, as we discussed, exercise some flexibility in terms of hours of operation but consistent with the language of the report it could only do so if there was not an additional burden of noise placed on the community.

Mr. SARBANES. The report does not say that. The report allows even that to happen in certain limited instances.

Mr. TRIBLE. I read the report. Let the report speak for itself. I think it clearly suggests that noise ought not to be increased on the community.

(Mr. EVANS assumed the chair.)

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, just to quote that language:

In transferring the responsibility for the nighttime noise standards at National to the authority, the committee expects that the authority would waive the existing standard to allow aircraft operations above the standard only in limited circumstances and only when proposed operations exceed the existing standard by a minimum amount. In such cases, the committee expects the authority to seek compensating reductions in noise created by other operations of the carrier seeking a waiver, so that the overall impact of noise is not increased.

But that does not say that you cannot extend into the curfew period. You could, in fact, compensate by reducing in noncurfew period hours so that the overall impact is not increased. I think that is a problem even with this language, but as I pointed out this language is not in the bill and as far as the bill is concerned the authority has complete freedom to act as it chooses.

Furthermore, you know, we have talked about this authority being dominated by Virginia. I want to read something from the enabling legislation. Suppose the authority wanted to change a rule or regulation. Suppose the authority said, well, we want to allow flights until midnight. We do not think 10 o'clock is right. We are going to allow them until midnight. People want to come into Washington and that is true from all over the country. There will be no difficulty filling the slots. So suppose the authority said we want to extend it until midnight.

They have, according to this, the authority. I am reading now from the Virginia legislation:

The authority shall have the power to adopt, amend, and repeal rules and regulations pertaining to the use, maintenance, and operation of its facilities. Unless the authority shall by unanimous vote of all members present determine that an emergency exists, the authority shall, prior to the adoption of any rule or regulation—make such rule or regulation in convenient form available for public inspection in the office of the authority for at least 10 days.

I do not know where the office is going to be, but I assume it is going to be at one or the other of these airports. The Senator may know. I do not know.

Then:

(B) Publish a notice in a newspaper or newspapers of general circulation in the political subdivision where the authority facilities are located, declaring the authority's intention to consider adopting such a rule and informing the public that the authority will hold a public hearing—

Et cetera, et cetera.

I take it this means that a Marylander who lives in the flight path who wants to be aware as to whether the airport authority is going to allow flights to come in until midnight would have to check in the office of the authority or have to subscribe to a newspaper or newspapers of general circulation in the political subdivision where the authority's facilities are located.

We have talked about the composition of this authority being one-sided, with 5 of its 11 members from Virginia. Now we find that the procedures being put into place are one-sided; that in fact the authority will proceed as though it is simply a Virginia corporation. Not even the residents of the District of Columbia, let alone the residents of Maryland, are in a position to obtain notice about what the authority proposes to do on a whole range of matters. These are all the rules and regulations. I am just citing them with respect to this curfew problem at night and the noise problem. But the residents of the District of Columbia or Maryland, must go over to the authority's office about every week—because you have 10 days after posting, so you have to continually make that check—or peruse carefully a newspaper of general circulation in the political subdivision of where the authority's facilities are located. It is not even the metropolitan area.

This is some piece of work. It is not even the metropolitan area. You can have this authority, located at one of the airports, put it in a local paper of general circulation, in one of the Virginia subdivisions, and everyone else impacted by this can be oblivious to what is happening.

I do not think there is a much clearer illustration of the consquences of this weighted authority than this rules and regulations provision contained in the acts of the Virginia General Assembly providing for this regional airport authority. There is not even a pretense, there is not even a pretense, that this is going to operate in some metropolitan areawide fashion. Here we are, I assume the authority's offices are going to be in Virginia. One assumes that they are going to be at one or the other airport. And the notice for changes in the rules and regulations—it may affect you on noise, it may affect you on some other important item—is going to be made public in a paper in the political subdivision where the authority's facilities are located.

Now, Mr. President, that is only one of the things that you discover upon working through this legislation. One really needs to study what is before us, that is, S. 1017. That, after all, is the governing legislation. The committee report language may or may not be helpful. I think the committee language the Senator cited on airport noise is wide open in any event, as I indicated, I do not think it is helpful. I think it is in a sense a kind of cover for the fact that what is really being done allows an extension of the curfew hours and therefore raises the very real specter of a significant increase in the noise problem at Washington National Airport. As the minority views say,

It will certainly result in the eventual easing of those restrictions and an increase in late-night flights into Washington's principal airport.

But there are other comparable provisions in this legislation, and I want to take a moment to discuss them. In the findings of fact it is asserted that—an operating authority with representation from local jurisdictions will improve communications with local officials and concerned residents regarding noise at the Metropolitan Washington Airports.

As I have just pointed out, that is the assertion which is made, and then you turn around and find out that they can promulgate rules and regulations affecting noise at the airport and they do not have to be published in Maryland or the District of Columbia. They are posted in the office of the authority and they are published in a county newspaper. Actually, it might even be a city newspaper since it says "general circulation in the political subdivision where the authority's facilities are located."

So you could really get this thing down to just a tiny population that was in the normal course of events going to have notice.

Now, I spoke yesterday about the cross-subsidy aspect of this bill which allows the revenues at National to be used to under-write expenses or costs at Dulles.

It is interesting to note that the bill refers to the two airports as "a unit." It does that first in the purposes section where they are authorized to be transferred "as a unit, including access highways." That is that $60 million highway built at Federal expense. The highway and the two airports and all of their assets are being turned over for $47 million. But it says, "* * * including access highways and other related facilities," without any definition of what those might be.

Then further on in the bill it provides for "the operation, maintenance, protection, promotion, and development of the Metropolitan Washington Airports as a unit."

So the concern which has been expressed about a cross-subsidy potential is obviously there. It is throughout this bill.

I focused yesterday on the financial part of it, but I am citing these provisions simply to show the framework in which this authority is being put forward, just like I cited the Virginia statute to show that this authority is being treated like a Virginia corporation. It is going to make rules there. No one outside of the immediate locale in Virginia is going to be aware of them. And now we see the two airports explicitly referred to here as functioning as a unit—"promotion and development of the Metropolitan Washington Airports as a unit."

It is interesting, Mr. President, that while Maryland, Virginia, and D.C. were all provided membership on the Airports Authority, five for Virginia, three for D.C., and two for Maryland, that the agency to be created, the Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority, was to be created by the Commonwealth of Virginia and the District of Columbia. Now it all sort of comes clear. You have this tripartite membership in the agency itself to be created only by the Commonwealth of Virginia and the District of Columbia. It fits hand in glove with the point I have just made about promulgation of rules and regulations.

We talked yesterday about the lease payments provided in section 5. It never tells you how much is to be paid. It talks about an imputed interest rate. It does not tell you what it is to be, although I understand 4.9 percent. Not a bad interest rate.

In any event, it is clear. I have had a number of colleagues today come up, in effect, and say to me that this thing is just being given away at a bargain basement price. That is absolutely the case.

The 35-year lease leaves it open as to what happens afterwards. In fact, the statute says that the real and personal property turned over to the Airports Authority shall be used for airport purposes during the period of the lease.

I take it once the lease is over with, all bets are off, and that, in fact, anything and everything could be done with this property. That seems to be the message, since there is another provision that says the facilities shall be available to the public on fair and reasonable terms and without discrimination. But that provision is limited to 35 years.

After 35 years you can discriminate. You can charge unfair and unreasonable terms. Or you can even go further and cease to use the real and personal property for airport purposes.

Having gotten these facilities at this incredible bargain price—it is not even a bargain. It is closer to—well, I do not want to use any invidious terms about it. It is a handout. I understand why my colleague is trying to run all the way to the bank with this provision. Imagine, two airports—10,000 acres at Dulles, the access road, which cost $60 million to build, and Washington National Airport, which makes a profit of close to $20 million a year—for $47 million.

Having given it away to the Airports Authority, the provisions of S. 1017 then provide that if the Federal Government wants to put in facilities for air traffic control and navigation, and weather reporting and communication activities—in other words, Federal Government involvement with air traffic control and navigation, weather reporting and communications activities, all of which, I take it, are essential to the operations of the airport, but we are giving this airport away—S. 1017 says if the Federal Government wants to do that it has to do it at Federal expense.

I think you should have shown some mercy, I say to my distinguished colleague from Virginia. I mean, at some point it is so egregious that even the perpetrator perpetrating the situation should say, "I just cannot bring myself to do this." We are giving this thing away.

Then you provide in here that the Airports Authority has to provide areas of land or water or rights and buildings for these purposes. In other words, they have to, in effect, make some land or space in a building available. But you then go on and say including construction at Federal expense of additional space or facilities.

Is there no shame?

Let me go on. That is only part of it. Listen to this section, which continues right along:

> In addition, all airport facilities shall be available to the United States for use by Government aircraft in common with other aircraft at all times without charge.

Well, that sounds pretty good. If I read that and it said, "In addition, all airport facilities shall be available to the United States for use by Government aircraft in common with other aircraft at all times without charge," I would say, "Well, that is what they ought to do. These were Federal airports and they were transferred at virtually no cost. It is a small thing but at least they are going to allow these airport facilities to be available to the United States for use by Government aircraft in common with other aircraft at all times without charge." But there is not a period there. That is not the end of the provision.

What the provision says is:

> Except if the use by Government aircraft is substantial, a charge may be made for a reasonable share proportional to such use of the cost of providing, operating and maintaining the facilities used.

So if you really make any use of it, you have got to pay for it. If you come out here to our airport and the Federal Government wants to put in air traffic control and navigation facilities or weather reporting and communication activities related to air traffic control, the airport has to give you the space, but the Federal Government has got to pay for the construction of additional space or facilities.

You take over these huge facilities, virtually no cost, then you come along with the temerity to put in section 8(a)(2) on pages 37 and 38.

It would have seemed to me that someone in the Virginia hierarchy would have said: "This is really too much. I mean, just how far should we push this thing?" Why should not the U.S. Government aircraft be able to use these facilities without a charge? That is a cost that has never been factored into the disposal of these airports.

Mr. President, there are some important employee protection provisions in here, but I see that they are limited to a 2-year period. I really just want to raise the warning flag about that because it is not at all clear from the provisions here what is going to happen to the employees after—after—the 2-year period. There are a lot of fairly detailed provisions here for employee protection during the 2-year period and there is nothing that says what happens after the 2-year period has transpired.

Now, we have had very dedicated employees at National and Dulles and I think they have done an outstanding job, often under difficult circumstances. And this issue here really is not to do with them. I think they serve the country well and we are all anxious to ensure their continued service and to make sure that the future they had projected for themselves is not in any way altered. That was discussed in the Commission and I took a very strong view in that regard. I am disturbed to see that the legislation now before us appears to limit these protections to a 2-year period, at least many of them or most of them.

And, of course, the question that raises is: What will happen, what might happen, what is it possible can happen? Because one never knows. I will not accept these assertions: "Well, it will never happen." If the authority is there, it may happen.

The Senator from Virginia says: "The authority will never raise the noise ceiling." Well, if they have the power to raise it, they might raise it. And the same thing here with this 2-year period. At the end of the 2-year period, it appears that these employees are really left without many of the protections that are contained in this legislation.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, could I interrupt the Senator for a question?

Mr. SARBANES. I would be happy to respond to the Senator.

Mr. EXON. I would advise my friend from Maryland that I share some of the concerns that he has shared and I would very much appreciate the opportunity of making some comments in a slightly different vein about the matter before us. I am not sure of what the parliamentary position is right now. Could the Senator yield to me without losing his right to the floor or would he prefer that I seek the floor in my own right?

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I yield the floor and the Senator can be recognized.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Maryland for his courtesy and consideration. I recognize that another good friend of mine, the junior Senator from Virginia, is on the floor who has been a main mover of the legislation that an attempt is being made to at least bring up on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

I have considered this matter beforehand. As a member of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, and as a ranking member on the Aviation Subcommittee thereof, this came up before our committee. At that time, this Senator had some concerns, not about the motives of the two Senators from the State of Virginia who have been very upfront about this matter—I think that they are attempting to be constructive in their approach. If I were a Senator from the State of Virginia, I would be doing exactly what the Senators from Virginia are doing, led primarily by my colleague, the junior Senator from Virginia, who is on the floor, in trying to work out a rather difficult situation.

I think we all know and recognize and realize that some improvements are obviously necessary at Washington National Airport. I also believe that, right or wrong, the Federal Government put in a lot of money years ago, before I came here, to build Dulles International Airport. And certainly during the intervening time, Dulles has been a considerable disappointment because it did not draw off the amount of air traffic in and out of Washington, DC, as had been anticipated.

I think we can all remember that Dulles International was supposed to become the main air terminal in this area in cooperation with and sometimes in competition with the Baltimore International Airport. But that did not come to pass for many obvious reasons.

I think it is now clear, and the commitment has been made, that there is no plan to close down Washington National Airport. In fact, the contrary claim is made that if we ever get this legislation up and if it ever becomes law, there would be significant improvements made in Washington National Airport with regard to parking and with regard to the facilities that are, at best, minimum out there. And so I think that the idea of improving that airport without taxpayer assistance is a good one.

And then I guess to further this thought, and the idea sprung up somewhere that would it not be a fine thing if we just put Dulles and Washington National in together in an airport authority? And then probably by design or as an afterthought these people decided why do we not bring Baltimore International in with this also? So we would have three major airports under one combined jurisdiction. Under that combined jurisdiction, they could do very many things. They could certainly float tax-free bonds to make these improvements.

So I guess out of some kind of a scenario as this Senator just outlined or some variation thereof, was formed the legislation that in my opinion unfortunately was reported out to the floor of the Senate by the Senate Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee.

I felt at that time—I feel today more strongly than I did then because I have some additional information—that certainly the airports, Washington National and Dulles International would be improved by the action that was taken here. In addition thereto, the airports would be better than they are right now. I do not think there is any question about that.

The downside of some of this that has been brought up by others, not this Senator, and by additional information that I have received is that at a time of extreme budget crunch when indeed we are looking for the sale, Mr. President, of some of the assets of the Federal Government to try to raise some money to reduce the staggering deficit and skyrocketing national debt, this is not a time when we should be disposing of an asset of the Federal Government for less than it is worth.

I have seen some rather staggering figures on that. I do not know how authentic they are. But I submit, Mr. President, that I think even the most fundamental look at the figures involved would have to say that Uncle Sam is not doing very well if he feels he needs some additional money at this time to reduce the deficit, and help balance the national debt.

I think most of us would agree this is a bargain basement price sale that is going to benefit the airports, may benefit, and probably would benefit the passengers who come in and out of these airports. But I also suggest that if I were a resident of the State of Virginia I would think it is a pretty good deal because in addition to the airport facilities I am getting a great deal of adjacent land primarily at Dulles International Airport that is some of the prime land in the whole general area that we refer to as the Washington, DC, area. I think that land is going to appreciate much further and much faster than it has.

I do not say that is wrong. I wish we could get more land and more of these arrangements where the Government could get out of private industry. But that brings me, Mr. President, to the overall key objection that I have to this piece of legislation, and a key objection that I think has received very little consideration by the other Members of this body.

And, that is this is not just Washington National, a District of Columbia general airport, this is not just Dulles International Airport, and this is just not the Baltimore International Airport. What we are doing here is creating an airport authority that has the authority, I suggest, to do about anything they want in the future. This is my main concern.

This is what I brought up in the Commerce Committee. I offered an amendment, Mr. President, to try to correct that. That amendment simply was that I was not as much concerned about the interests of Baltimore or Maryland or the interests of Virginia and how much they were going to benefit from this or, for that matter, Washington National Airport.

What I was most concerned about was that—especially Washington National and to a lesser extent Dulles International—those two airports have been run and financed by the Federal Government primarily for the reason that this is the National Capital of the United States of America. And citizens all across this great country of ours have a keen interest on coming to and from their Nation's Capital to see us in action here in the Senate, to see the House of Representatives in their deliberation, to see their National Capitol, this great Capitol, this great historic shrine that we have the privilege of serving in, to view and see all of the taxpayer-financed facilities that we have in this town on everything from the museums to the historic monuments to the great history that is part and parcel and wrapped up in this area more than any other area of our great Nation.

What I am saying, Mr. President, is that the flight arrangements in and out of Washington, DC, and the Washington, DC, area are of interest and above the interests of any other airport in the United States of America as far as American citizens are concerned. As a result of that, Mr. President, I felt that if this proposed sale was to go through, I suggested to the members of the Commerce Committee—in fact, I was prepared, Mr. President, to support this measure as it came out of the Commerce Committee if an amendment that I offered would be accepted which, in effect, Mr. President, would provide a balance of representation on the controlling commission between Maryland, the District of Columbia, and the State of Virginia with an add-on of additional appointees, I emphasize, than provided in a measure to be appointed by the President of the United States.

I went down as far, Mr. President, as fashioning balanced representation as I viewed it by having an arrangement that citizens from the rest of the United States that would represent all of the other citizens of the United States who come to and leave their Nation's Capital would have representatives on that board, and, if those representatives from outside this area appointed by the President of the United States to represent everybody else in the country, they in conjunction with the members of the State of Maryland have an objection to what happened or does not happen under the authority that we are suggesting be granted to this commission, they could block it because it would take a majority to do otherwise.

I did not see anything wrong with that proposal. I thought it was a worthy suggestion. It was immediately brushed aside by the main supporters of this bill. The argument was given, well, after all, it would not be fair. You would not like it if the citizens of Virginia had something to say about the operation of the airport in Omaha, NE. That is hardly the point, Mr. President. What we are doing here, in this measure, I say, is to not only make a grand and magnificent gift to the State of Virginia, but we are also saying we want to turn over the control of this area as far as incoming flights are concerned and where those flights are going to go, and at what time. We are giving away a taxpayer-financed, very valuable piece of property—or properties. We are going to turn it over to a board that is basically dominated by the representatives of the State of Virginia.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. EXON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. TRIBLE. The authority would not have that power.

Mr. EXON. Would not have what power?

Mr. TRIBLE. The power to decide on flights come and go and where they would go. It would not be a power that would reside with the authority. The authority is granted other powers that airports routinely have, but that is not one of them. Just as the FAA continues to hold power to decide questions of safety.

I know that the Senator has many concerns, and he has enumerated them today and during the committee hearings, and I respect my colleague's opinions. But I just want to put him at ease in terms of his concern that this authority would in some way be able to say no on particular flights or decide where they go. That is not a power of this authority.

Mr. EXON. I ask my friend from Virginia if, as a result of this bill, this commission would have any say-so whatsoever about the time that airplanes could land or take off from the airports under their control.

Mr. TRIBLE. There is a nighttime noise restriction; and, as the Senator from Maryland and I discussed earlier, this bill would give a measure of flexibility to the authority to adjust that. But I was speaking in response to what I understood to be the Senator's concern that this authority would in some way interfere with the ability of his constituents to come here or in some way decide that flights ought not come here or go to Nebraska or some other point in our country. Those decisions would not be made by this authority.

Mr. EXON. I thank the Senator from Virginia for his explanation.

My main point was that since this involves the Washington National Airport, and from that standpoint it is a national airport, I have never been able to understand the objection of some to a broader base authority that would have more input, more decisionmaking, based upon the views of people around this Nation who see the Washington, DC, area—not Virginia and not Maryland—but see the Washington, DC, area as their area, their Nation's Capital.

I would think that the basic fundamentals to which I speak have been very clearly outlined by the founders of this country when they carved out a piece of this great land and said: "This will be the District of Columbia. This will be our Nation's city." Changes have been made with regard to the administration of our Nation's city. We will not go over that.

What I am saying is that if I were a Senator from a State other than Virginia and Maryland, anywhere else in the United States, I would think that I would be best representing my citizens if I insisted upon some representation on the board that controls the Washington, DC, area, the national city of the United States, so to speak—if I had some representation and input on whatever the decisions were.

Certainly, I think we can agree, without getting into all the details, that if we are going to have an airport authority or commission—or call it what you will in this measure—they will have to make some decisions along the way; and the decisions they make primarily affect not only the local area—very importantly the local area—but also the citizens of the Nation as a whole.

Therefore, Mr. President, I thought that the suggestion I made, which was turned aside, that we had better balance this with having the President appoint more individuals, was a good idea. I simply say that if these airports in or near the Nation's Capital are not of concern to the rest of the people of the United States, why is there a provision that at least some members of that board be appointed by the President of the United States? I think it is quite obvious that even the people who originally designed this legislation thought there should be some input.

What I am saying is that I think we are about to make a mistake, if this bill ever becomes law—and I suspect that eventually, one way or another, it might be—that we have not made provisions for broader input, advice, and decisionmaking for the rest of the people of the United States, outside of the District of Comumbia, State of Maryland, and the State of Virginia, for this important facility.

From that standpoint, Mr. President, I am not directly involving my self in the discussion and interesting debate that is being provided here by the Senators from the two States I have just mentioned. Suffice it to say that I still feel that whatever we do with this piece of legislation, it should be broadened, at a minimum, to provide more members appointed by the President of the United States, to better represent the citizens of these United States and not the parochial interests—and there are some—of the citizens of Virginia, the citizens of Washington, DC, and the citizens of Maryland.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I simply want to say, while the very able Senator from Nebraska is still on the floor, that he is right; there are many dimensions to this legislation before us, and various Members have focused on different aspects.

One of them is that, given that these are the two national airports, who should run them? That issue has been raised. It is a legitimate issue. Elizabeth Dole, when she gave her charge to the commission chaired by the former Governor of Virginia, precluded examining the question of whether the Federal Government should continue to run them. She said they must be given out. That was the point she made.

Second, if you are going to give them out, at what price? That has been focused on a lot. There is the issue, of course, of the terms on which you give it out and how that interrelates with who runs an airport that serves the Metropolitan Washington area. It is my view that the Federal interests have not been adequately protected in this legislation, that the facilities are being turned over at fire sale prices or worse.

Third, from the point of view of Maryland, we are being put into an utterly unfair and inequitable situtation, which I hope Members will understand. One of the objectives of the Federal Government when it is dealing with States should be to try to preserve some equity. We are not being unreasonable about this thing, but we think the terms we are confronted with are utterly unreasonable. We have been making that point to the Membership. It is in part for that reason that we have been fighting. But a lot of very important questions have been raised.

The able Senator from South Dakota earlier alluded to the fact that these airports were important to his constituents because they are the gateway to the Nation's Capital; that if his constituents wanted to come to see him, this is the way they came in order to do the Government's business. Therefore, the future of the airports was much more than simply a legal question. I recognize that, and I think that is absolutely correct.

I know that the Senator from Nebraska was very effective in the committee in the consideration of this leislation. I particularly noted the views he wrote on lifting the nighttime noise restrictions at the airport, which can only lead in one direction, and that is that the people who live in the flight paths are going to be subjected to much more noise. As the Senator said in his report:

> Since no one has proposed an earlier curfew at National, we can only conclude that the reason for giving the local authority this power is to pave the way for more late night flights.

I thank the Senator very much for his contribution to this important debate.

Mr. TRIBLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the comments of the junior Senators from Maryland, South Carolina, and Nebraska, and I thank them for their contribution. Let me say that Senator HOLLINGS and I disagree on this legislation. But I do share the concerns he expressed in a "Dear Colleague" letter that he circulated a number of months ago. I want to quote from Senator HOLLINGS' "Dear Colleague" letter.

> Very simply, National Airport is falling apart. The road system and parking are inadequate—access to the Metrorail system is difficult and the terminals are cramped. At Dulles, a proposed midfield terminal is needed to accommodate increased airline service. Because of the importance of these airports in ensuring access to the Nation's Capital and the Federal Government, we must move to repair and develop these assets.

On that, Senator HOLLINGS and I absolutely agree. That is an all-important reason to support this legislation.

Funds from the Federal Government are not available, Mr. President. They simply are not available. Perhaps that statement was debatable when this legislation was reported from the Commerce Committee back on November 20. Some argued then, as some still persist in arguing, that the Federal Government could pay for these desperately needed improvements. But that argument is obviously moot today. Subsequent to the appearance of Senate bill 1017 on the calendar, Congress enacted Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, which commits us to a massive deficit reduction program over the next 5 years. As a result, there will be no—no—Federal money for improvements at Dulles or National.

Let me put this very plainly: Any Senator concerned about his or her constituents traveling to Washington by air will find them experiencing growing difficulty, delay, and inconvenience. There is no Federal money to improve these airports. If we fail to transfer the air gateways to our Nation's Capital, they will become the bane of air travelers everywhere. Only transfer of Dulles and National to a regional authority will permit the planning and the bonding necessary to enhance these important airports.

At National, a new authority can easily solve the now intractable problems. Adequate parking facilities, a redesigned road system can alleviate traffic congestion. The metro can be made more accessible. The terminal can be refurbished to provide at least a modicum of convenience for air travelers.

At Dulles, construction of badly needed midfield terminals could begin, the parking problem solved, and Dulles be able to accommodate the anticipated traffic growth.

But the key to providing better facilities, the key to better service for all of our citizens is the raising of the substantial dollars necessary to enhance these facilities.

The Federal Government, in spite of all that we have heard today, cannot do that. We all know that. Only a local authority can raise those dollars and take appropriate action.

Let us address briefly some of the points that have been raised in opposition to this measure. Opponents of the bill claim the airports are being given away and they are not happy with the purchase price. The properties at Washington National and Dulles would be priceless if—and I repeat if—they could be put to their highest use. But they cannot. They must be used as nonprofit airports to serve the public. The bottom line in their operations is not profit, but public service.

Under the terms of this legislation, the new authority——

Mr. EXON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TRIBLE. I shall be happy to yield for a question.

Mr. EXON. I have been listening to the distinguished Senator from Virginia, my good and able friend. We have worked together on many, many things.

I think that I indicated to him and to others that I was prepared at one time to buy the arguments, many of them legitimate, that he has just made. I know there is a problem. The way that he is suggesting that they be solved is one way to solve them.

May I ask the Senator from Virginia, given all that, given his concern for my constituents coming in to see me—which I am sure he is concerned about——

Mr. TRIBLE. I certainly do not want to discourage the Senator's constituents from coming to Washington. We want to have more and more of the good citizens of Nebraska coming to this great metropolitan area.

Mr. EXON. Yes; because they bring money with them and I can understand that that is good for the area.

But, given all those things, why is it that the sponsors of this measure fundamentally turn their backs on what I still believe is a reasonable proposition of getting better balance on that commission by having the President appoint from outside this area the members of the commission that would run the airport? What is wrong with that?

Mr. TRIBLE. The practical problem with that suggestion is that this compromise is a very carefully crafted political agreement. If we are going to change fundamental provisions at this point, then we defeat the proposition.

I understand that many of my colleagues would like to do that in spite of what they say. I do not suggest that that is the Senator's purpose, because I know the Senator has offered this amendment before and we have talked about this proposition before. But steps have been taken to protect the public interest.

There is broad representation on the board, although the Senator from Nebraska would argue that there ought to be more than one member of the board selected by the President. I am not sure, quite frankly, what difference it would make if there were one or two or more.

In order for this commission to take fundamental action on its budget and other such matters, it is necessary to achieve a heavily weighted majority. So Virginia cannot unilaterally make fundamental decisions about the operation of this airport; it can only be done in concert with Virginia's neighbors across the Potomac.

Indeed, I have talked recently to Najeeb Halaby, who served as the administrator of the FAA and has been the CEO of a major airline. He confirmed my own assessment that although there are great political debates about the composition of airport commissions and other such regional bodies, when these regional bodies are established, the members stop thinking in parochial ways and start thinking about the region and the purpose of the enterprise. Here this purpose is to provide better service to all of our citizens.

Let me proceed to complete the point I was making about the sales price. I thank the Senator, my colleague from Nebraska (Mr. EXON), for his question.

This legislation provides a formula by which the Airports Authority will pay over $100 million for this property. It is not easy to determine the fair market value of this kind of property. It is uniquely different. By statute, the airport cannot make a profit. Revenues must be reinvested and can only be used for airport purposes. Really the only way you can go about placing a value on this property is to establish a hypothetical debt which represents the unreimbursed cost to the taxpayers, the money that has been invested in the airports through the years that today has not been repaid by the users. That sum is $44 million.

Beyond that, the Airports Authority will be required to take over the unfunded liability of the Civil Service Retirement Fund for the airport employees.

That is an estimated $37 million.

Finally, in order to meet the concerns of Maryland the Commerce Committee imposed on the Airports Authority the obligation of paying $36 million to the State of Maryland in compensation for this out-of-pocket costs to purchase Friendship Airport, the airport facility now known as the Baltimore-Washington International Airport.

In all then the new authority will have to pay $117 million for this property, not an insubstantial amount of money. This is a huge sum of money when one considers that this operation cannot make money and that any dollars that are generated by its operation must be dedicated to airport purposes.

A higher sales price might make some of our colleagues happier and it might bring more to the Treasury, but it would simply represent a tax on Washington travelers, the people who come from the State of Washington or the State of Nebraska to this Nation's Capital. They will be required to pay more because it is the traveling public that pays the airport's costs through fares and users fees.

We are not talking about imposing greater costs on Virginia. We are not talking about imposing greater costs here on the airlines. These dollars will come from the pockets of the traveling public.

Let me make one other substantial point: the moneys the Federal Government has invested in these properties are being repaid as of we speak by the users of these facilities. It is simply unfair for us to require these same users to pay twice for those same properties.

Finally, this transfer will relieve the United States of nearly $1 billion liability for improvements at Dulles and National in the near future.

The transfer, as I said, pays a $37 million shortfall in the Federal pension fund. All this represents a sum far greater than the United States could possibly expect to earn if it keeps running these airports.

So if my colleagues will be mindful of the special nature of these properties, the fact that they cannot be dedicated to their highest use but rather must be reserved for airport purposes and must be operated on a nonprofit basis to serve the public, one must conclude that this is a fair price for this transaction.

It might make us feel better to impose a heavier burden on this authority by requiring it to pay more. But that would be shortsighted indeed because we hope this authority, indeed we have ordered this authority to immediately undertake substantial improvements to these properties that will cost almost $1 billion.

Let me talk about the board of directors for a moment. The board of directors consists of five members from Virginia, three from the District of Columbia, two from Maryland and one appointed by the President. A vote of seven, a heavily weighted majority, is required for improvements and for the annual budget, for the important kinds of decisions.

Maryland claims it is underrepresented. Senator EXON and others claim there should be more Federal representation.

Let me respond to those points: Roughly 20 percent of the passengers at National and Dulles originate their trips in Maryland. Maryland's representation is roughly proportionate, without taking into account that these airports are located in Virginia. Moreover, I would suggest it would hardly make sense to give Maryland greater representation, as Maryland officials have shown only a hostility to the proper development of Dulles and National through the years.

The seven-vote requirement assures that Virginia cannot take major action without the concurrence of representatives from the other side of the Potomac. We are talking about a regional authority. This is an authority concerned about the problems and opportunities of this region, an authority that in practice will speak with one voice.

I would point out that during the deliberations of the Holton Commission, Maryland was asked to become a full participant in this enterprise. It was suggested that all three airports be placed together and operated by this Airports Authority. Maryland said: "No, nothing doing. We like things as they are." And yet now Maryland attempts to frustrate this enterprise.

Now, in making the argument that Maryland is in some way underrepresented, the opponents of this measure raise two kinds of concerns. One concern is about noise. Senator SARBANES and I have talked about that. Like every other airport operator the Authority will have absolutely no control over the number of flights and their paths. As I pointed out before, that remains an FAA responsibility. Flights cannot and will not be deliberately routed over Maryland. Indeed, noise is a problem that plagues us all and that is why I believe this Authority, composed of members from this metropolitan region, will be highly responsive to the concerns about noise.

Moreover, like any other airport authority, the new Airports Authority has absolutely no control over the distribution of slots at National Airport, and so it cannot force carriers to serve Dulles in order to serve National, and that is an important point and one that ought to be fully considered by those who are concerned about this legislation gives Dulles some competitive edge over other airports in the region.

The Senator from South Carolina, Senator HOLLINGS, has complained that the Airports Authority will be able to use revenue bonds. Indeed, that is so. And so do all other airports in this country. But whether these bonds are tax exempt or not is up to Congress and to the tax policy that we construct.

Senator HOLLINGS has referred to a CBO letter of August 21 which he says shows that it would cost more money to let this Authority proceed by way of revenue bonds than it would be to provide directly from the Government the moneys required for expanding and enhancing these facilities.

That is simply not the case. The CBO letter of August 21 reported that present value cost to the Government of $250 million in improvements would be $215 million if directly funded by the Government and $166 million if funded by tax-exempt revenue bonds.

To this I would add that the impact would be zero if the tax laws were changed to prohibit the use of tax-exempt revenue bonds. That, of course, is a decision for Congress to make in the days ahead.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, is the Senator suggesting that these airport authorities would operate without tax-exempt revenue bonds?

Mr. TRIBLE. I think airports could operate without tax-exempt bonds. What I am saying is that whether they will be tax exempt or not is a decision Congress will make in executing tax reform and tax policy.

Mr. SARBANES. No; when the Holton Commission looked at this matter, it was very clear from their financial analysis that it was essential in order to make this work that you have tax-exempt revenue bonds. That is why the Senator from South Carolina has been making the point that the administration is at cross-purposes. On the one hand, it is seeking to devolve these airports to allow authority and in order to achieve that that authority must rely on tax-exempt revenue bonds. On the other hand, the administration is proposing to do away with tax-exempt revenue bonds. So the two work at direct cross-purposes. I simply cannot understand the Senator's reasoning.

Mr. TRIBLE. Be that as it may, this legislation simply provides to this authority the same right of every other airport to employ tax-exempt revenue bonds in order to raise capital for their operations. Whether or not the tax-exempt status is available to this and other airports is a matter for the Congress to resolve in the days ahead.

Mr. President, I would like at this point to submit for the RECORD, and ask unanimous consent to do so, a copy of that letter of August 21 to which I have referred and from which Senator HOLLINGS has spoken this morning.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
U.S. CONGRESS,
Washington, DC, August 21, 1985.

Hon. ERNEST F. HOLLINGS,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR: In response to your request, the Congressional Budget Office has compared the cost to the federal government of two alternatives for financing improvements to National and Dulles Airports: (1) direct federal funding, and (2) local financing from tax-exempt bonds. Based upon your staff's request, we have assumed for both scenarios that the construction costs for improvements at the two airports will total $250 million. As the tables indicate, it would cost the federal government more money over time to finance the improvements with tax-exempt bonds than with a direct federal grant, but the annual tax losses are relatively small and are spread over many years. However, if the costs are discounted to reflect their value in 1986 dollars (assuming a 10 percent discount rate), the federal government would lose $116 million in forgone tax revenue if tax-exempt bonds are issued compared to $215 million if a direct grant is used to finance the construction.

Under the first scenario, we have assumed that the federal government would appropriate $250 million to fund 100 percent of the needed construction costs at the two airports. This option would increase budget authority by $250 million in 1986. Our historical spending rates indicate that this would result in increased outlays of approximately $50 million in 1986, $113 million in 1987, $51 million in 1988, $24 million in 1989, and $12 million in 1990. Federal spending would increase by $250 million over five years, but if the costs were discounted to their present value, they would be equivalent to a 1986 cost of $215 million.

The second scenario assumes that the airports are transferred to an independent local authority that, in turn, issues 30-year tax-exempt bonds to finance the needed improvements. Based on information we have reviewed for other airport improvement bonds, we estimate that bonds would have to be issued for almost $350 million to fund $250 million worth of construction improvements. The additional funds are used to cover net interest during construction ($60 million), debt service reserve ($27 million), and issuance costs ($9 million). These costs usually add up to 50 percent of the amount of bonds needed to cover the construction. According to Moody's Investor Service credit report, for example, airport bonds for $1.5 billion in 1983 and 1984 financed $983 million in construction programs.

Our analysis also assumes that the bonds would be issued on two dates, rather than through one issue, because of Treasury limits on the time taken to spend bond proceeds. Since the improvements are expected to take five years to complete, we have assumed that the initial bond issue would cover the costs of the first 2½ years of construction, and a second issue could then be made to cover the remaining costs. The tax losses to the government would be about $10 million in the first few years, rising to $12 million after the second issue. These annual tax losses would continue until the bonds mature. Over the life of the bonds, the federal government would lose approximately $366 million in tax revenues under this option. In terms of its present value, however, the loss to the government would only be equivalent to a 1986 outlay of $116 million.

It is also worthwhile to note that under the Administration's new tax reform proposals, it is possible that airport improvement bonds might no longer qualify for tax-exempt status. In that case, there would be no cost to the federal government if bonds were issued to finance the improvements.

The attached tables provide more details on the costs of each option.

If you wish further details on this estimate, we will be pleased to provide them.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

RUDOLPH G. PENNER,
Director.

Mr. PRESSLER. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. TRIBLE. I am pleased to yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. PRESSLER. Earlier today I stated, when the senior Senator from Virginia was here——

Mr. TRIBLE. The senior Senator from Virginia is still here.

Mr. PRESSLER. He is still here? Good.

I expressed the desire to work closely with the Senators from Virginia, as we have, and expressed my great respect for the job that both of the Virginia Senators are doing. I am also attempting to do a good job for my State in terms of representation on the authority. I ask my colleague if down the road there is a problem which citizens of South Dakota or of Colorado or Montana have, where would they go for resolution?

For example, the last direct flight from my State to Washington, DC, had difficulty getting a landing time at the correct time. I was able to work on that problem as a Senator from South Dakota. If this board, as presently proposed, is the airport operating authority, where could, let us say, the chamber of commerce of South Dakota or Colorado or of Idaho go if they were seeking relief? And let us say that the board had a choice between taking jumbo jets from Los Angeles or smaller planes from Sioux Falls; they are going to make more money on the former. But there is a right of all citizens to come to Washington to petition their Government. That does not mean that they have to take every flight, but maybe two or three a week at a prime time.

What I am trying to say, and I hope my colleague will hear me, is that there is a nationwide interest in these two airports. I feel strongly that the number of Presidential appointees should be increased.

Mr. TRIBLE. I understand the Senator's question and it is a fair one. Let me reclaim my time and respond as best I can.

The Holton Commission and all those engaged in crafting this legislation recognize that these airports have a national dimension. It is our view that in order to satisfy the requirements of aircraft passage it is necessary to turn these airports over to an authority that can operate them more effectively and generate the huge sums of money that are necessary to upgrade their operation.

(Mr. SIMPSON assumed the chair.)

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator from Virginia yield briefly?

Mr. TRIBLE. I am happy to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. I want to indicate at this time, after a brief discussion with the distinguished minority leader, that there will be no votes today. We do hope to continue discussion of this matter so if cloture is invoked on the motion to proceed then we could make some progress, but there will be no votes the remainder of the day.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield? I thank the majority leader for making this announcement so that Senators from both sides may be able to plan the rest of their day accordingly.

Mr. DOLE. I would also indicate we are attempting to work out reconciliation. We are very close. We have a couple of small items with the House. I hope to be visiting the Speaker before too long to see if we can work out a couple of areas. If not, then I assume the House will take some action before they leave for the week.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. TRIBLE. I will yield to the Senator from Maryland for the purpose of a question. I yielded the floor to the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. I ask this not be included in the dialog.

Mr. TRIBLE. I think I am still in control of the time.

Mr. DOLE. Right.

Mr. TRIBLE. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Maryland for the purpose of a question to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. SARBANES. I appreciate my colleague from Virginia doing that. Unfortunately, I fell into the fallacy of thinking when I saw the majority leader on his feet that he in fact was in control of the floor and simply accorded a respect to the majority leader which I now am informed by my colleague from Virginia I should not have done in the circumstance.

Could I ask the majority leader—I am prepared to go as long as he wants—how long would he like to go on?

Mr. DOLE. I do not have any suggestion. I think as long as there is constructive debate, but there will be a vote tomorrow morning. Maybe anytime the principals would like to terminate the debate.

Mr. SARBANES. Fine.

Mr. DOLE. I think it has been fully discussed. Again, I commend my colleagues on both sides. I do not see any reason to extend it if the principals can agree. Whatever they agree is fine with this Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. Fine. The other thing is I think I ought to observe to the majority leader, because we have tried to be candid with one another in the course of considering this matter, it is my own view that if in fact we get to this bill it is going to take some time to finally dispose of it.

There are a number of substantive amendments that need to be considered, so I do not think it is a matter of getting rid of the bill in a day or two, although by making that comment I am not trying to suggest that there is going to be highly extended debate. But I know we are into a period now where the majority leader is having to make judgments about other matters, and it just seems to me that there are a lot of amendments in fact on that side of the aisle as well, which I think the majority leader understands, and there are a number obviously on this side of the aisle. The ones that I am working on I do not think anyone would question as being substantive. They are directed to valid aspects of the bill. I simply wanted to say that for the benefit of the majority leader's thinking.

Mr. DOLE. Right. I certainly understand people have substantive amendments. They have a right to have those amendments debated and voted upon. And there probably are amendments—I think I know of amendments on this side and there may be amendments from a number of Senators on the other side; that it may take additional time, and it may not even be completed before the Easter recess because there are a couple of things we may have to set it aside for if we can get an agreement to do that. We still have the water bill we would like to dispose of early next week, and we have Contra aid that we would like to take up starting on Tuesday. We had hoped to determine the budget resolution—I do not think that will be possible—before we leave here Thursday, so I understand that and I appreciate the Senator's concern.

Mr. TRIBLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. HATCH]. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TRIBLE. Let me respond to the question posed by the Senator from South Dakota. The Senator is concerned about his constituents and their level of representation and whether in some way service to his constituents will be diminished by this legislation.

My answer to the Senator would be absolutely not, for several reasons. The proponents of this legislation understand, Mr. President, the national dimension of this airport, and our purpose in this transaction is to improve those facilities, expand those facilities, make them more available to the citizens of South Dakota and the citizens of our other 49 States and the world.

In terms of oversight, be mindful that this transaction is not a sales transaction but, rather, a long-term 35-year lease. During that time the Federal Government maintains oversight authority. And there are certain ground rules under which the authority must operate. For example, they have to use the property about which we have heard so much today solely for airport purposes.

If they violate that provision, then the Federal Government reclaims those properties. So there is one oversight authority residing in this Congress during the course of that 35-year lease.

Moreover, in order to ensure that there will be no reduction of traffic at Washington National, an airport of special concern to my colleagues, there has been a freeze on slots. This authority cannot respond to the pressure of people who want to decrease flights, but, rather, would maintain most of the current flight levels. That means that there will still be flights beginning and ending at National carrying passengers all over this country.

Finally, I would point out to my colleague that in a deregulated airline environment, the decisions about who flies where and when are made largely by the carriers. These are not decisions made by any governmental authority. If market forces in South Dakota generate demand for services, then airlines will continue to serve South Dakota.

Mr. PRESSLER. If my colleague will yield for a question on that point, say that South Dakota or any other State 5 years from now has a problem with landing rights. Citibank located one of its largest divisions in South Dakota. United serves Sioux Falls as does Ozark. It is my feeling that both of those could operate full aircraft. They could not operate jumbo jets such as those that fly to Los Angeles, London, or Chicago.

If market forces alone are going to determine landing rights, we are going to be cut out. I am not bothered with market forces in terms of going to New York, Hawaii, or Chicago. But Washington, DC, is different. It is the Nation's Capital. A lot of my constituents come here for the purpose of petitioning their Congress, appearing before congressional committees, or seeking relief.

I think market forces should be the predominant factor, but also there are some things in our society that market forces do not determine. One is the right of minorities to have access to the Nation's Capital. Sometimes our smaller cities, counties, and States are in the category of minorities.

Mr. TRIBLE. I understand the Senator's concern abut having his constituents well served with air transportation. I would simply tell the Senator that we must live in a deregulated airline environment. That is the status quo. That is the way things are today. This bill will not change it.

Mr. PRESSLER. But the flights to the airport are decided by the airport.

Mr. TRIBLE. No; that is incorrect, I say to my distinguished friend.

Mr. PRESSLER. If the authority decides to allocate 9:15 a.m. to a certain flight——

Mr. TRIBLE. Slots are allocated by the airline committees, not the authority.

Mr. PRESSLER. That is not totally true. I disagree with that.

Mr. TRIBLE. We will have to sort that out, then. The record will speak for itself. One of us will not be correct.

Mr. PRESSLER. Ozark Air Lines cannot just declare tomorrow morning that it is going to start landing at 10 a.m. at National Airport.

Mr. TRIBLE. That is clearly so. There are a certain number of slots, but those slots are allocated by carriers committees not by the authority. There is a freeze on slots at Washington National, so that means there will be no reduction in the number of slots. They will always be at the current level. That is expressly there to protect your constituents.

I would point out further that there is no limitation on slots at Dulles. Dulles is an environment from which more and more planes will be able to operate. So the Senator's airplanes will have more than ample opportunity to find their way to Dulles Airport.

Mr. PRESSLER. I can assure you that the authority will participate in decisions dealing with landing times of aircraft from different parts of the country. It would be inaccurate to suggest that any airport authority is completely at the mercy of the carriers. That is not the way it works.

Mr. TRIBLE. Let me explain my point. We will let the record speak for itself. I will maintain the position that I have stated and I am stating now for the third time. That is that the allocation of slots is a function of the carriers committee decisions and not this, or any other, authority.

Let me address my final point and then I will be happy to yield for a colloquy.

Let me respond to a final point made by the Senator from South Carolina. That is the assertion that this bill is not unnecessary because there is a great sum of money available in the airport trust fund. Therefore, we should simply take those moneys and dedicate them for the purpose of improving these airports.

I think it would be instructive for my colleagues to know a bit more about how the airport trust fund operates.

As the program applies to all airports, it works in the following manner: Airports receive entitlement grants based on enplanements. Under the present circumstances, the Washington Metropolitan Airports would receive $6.5 million per year based on traffic at Dulles and National.

Discretionary grants are also made out of the trust fund. Only about $150 million has been made available for general discretionary grants each year. As a general rule of thumb, no airport receives more than $2.5 million per year in discretionary funds except under extraordinary circumstances.

There is absolutely no precedent for meeting the kinds of requirements that we find at Dulles and National from this airport trust fund. Indeed, in order to take from that fund the nearly $1 billion that is necessary to improve facilities at Dulles and National, it would leave little, indeed no, money for other facilities that desperately need it around our country.

Finally, let me point out that appropriations from the trust fund are an on-budget item. To the extend that this Congress chooses to appropriate any sum of money for this purpose, it will simply aggravate an already vast Federal deficit. Under the rules of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, legislation crafted by the Senator from South Carolina at least in part, an important part, that is simply impossible.

The argument sounds very appealing but it simply does not comport with reality. The fund is available, but appropriations are unlikely.

In the environment of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings they simply will not occur. That argues, then, for the passage of this legislation because this represents the only means by which these important airports can be improved, expanded, and made to satisfy the increasing demands for airline traffic throughout this country.

I see my distinguished colleague and friend from Virginia on his feet. He has helped shape this legislation. He was a member of the Holton Commission. His interest remains profound and his leadership immense. I yield to my distinguished colleague from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. I thank my distinguished colleague from Virginia and wish to commend him on this legislation we are discussing today. I had to Chair an Armed Services Subcommittee for 3 hours and was unable to accompany him on the floor today as much as I would have liked to.

My colleague makes reference to the fact that I was a member of the Holton Commission. I tried to attend each and every meeting of the commission. It was an outstanding commission. It was well represented from Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia. We had the advice and counsel of many who had no affiliation whatsoever with either of those jurisdictions in matters relating to politics or otherwise, but just came in with good hardheaded counsel on the issues relating to operating these two airports and the financing.

Now on the latter point, I address the following observation to those who are anxious to consider changing the bill, and that is that there is a very delicate balance between the way this bill was crafted and the financing that will be required for the improvements of these two airports. It is envisioned that bonding authority will be utilized and, of course, we all understand that the cost of bonds is reflected by, primarily, the interest rate that must be paid. And that will become a direct obligation of the authority.

Now, if we pull and tug at this bill and change it, then we better watch at each point we do so—and I recommend we do not—but should it be the will of the Senate to change it, we must examine the ability of this authority to go into the public market to secure the adequate financing at rates which will enable these two airports to improve themselves and to remain viable economic entities.

I conclude by saying that these issues were carefully weighed by the commission, using the advice and counsel of independent individuals who cautioned us to put together this plan in a way that would enable the authority to go into the marketplace and raise the revenue through bonding at rates which would enable these airports to function as economic entities.

I see my distinguished colleague from South Dakota is on his feet.

Mr. PRESSLER. I appreciate what my colleague has said. Let me add earlier I made some remarks regarding allocation of slots, which I stand by very much. Let me say that the authority, I am told, could be very influential and determinative, depending on a number of conditions and depending on the direction that our airlines go.

But it is very important to many States that they have a direct flight to Washington, DC. Whether we have a direct flight to New York or not, as far as I am concerned, can be strictly market forces. But I would like to see one or two direct flights a week from my State to Washington, DC. If left entirely to the free enterprise system and left entirely to market forces in a deregulated environment, that probably will not happen.

But I want to use my influence as a Senator not to force the ability of flights to land, but certainly to influence it. We have located in Sioux Falls now Citibank, which employs several thousand people; I think the largest branch of Citibank. We have a number of farmers and small businessmen and others who come to Washington regularly who have business to conduct here; ranchers who appear before the ICC regarding the railroad and the West River area.

I would say to my friend from Virginia—and I have worked on many things with him—that I would appreciate his consideration of those distant parts of the country that are unable to send jumbo jets in here. We fear that an authority controlled by one State would not be as fair as an authority with more national representation. I do think more Presidential appointee would be appropriate and I would ask him to consider that possibility.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's concerns. Indeed, were I to assume his position, I would advocate the same thoughts with equal force.

But I would say to the Senator, I hope he would think again before using the phrase that this authority would be under the control of one State. Again, the Commission, under the guidance of Governor Holton, carefully crafted it such that indeed Virginia has a certain number of positions and Maryland and the District of Columbia and, indeed, the President appoints some individuals. So it is not one State, it is a balance of the interests that are concerned.

Bear in mind that Virginia, directly and indirectly, has to assume a measure of responsibility for the infrastructure that surrounds these two airports. They do not simply become islands unto themselves, they become partners in a living, expanding economic community.

Mr. PRESSLER. Certainly, if my friend will yield—I admire Governor Holton very much—I am sure these would be people of the highest quality. But my friend, who has served as Secretary of the Navy and in many public capacities, would be well aware that with five members, I believe, from Virginia, and three from the District, Maryland would be automatically outvoted. And if you put Maryland and the District and Virginia together on an issue against the rest of the country, the President's one appointment just would not have much of a chance.

Taxpayers from all over this country are very proud of this area and invest in it. But we need a bit more to say about this authority, very frankly, and this bill I think is going to be in great difficulty unless we give the President the authority to appoint more members, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I say to my good friend, let us first get the facts correctly in the RECORD. There will be five from Virginia, three from the District of Columbia, two from Maryland, and one appointed by the President. Coincidentally, that is the formula that I recommended to the Commission and it was ultimately accepted. The formula represented a consensus among those members of the Commission who had indeed varying ideas.

But I cannot conceive the three members from the District of Columbia abdicating their interests to Virginia, and, likewise, the two from Maryland abdicating their interests, and the one by the President. So if you add them up, three from the District of Columbia, two from Maryland, that is five, and one from the President is six. So, actually, you have six against Virginia's five.

Mr. PRESSLER. Let us say that problem X arose, I do not know what that problem would be. But say problem X was very important to South Dakota and it was not deemed important to the local commissioners. A problem, let us say, of direct flights. Or let us say it is from some other State. It does not necessarily have to be mine. It could be from a section of Texas. Indeed, a situation that might mean less profits if the authority yielded on the issue.

Do you really think that those locally appointed commissioners, or authority, or whatever their titles will be, would act in the national interest against local interests in some instances if there were not more Presidential appointees?

Mr. WARNER. Well, I do not know what formula. I think I heard the Senator mention the formula from time to time. But let me say this is an issue that should be and will be addressed as soon as the Senate turns to the consideration of the bill. And I would hope that at this time or distinguished colleague from Maryland and I, in consultation with Mr. TRIBLE, can determine the duration of debate for the balance of the day.

I see other Senators on the floor who may be seeking recognition on matters other than the pending business.

Mr. PRESSLER. If my friend will yield further, I would throw out the possibility of a formula, 2, 2, 2, and 5. That would be an 11-person board—2 for Virginia, 2 for Maryland, 2 for the District, and 5 appointed by the President. Would that be agreeable?

Mr. TRIBLE. Will the Senator yield to me on that?

I think my colleague from Virginia's view is that this is an extended debate on a motion to consider a bill. This is hardly the place to debate the merits of the bill.

But, moving beyond that, may I inquire of the Senator: What are the concerns that are in your mind for greater representation on the Commission? What is it that troubles you? What action is this authority likely to to take that troubles constituents?

Obviously there is something that is troubling you that influences you to say there ought to be greater representation for this great national body of users. Could you articulate that for me?

Mr. PRESSLER. All right. It troubles me in the same sense that I would like to see someone from South Dakota be on the board of directors of the Kennedy Center, for example.

Even though that is located here in Washington, DC, and even though I support it, I would like to see directors from across the country. It is used by people principally from here. But there are times when it is used by people from every State in our Union. It is a national treasure. It would be nice to have someone from South Dakota on the board of directors of the Kennedy Center. It would further enrich the Kennedy Center. Let us say the directors of the Kennedy Center were only from the District, Maryland, and Virginia. They would do a good job. But there may be some instances where performers from South Dakota want to perform at the Kennedy Center. There may be some instances where groups from South Dakota would be able to participate in certain events over there in part because there was somebody from our State on the board of directors.

There is not any guarantee there will ever be somebody from South Dakota on the board of directors. The board members are appointed by the President of the United States, I believe. The Kennedy Center serves the entire country.

The local airports analogously also serve not only the region, but they also serve the entire United States in a quasi-public fashion because this is one city where many of our citizens have to come if they wish to petition their Government. Therefore, these airports take on a more important role. I think Virginia and Maryland and the District have both a greater benefit and a greater responsibility. What troubles me is down the road in 5 years, if a certain problem arises—we will call the problem X, because I cannot foresee what it might be—I feel that we would have a better chance at fair treatment if the President were to appoint more of the members of the authority, rather than to have them essentially appointed by Virginia, Maryland, or the District.

Right now the President only has one appointment who could be outvoted or have very little influence. He is one person. It would be like one Senator on the board of seven other people. He would be there, but he could be outvoted. It is a total of 10, 5 from Virginia, 3 from the District as I understand it, and 2 from Maryland. My latest amendment is two, two, two, and five.

Mr. TRIBLE. Five, three, two, one, all adding up to a grand total of 11.

Mr. PRESSLER. But the President only gets one. Would my colleague be offended if the President were to appoint more, and what would his objection be to the President's appointing more?

Mr. TRIBLE. What I tried to, if the Senator will yield, to ascertain in this colloquy is what it is my distinguished colleague from South Dakota hopes to accomplish by greater representation? I asked specifically what are his concerns? My colleague's response was, well, I cannot foresee what they are tonight, but at sometime in the future concern X might arise.

It would seem that the obvious concerns that the Senator has for his constituents would be that they have access to this airport, that there be flights at regular times, and on a regular schedule enabling his constituents and mine can come and go from the Nation's Capital. Those will not be limited. Those rights can in no way be reduced by this authority.

This has to be discussed in our colloquy. The number of slots is determined by the FAA. The allocation of slots between competing airlines is done by airline carrier committees. These are not functions of the local authority.

My response to the question posed by my colleague is that I would see nothing that would be gained by changing the numbers. Having one or two more representatives appointed by the President really does not gain anything if we cannot be any more specific about our concerns here, and what it will surely do is kill this measure.

Mr. PRESSLER. Let me respond.

Mr. TRIBLE. Can I just complete this train of thought? It will kill this measure whether it is the intention of my colleague or not because the composition of this authority has been arrived at after great discussion and debate, and it has been very carefully crafted. If we change it here on this floor, then this initiative comes to an end.

Mr. PRESSLER. Why would that be? Would my colleague yield? Let me say we cannot foresee what the deregulatory environment will be 5 years from now. But an authority would be very influential in many of these decisions. It would certainly be consulted. The authority, let us face it, would be consulted. But why would this amendment mean an end to the bill? It is not meant to be a killer amendment. Why would the Senator not trust Presidential appointees? Perhaps the President of the United States would appoint all Virginians. Who knows? I think the Senate in its advice and consent would not allow that.

Mr. TRIBLE. It is really immaterial to me who the President would appoint, because unlike the Senator from South Dakota it is my view that once people are appointed to this Commission they will start thinking in terms of the metropolitan area, improving service to the Nation, and they are going to stop these partisan and parochial debates that we have heard on this floor.

I will say to the Senator the reason I suggested it would kill this bill is that this bill is based on a compact passed by the State of Virginia and the city of the District of Columbia that reflects this carefully crafted balance arrived at.

Each of us can disagree as to what kind of representation we would want for the various parties. But we have many different interests here. It is very difficult to reconcile those interests to everyone's satisfaction.

If we undo this agreement, then this particular legislation is at an end, and it would be necessary to begin this long and difficult process once again. So whether it is the intention of my colleague or not, it would be the end of this initiative, the status quo would be maintained, and these airports would continue to provide inferior service, rather than expanding to meet the growing requirements of his constituents and mine.

Mr. PRESSLER. If my friend will yield, let me say that I have made many arguments on this floor, and if my colleague considers them parochial, so be it. But I represent South Dakota. I appreciate very much the remarks he made on behalf of Virginia. I do not consider Virginians' arguments parochial. I represent South Dakota, and my friend represents Virginia. I consider his arguments on the merits. I hope he will not consider mine parochial for speaking up for my State.

It is perhaps true that some of these arguments do sound parochial, but they are very real. They are very real concerns. And they are concerns of the State that I represent. That is what the U.S. Senate is all about.

Mr. TRIBLE. Will the Senator yield on that particular point?

Mr. PRESSLER. Yes.

Mr. TRIBLE. This whole discussion has been a discussion of the relative interests of the Nation and the States of Virginia, Maryland, and the city of the District of Columbia, and whether the citizens of particular States would be well served by this transaction or not.

To that end, as we represent our particular constituents, one can say we represent interests that are not national but are parochial. That is indeed our responsibility, and for championing the interests of these constituents, I applaud this Senator. I simply tired in the course of our colloquy to point out that it is my judgment that the interests of his constituents would be better served by this transaction, by improved airports, and my colleague can in no way point out ways in which service would be diminished. Indeed, service will only be expanded. I think that has to be our purpose.

Finally, and with this I will yield and thank the Senator for his patience.

Mr. PRESSLER. If the Senator will yield further, I was leading to a question. If, indeed, my colleague considers my views parochial, the thing I am advocating in giving the President more appointments would be more of a national view. My colleague has not given any reason why he thinks the five Commissioners appointed by the President would be detrimental to the airport authority—they would act in the national interest. They certainly would not be parochial.

Mr. TRIBLE. I thought I was very clear in my response. Let me restate my response.

First of all, I see nothing that would be gained by increasing the representation by those people appointed by the President.

I invited my colleague from South Dakota to spell out the concern he is trying to address by that initiative, and he failed to do so.

Finally, I tried to point out that it is the experience with these boards and commissions that, once empaneled, they adopt the broader view of the metropolitan region they serve. The problems and opportunities of this metropolitan area are one and the same. The citizens of Maryland, the District of Columbia, and Virginia are all concerned about noise. We are all interested in improving the service at these airports. We want to encourage jobs and economic growth. We share the view of the Senator from South Dakota that we want to enhance the operation of these airports so that more of his constituents can come to this city.

I do not believe that these interests are in competition. Indeed, I think they are strikingly the same and that they include the approach put forth by this legislation.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TRIBLE. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota that I think he has put his finger on a matter that should be of concern to a number of Members of the Senate, and that is, as he eloquently stated earlier in the day, that these airports are the air gateway to the Nation's Capital. So there is a Federal or national interest involved. How you provide for that is a difficult question, if at the same time you are determined to put these in local hands, as the Secretary of Transportation was.

The Secretary could have considered setting up an airport authority on her own to run these airports, with a combination of membership of the sort that the Senator talked about, or some other combination of membership.

The reason why it is a pressing issue for some Members is that the airport authority is probably going to be more interested in running service to some large metropolitan area elsewhere in the country than in running it to the less populated areas of the country. In other words, if you put it strictly on that basis, there will be less reason for them to be concerned about service to the more rural areas. So I can understand the concerns which the Senator has expressed.

In a sense, it is correct that this deal has been sort of cut, as it were. I think that was a mistake. It was cut without ever coming to the Senate or to Congress. We are now being told, in effect, "A deal was made, and you have to go with a deal or there is no deal," even though a lot of people look at this thing and say, "We see a lot of problems with it. It should have been done in a different way."

In fact, a lot of circumstances have changed since the Holton Commission, headed by the former Governor of Virginia, considered this matter some 18 months ago. Let me give one instance.

Dulles is currently experiencing a significant growth in enplanements, having handled 47 percent more passengers in 1985 than in the previous year. That was not a fact that the Holton Commission had before it; and if it had had that fact before it, the analysis it undertook would have been different from what took place which led to the Commission's recommendation. There were Maryland members of that Commission. We dissented.

A concern expressed in the Commission was how the Federal interest would be addressed and, in fact, how Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives would react to this proposal—the very debate and dialog that has just been going on between the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from Virginia.

I simply say that many Members who, at first blush, may see this simply as a Maryland-Virginia-District of Columbia problem really should take an interest and a careful look at this legislation, because access on their part and the part of their constituents by air to the Washington metropolitan region is at stake in this bill.

It is my view, Mr. President, that there is a failure here to adjust to changing times and changing circumstances. The budget situation in which Congress finds itself is a very strong argument to reexamine, and reexamine carefully, the ridiculously low amount which the Federal Government would realize from the transfer of these assets.

Yesterday, I put in the RECORD a letter from the National Taxpayers Union which touched on this subject and really pointed out that under current budget circumstances, what was being done here was not a wise move. Let me underscore that point. In that letter, the National Taxpayers Union stated:

> DEAR SENATOR: Soon you may be asked to vote on S. 1017, the Metropolitan Washington Airports Transfer Act. This bill would transfer ownership of Dulles and National Airports to an independent authority dominated by the Commonwealth of Virginia. We urge you to vote "NO" on this sale.
> Although, we agree that the federal government should get out of the business of owning and managing airports, we are appalled at the ridiculously low sale price placed on these valuable properties. The combined market value of the properties is conservatively estimated at $1.5 to $2 billion. Yet, the two airports are to be sold for only $47 million—about 1/35 their actual worth.
> In addition, the transfer and future improvements are to be financed with tax-exempt bonds over a 30-year period. This adds up to a double soaking of the taxpayer.
> Given the nation's tremendous budget deficits and $4 trillion national debt, it is fiscally irresponsible for the federal government to do anything but seek fair market value for the airports. Sound policy demands that the price tag on Dulles and National be raised to reflect their true worth. Otherwise, the sale should be rejected.

Mr. President, what is being put to Members here is that unless you do it this way, nothing can be done. I do not accept that proposition. If, in fact, Members accept that proposition, it means that answers to problems are essentially going to be determined from outside the Senate, outside the body that has the burden of developing the solutions.

The choice is not between this and nothing. There are lots of choices; there are lots of possibilities.

There is a wide scope to develop a solution here that responds to many of the concerns that have been put forward by Members of this body. Members are not confronted with an end-all situation. In fact, it is my very strongly held view that if the Senate were to determine that it did not want to go ahead on this legislation; that there were enough problems swirling around it, contained within it; that it is not in a position now to be taken up and acted upon by the Senate; that that would open up an opportunity for the Secretary of Transportation, in consultation with the affected States and with Members of this body, to try to develop an altered approach that would respond to the problems and to the questions that have been raised.

Well, it is said, why do you not go to the bill and change it there? Because, as the Senator from Virginia just indicated in his response, the argument that will be used then is "You cannot change these things. It is all part," as he put it, "of a very carefully crafted arrangement."

Therefore, when he responded to the Senator from South Dakota, he in effect said, well, we cannot change the composition of the authority because this is all part of this carefully crafted arrangement, it is all part of the deal, and if that is changed, then you do not have a deal and you cannot move forward with the proposal contained in this legislation.

So the appeal to go to the legislation and consider it on the substance is, really, empty because if you should get there, then the argument would be made, "Well, now, you cannot tamper with this; this has all been carefully done." So if you have problems with what has been done, if you have questions about it, if you have concerns about it, the thing to do is to bring a halt to this, in effect, at the moment and allow an effort to be made to develop a proposal that meets those problems and those concerns.

Because I can tell you, Mr. President, the argument that was just heard—well, you cannot really tamper with this thing, it has been carefully crafted, and if you do so, the participants will no longer participate—is the argument that is going to be made. So we are going to say, "Look, you have to take it as it is."

I do not accept that proposition, Mr. President, but the way to address it is not to invoke cloture on this proposal, to provide thereby an opportunity to reexamine with some care, without the immediate press of a legislative deadline, the arguments that have been made, the concerns that have been raised, and the questions that have been asked.

None of those is beyond solving. People have talked about the amount of money. That judgment ought to be made in light of a lot of changing circumstances, including the very significant increase in traffic at both of these airports, and the significant strengthening of their financial position.

Questions have been raised about the composition of the authority. The numbers picked were not written in stone, they were put out as a proposal. The Commission actually considered lots of other proposals, came very close to adopting some of them. So there is nothing here that is etched in stone.

We have raised this point about noise, a very critical item; the question of cross-subsidizing. There is a whole range of issues here. It seems to me what is needed to be done is for the Senate to say, on tomorrow, by rejecting the cloture motion, that there are enough problems connected with this legislation, enough difficulties contained within it, that we think the better way to proceed is to reformulate it. Let that new proposal then encompass a response to many of the arguments that have been made here, on the floor.

I caution Members to think about this legislation in those terms because the argument that will be made, if we should go to an amending process, is you cannot do that because this is a carefully crafted arrangement, as my colleague from Virginia said only a few moments ago in responding to the Senator from South Dakota and if you do that, the arrangement will fall apart and we will have no bill.

So I say to my colleagues, the way to address this is to reject the cloture motion tomorrow, open up thereby an opportunity to take another look at this legislative proposal, to reformulate it in the light of the questions and problems that have come out in this debate and which more Members now are beginning to express and to focus on. We must recognize that there are alternatives between taking this legislation and doing nothing. That is not the situation we find ourselves in. There are other alternatives and our opportunity to explore them and to address this matter in a positive and constructive way will be enhanced if the Senate refuses tomorrow morning to invoke cloture on the motion to proceed to this legislation.

Mr. TRIBLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, it is not my intention to talk long at this hour of the day. The Senate has heard much about this proposed transaction over the course of the last 2 days.

Let me simply say that I hope that the Senate will be permitted to work its will on this important piece of legislation. We have heard a great deal of debate, a well-orchestrated attempt to frustrate this process, evidencing the continuing opposition of our friends in Maryland to efforts to enhance and develop the Dulles and National Airports.

I understand that opposition, Mr. President. It has been expertly advanced over the last 2 days. But let me remind my colleagues our situation. We are debating the motion to proceed.

I would suggest the time has come for the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this matter so that we can debate the merits of this proposition and decide whether we should proceed and, if so, under what terms.

The support for this legislation is broad-based. It extends well beyond Virginia. Indeed, this legislation is enthusiastically supported by the citizens of Virginia, the District of Columbia, and I would add many residents of Maryland as well. They all understand the importance of improving the operations of Washington National and Dulles so that all of our citizens, wherever they reside, will be better served.

This legislation, of course, is supported by the administration and by airline organizations representing the major carriers that propose to serve this region. They understand how desperately important it is that we find a way to enhance the facilities at Dulles and National.

I look forward to the vote tomorrow morning. Cloture is never easily invoked on a first attempt, but it is my hope that this Senate will act decisively tomorrow so we can continue this debate on the merits and resolve some of the questions that have been advanced here over the last couple of days.

For us to fail to do so we would abdicate our responsibility to the many constituents that we serve.

Moreover, let me point out that a lot of very able people have worked on this legislation over the course of the last year. I would note the service of the members of the Holton Commission, former Governor Holton, of Virginia, and citizens from all the metropolitan areas of Washington who helped craft this legislation, the Secretary of Transportation, the Senator from Missouri, Senator DANFORTH, the chairman of the Commerce Committee, and a bipartisan majority of that committee who supported this legislation after thorough review and a great deal of debate by a margin of 12 to 4.

This bill has broad-based support. The opposition does not extend beyond a handful of Senators. It would be my hope that that bipartisan majority will be given the opportunity to work its will in this Senate.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of S. 1017, a bill to provide for the transfer of the Metropolitan Washington Airports to an independent airport authority.

Bob Dole, Jack Danforth, Steve Symms, W.D. Armstrong, Slade Gorton, John Warner, Strom Thurmond, Chuck Grassley, Daniel J. Evans, Al Simpson, Thad Cochran, John H. Chafee, Paul Trible, Mark Andrews, Orrin G. Hatch, and Paul Laxalt.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the assistant majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. SIMPSON. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I take it that the cloture motion which was just sent to the desk on S. 1017 is premised on the vote to occur tomorrow on a cloture motion.

Mr. SIMPSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. That is a premise I am happy to see the assistant majority leader acting upon. In other words, the cloture motion is submitted on the premise that the cloture motion that will be voted on in the morning may not invoke cloture. Assuming that is the case, when would the vote occur on the cloture motion that the Senator has just submitted take place?

Mr. SIMPSON. Due to the possible uncertainty of tomorrow's outcome, if cloture is not invoked on tomorrow, then the vote on the motion just entered will come 1 hour after convening on Monday, following the ascertainment of a quorum.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, can the acting majority leader set a time for convening on Monday?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, that hour has not been established. I would assume that it would likely be at noon.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the distinguished assistant majority leader. In closing, may I say again that I appreciate the premise on which the cloture motion is submitted.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I do not know that the majority leader is appreciative of that, but we must press on with our business here. We do not want to spend a great deal of time on motions to proceed, if we can avoid it.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 7 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TAX-EXEMPT STATUS OF MUNICIPAL BONDS

(The following proceedings occurred earlier.)

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I thank my colleague, the Senator from South Carolina, for giving me the opportunity to make a brief statement on a subject that is of a tremendous importance to all cities and States.

Mr. President, I rise today feeling a great deal of frustration and consternation. Yesterday, the municipal bond market ceased to exist. At first blush, this may sound like a esoteric subject of interest to only financiers. However, the truth is that without municipal bonds, roads will not be fixed, hospitals will not be built, garbage will not be disposed of, and taxes will certainly rise.

Last Friday the chairmen of the two tax writing committees issued a statement with the support of the Secretary of the Treasury extending the effective date for general obligation bonds to September 1, 1986. I was happy that at least this small step was taken, though I would have preferred that the effective date of the entire bill be moved January 1, 1986. But at least cities and States would be able to issue bonds to fund legitimate government services.

This was true until yesterday. Yesterday, the chairman of the Finance Committee made public his tax reform proposal. Contained in that proposal is a Treasury sponsored provision that calls into question the tax exempt status of all municipal bonds. Treasury recommended that all tax exempt interest earned on bonds issued in the past and in the future be included in a minimum tax.

What was the effect of Treasury's minimum tax proposal? The bond market halted. For instance, the city of New York was forced to cancel a $450 million general obligation bond issue designed to finance general city services. New York City planned to issue these bonds based on a statement made last Friday moving the effective date for general obligation bonds to September 1, 1986.

Treasury concurred with the effort to move the effective date of certain municipal bonds. But then Treasury turned around and ensured that cities and States could never issue low cost tax exempt securities. What Treasury gave with one hand they took away with the other. The net effect is that cities and States and ultimately taxpayers are left in the lurch.

What will inclusion of tax exempt interest in a minimum tax cost? According to the Public Securities Association, interest rates on municipal securities will rise 50 to 75 basis points. Based on the volume of tax exempt debt in 1984 and 1985, added interest costs to cities and States through 1990 will be between $8 and $24 billion. This means that either services will not be funded or taxes will rise.

The Public Securities Association estimates that in my home State of New York interest costs will rise between $562 million and $1.5 billion.

The Treasury proposal changes the rules in the middle of the game. If an individual purchased a tax-exempt bond 10 years ago, that bond may be taxable under Treasury's plan. First, this is grossly unfair. Second, it may very well be unconstitutional. The doctrine of reciprocal immunity states that the Federal Government cannot tax the operations of local government and likewise, local government cannot tax the operations of the Federal Government. The notion of reciprocal immunity was first established by Chief Justice Marshall in 1812. Treasury wants to throw this out the window. Who will pay? The taxpayer ultimately will bear the burden.

Treasury would not be happy if States began to tax Federal securities. You can be sure that Treasury bureaucrats would be outraged by such a proposal.

I am pleased that the Finance Committee has agreed to take up the inclusion of tax-exempt interest in the minimum tax on Monday. This will not help the city of New York which is hanging in the lurch. I would hope that Treasury would announce today that it renounces this wrong-minded proposal. If this were done today, the city of New York could proceed to raise $450 million to finance ongoing operations.

Mr. President, it is rather incredible to believe that the Treasury of the United States and that the chairmen of the taxwriting committees of both Houses would seek to end the tax-exempt status of municipal bonds. Not just future bonds, but even the municipal bonds issued decades ago. This has been accomplished by the proposal to include tax-exempt interest in a new minimum tax. The result of this shortsighted move is to shut down the municipal bond market.

This is not an esoteric subject. People may say, "What does the municipal bond market have to do with me?" It means that local government, when it goes to raise revenues for paving the streets, building the bridges, repairing the hospitals, taking care of the municipal sewage treatment plants, can no longer sell low cost bonds. Why? Because the nameless, faceless gnomes in the bowels of the Treasury have finally had it their way. They have finally been able to get into legislative language a proposal that really says that municipalities will no longer have tax exempt status; they will no longer enjoy that.

Maybe it is going to bring revenues to the Treasury of the United States, although I doubt it. What about the cost? It is going to wind up costing the taxpayers, the municipalities, the local governments from $8 billion to as much as $24 billion a year more.

We are simply shifting to the local taxpayers an incredible cost, because municipalities will no longer be able to sell bonds at 2 percent lower than traditional taxable rate.

Mr. President, I have sent a letter today to Secretary Baker, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 20, 1986.

JAMES A. BAKER III,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, DC

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Yesterday the municipal bond market ceased to exist. This was as direct result of a provision contained in the tax reform proposal drafted by the Chairman of the Finance Committee. This provision would include all tax-exempt interest earned on bonds issued in the past and the future in a new minimum tax. As a result, the tax-exempt status of all municipal securities is in doubt. It is my understanding that this provision was included in the Chairman's proposal at the request of the Treasury Department.

The inclusion of tax-exempt interest in a minimum tax is unfair and probably unconstitutional. Furthermore, the President's tax proposal specifically excluded tax-exempt interest from the minimum tax.

According to an industry trade group, this provision will raise municipal interest costs from $8 billion to $124 billion through 1990. In New York State, it is estimated that interest costs will rise from $562 million to $1.5 billion. This will result in higher taxes or reduced services.

What truly frustrates me is that the Chairmen of the two tax writing Committees of Congress, with the concurrence of the Treasury Department, recently issued a statement delaying the effective date of general obligation bonds to September 1, 1986. Based on this, many cities and states planned to issue bonds. These bond issues had to be delayed indefinitely. For instance, the City of New York had to postpone a $450 million bond issue designed to fund numerous vital projects.

In short, what Treasury gave municipalities by delaying the effective date has been taken away. I urge you to issue a statement renouncing the Treasury supported provison including tax-exempt interest in a minimum tax. Only in this way can local government, such as the City of New York, proceed with financing legitimate government services.

Sincerely,

ALFONSE M. D'AMATO,
U.S. Senator.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, in my letter I pointed out how the inclusion of tax-exempt interest in a minimum tax frustrates the legitimate efforts of local government, and how it will cost the taxpayers of every municipality in this Nation billions of dollars.

I suggest, Mr. President, that it is typical of what the tax reform effort has accomplished. Or I should say not accomplished. A proposal that was supposed to bring tax simplification, that was supposed to be fair, ends up causing incredible hardship on the American citizens.

If these efforts continue, I think we should end consideration of the tax reform. It is ill-conceived and unconstitutional to include tax-exempt interest in a minimum tax. Worse still, the proposal is retroactive. The proposal would tax people who purchased municipal bonds the past 10 years with the expectation that the interest would be tax free.

Mr. President, I do not wish to speak longer on this subject, because I could speak for days.

I yield the floor back to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS], my good friend, and I thank him for his courtesy in allowing me to put this in the RECORD. I do not think we should stand still while the cities and the taxpayers of this Nation are imperiled as the result of this shortsightedness of the Treasury Department.

Mr. HOLLINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from New York. He is right on target. Marking up the bipartisan budget, as we were on yesterday afternoon, it would interest the Senator from New York to know that, as budgeteers, we reacted in horror to hear that someone was going to suggest not only disallowing the tax-exempt nature of municipal bonds but also making it retroactive and terrifying the bond market. We could not understand that. We got into a very close discussion with respect to revenue sharing.

I happen to have been in the Senate in February 1, 1967, 19 years and 1 month ago. I came up here in 1966. I got with the legislative counsel. I got a revenue-sharing bill introduced on February 1, 1967, to assist the local communities who were assisting themselves. The Senator's former colleague, the distinguished Senator Robert Kennedy, said to me, "FRITZ, I can tell you now we cannot allow all that money to go to Albany, just to the State. The city of New York will get very little of it."

You can look at the Kennedy bill, under the Johnson administration, because the statement was made that this was a President Nixon initiative. The fact is that Senator Robert Kennedy put in a bill—word for word, our particular bill that came out of the legislative counsel—allocating it, instead of to the States, to the municipalities and counties of America. That is how we started on this initiative. It was for all those areas that were making a tax or revenue effort, a reasonable revenue effort themselves, to be rewarded and to take on these new things coming from this so-called Great Society.

We were making the local communities far more conscious of the various needs of environment and law enforcement and better-trained law enforcement officers in those particular days of demonstrations and everything else. So, not to pay the law enforcement officers, not to pay the firemen, but for these special programs offloading these responsibilities—frankly, we wanted to have a program instituted of revenue sharing.

Yesterday afternoon, in voting on that budget, we had a close vote with respect to revenue sharing. It did not pass—meaning that we fence in this particular budget one-half if it is authorized, one-half of the amount. Last year, in all candor, we told the municipal and county officials that we doubted we could continue it this year but count on it through September 1986 because we just have run out of revenue to share. We do not have any revenue, as is obvious from the high deficits and the big national debt. So here we are, and we have started under the so-called Federal leadership of bringing into being these programs at the local level, cutting off the wherewithal with respect to revenue sharing and now saying, even if you want to do it and take on the finanical burden and debt yourself, by gosh, we are not going to let you do that.

We just want you to have the responsibility with no way in the world to respond, because everybody knows on the basic property tax, there has been vote after vote on Proposition 13 and Proposition 2½, and proposition this and proposition that. On real property itself, as in Kansas City, the local city father has gone about as far as he can go, so he has to issue municipal bonds to come up with these particular needs.

Now, they come with this nonsensical proposition. I do not know if it will pass. I know it could not pass in the Senate Budget Committee.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I think my distinguished colleague from South Carolina is absolutely correct. I cannot believe either of the Houses would want to tax municipal bonds retroactively. Yet what they have done is to terminate the bond market and literally all sales of these bonds have been withheld. There will be a premium paid by States and cities because of the uncertainty in the future.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Right.

Mr. D'AMATO. Driving the cost up to whom? Working middle-class homeowners, the taxpayers. As the Senator from South Carolina put it, it is one of the incredible inconsistencies that exists today.

First we shift more spending on to local government. Then we say that cities and States cannot issue bonds to finance activities that the Federal Government can no longer afford. The Treasury is trying to make it more costly for local government to undertake these projects, whether building roads or hospitals? It does not make sense. I agree with my colleague.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I am pleased the Senator from New York has brought this to the attention of the body this afternoon. It is very important that we reestablish the confidence of the domestic market. We have no idea in the Senate, as far as this Senator is concerned, of passing anything of that nature. We do have a better appreciation and understanding of the wonderful public purpose we have in tax-exempt municipal bonds. That has been given for many, many years.

Mr. D'AMATO. If I might suggest to my colleague what I see taking place, it is this idea of setting up a straw man—the straw man of the wealthy American who pays no taxes. Treasury says we should not allow people to buy municipal bonds to avoid taxes. This is really fallacious because in the long run, the cost to the average taxpayer is going to go up by doing away with the tax-exempt governmental purpose bonds. We are not talking about private-sector bonds but governmental purpose bonds that our local villages, towns, and cities must use to keep costs down.

This is the battle. Treasury is going to say, I am for the rich guy. I would like the record to be set straight that I am for working middle-class families. I am for local government. I am not for getting a huge burden put on local government. I want a fair minimum tax, but that does not tax municipal bonds.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I am sure the record would show that, in the New York bond market, the majority of those are widows and persons with families who are trying to maintain the little estate that is left. Not the rich, not the idle rich. They do not want this money, they are not waiting for the payoff of the municipal bond. They are not looking for that stability. They want to make more. I can tell you, Mr. President, that group that is really rich can invest in far more than municipal bonds. If you have a trust, an estate, if you are a widow who is left, and says, "Well, now, I don't have any income. I have lost John. How am I going to pay doctor bills and other bills?" The banker or local trust officer will say, "Put it in some municipal bonds; it is a good payout to you in a general sense and you will not be paying all those taxes."

That is the gap that is filling in the investment community, not the real rich.

Some of them come along and get some of that. But they make more money out of other things, way more than municipal bonds will return.

Mr. D'AMATO. The Senator makes a good point. In my State, many of middle-income people have invested their extra money, good sound savings, in municipals.

I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I thank the Senator from New York.

RETROACTIVE BOND INTEREST

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, Senator PACKWOOD has assured me that this issue will be brought up at the beginning of the next meeting of the Finance Committee, which is to be at 9:30, next Monday morning.

I am confident that the committee will not agree to the last-minute change that makes the interest provisions on tax-exempt bonds retroactive.

The concern has been that even with a strengthened minimum tax, so long as large holders of tax-exempt bonds can continue to exclude interest from the calculation of minimum tax, there will continue to be a number of taxpayers who pay no tax despite large incomes.

This is a legitimate concern, but does not overcome the objection to retroactive tax provisions, nor does it protect small holders who will see the value of their investment decline in consequence of its lesser value to large holders.

ASSISTANCE TO DEMOCRATIC RESISTANCE IN NICARAGUA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT DURING RECESS—PM 123

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on March 19, 1986, during the recess of the Senate, received the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

Since I transmitted my message to the Congress on February 25 requesting additional assistance for the Nicaraguan democratic resistance, I have heard from many thoughtful Members of Congress, as well as from Latin American leaders and the leaders of the Nicaraguan democratic resistance. Many have raised the question of how the additional authority I have requested could be implemented so as to help persuade the Government of Nicaragua to engage in a serious effort to resolve the conflict in Central America through peaceful means.

I am determined to make every effort to protect our vital interests and achieve peace without further loss of life. That is why on February 10 I proposed simultaneous talks by the Government of Nicaragua—with their opposition and with the United States. That is why on February 25 I affirmed my commitment to direct the additional assistance I have requested toward a comprehensive and verifiable agreement among the countries of Central America, based on the Contadora Document of Objectives. And that is why on March 7 I appointed Ambassador Philip Habib as my special envoy for Central America.

On Sunday night, I described to the American people the threat to our security that confronts us in Central America. As I said then, we are still willing to pursue vigorously a diplomatic effort to achieve a lasting peace. Approval of my request for additional assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance does not mean that a military solution is inevitable. It is, however, essential that the Congress act now to approve this assistance if diplomacy is to have a chance. Accordingly, I am providing in this message a further explanation of how I will implement the authority I have requested.

If the Congress approves my request I will send my special envoy on an urgent mission to the capitals of the Contadora and Support Group nations. He will ask them to join with us in urging the Government of Nicaragua to initiate a national dialogue with representatives of all elements of the democratic opposition, designed to achieve the goals set out in the widely heralded proposal announced by six opposition Nicaraguan political parties on February 7, 1986. Their proposal, which has been endorsed by the Nicaraguan democratic resistance, calls for an immediate cease-fire, an effective general amnesty, abolition of the state of emergency, agreement on a new electoral process and general elections, effective fulfillment of international commitments for democratization, and observance of implementation by relevant international groups and bodies.

President Duarte's additional proposal for simultaneous dialogue with the Salvadoran guerrillas, a proposal endorsed by the democratic Presidents of Costa Rica, Honduras, and Guatemala, reinforces the importance of an internal dialogue in Nicaragua to address the objectives of the six-party proposal of February 7.

In order to give the Government of Nicaragua every reasonable opportunity to respond favorably, and to provide an incentive for a positive response, I will limit the assistance to be provided to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance for 90 days following approval of my request to the following:

(1) humanitarian assistance, as defined in section 722(g) of P.L. 99-83, including support for programs and activities to strengthen respect for human rights;

(2) logistics advice and assistance;

(3) equipment and supplies necessary for defense against air attack;

(4) support for democratic political and diplomatic activities; and

(5) training in radio communications, collection and utilization of intelligence, logistics, and small-unit skills and tactics.

Following this 90-day period, additional types of assistance will be provided to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance only if—

(1) I have determined, after consultation with the Congress,

(a) that the Central American countries have not concluded a comprehensive agreement based on the Contadora Document of Objectives;

(b) the Government of Nicaragua is not engaged in a serious dialogue with representatives of all elements of the democratic opposition, accompanied by a cease-fire and an effective end to the existing constraints on freedom of speech, assembly, and religion; and

(c) there is no reasonable prospect of achieving these developments through further diplomatic measures, multilateral or bilateral, without additional assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance;

(2) I have reported my determination to the Congress; and

(3) Fifteen days have elapsed following my report to the Congress, during which the Congress may take such legislative or other action as it deems appropriate.

Should the conditions described in subparagraph (a) or (b) of paragraph (1) later be achieved, assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance will again be limited to the categories, described above, available during the initial 90 days following approval of my request, for so long as the Government of Nicaragua acts in good faith to maintain those conditions.

In order to keep the Congress fully and currently informed of developments relating to diplomatic efforts to achieve a peaceful resolution of the conflict during the 90 days following approval of my request, I will appoint a special bipartisan commission to report on negotiations, whose reports will be made available to the Congress. This commission shall be composed of individuals, none of whom shall be a Member or employee of the Congress or an officer or employee of the United States, recommended by the Speaker and Minority Leader of the House of Representatives and the Majority and Minority Leaders of the Senate, with a fifth member of the commission to be recommended by the four other commissioners.

This approach represents a sincere effort to achieve peace through negotiations. In order to further this effort, I will make $2,000,000 of the funds I have requested for assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance available to the Central American democracies (Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras) to facilitate their participation in regional meetings and negotiations. In addition, I will encourage those countries and the Contadora and Support Group nations to make regular and public reports on the status of negotiations, the likelihood of achieving a comprehensive agreement, progress toward national reconciliation, and the obstacles thereto.

Moreover, the United States will assist all indigenous groups which are committed to work together for democratic national reconciliation in Nicaragua based on the six-party proposal.

We will require only that they respect international standards of conduct, refraining from violations of human rights or other criminal acts, and that they work together toward this common goal.

In this regard, the democratic resistance has been broadening its representative base. The United Nicaraguan Opposition (UNO) now includes the largest of the Indian/Creole resistance groups (KISAN), and has forged cooperative relationships with other democratic resistance elements. The UNO has also engaged in constructive discussions with the Southern Opposition Bloc (BOS). And UNO has further strengthened unity by ensuring that all its military forces are responsive to its civilian leadership. We wholeheartedly support these developments and will encourage the democratic opposition to take further steps that will increase its unity and its appeal to the Nicaraguan people. Toward this end, I will reserve not less than $10,000,000 of the funds I have requested for assistance to resistance forces otherwise eligible and not currently included within UNO, one-half of which shall be for BOS and one-half shall be for the Indian resistance force Misurasata.

However, no group shall receive assistance from the United States if it retains in its ranks any individual who engages in—

(1) gross violations of human rights (including summary executions, torture, kidnapping, forced recruitment, or other such violations of the integrity of the person); or

(2) drug smuggling, or significant misuse of public or private funds.

There are two other issues, relating to funding, that I ask you to consider.

First, there has been inaccurate public speculation about what additional funds for assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance might be available beyond the $100 million for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 that I have requested be transferred from amounts already appropriated to the Department of Defense. I want to state unequivocally that I will not augment this $100 million through the use of CIA or any other funds that have not been approved by the Congress for this purpose.

Second, when I proposed to the Congress a Central America Democracy, Peace, and Development Initiative to implement the recommendations of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, I included Nicaragua among the countries that could benefit from this initiative. The Congress accepted my recommendation in enacting a new chapter of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. The Congress also authorized in that act, as the Bipartisan Commission recommended and I requested, the appropriation of the full $1,200,000,000 in nonmilitary assistance for Central America for fiscal years 1988 and 1989. However, the current authorization for fiscal year 1987 falls short of this goal. This, combined with appropriations shortfalls from previous years, is an obstacle to timely progress. I will ask the Secretary of State, the Administrator of the Agency for International Development, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to develop a plan to overcome the funding shortfalls that have occurred. In addition, I urge the Congress to provide the full amounts of economic assistance I have requested in my budget for fiscal year 1987 so that the necessary long-term commitment urged by the Bipartisan Commission will be fulfilled, and so that the promises of peace and freedom will be realized throughout Central America.

Upon the enactment of a joint resolution approving my request, I shall issue an Executive order to provide for the implementation of the undertakings I have expressed in this message and in my message of February 25. The Secretary of State, or his designee, will be responsible, under my direction for policy guidance and coordination of United States Government activities under that Executive order.

In conclusion, I must stress that our diplomacy cannot succeed without the demonstrated resolve of the United States to protect its own interests and those of the brave men and women who are fighting for democracy in Central America. The time for decision is now. Your vote on my request will be a fateful one. I need and urge your support on this vital issue.

RONALD REAGAN.

TREATMENT OF PAY UNDER FEDERAL PREVAILING RATE PAY SYSTEMS

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to reconcile an oversight that affects a special group of Federal employees. A provision in Gramm-Rudman-Hollings intended to protect rates of pay and pay increases of Federal employees omits those employees whose salaries are based on the prevailing rate pay system. Section 256g of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings prohibits agencies from reducing the basic rate of pay or eliminating any scheduled increase in rates of pay for military personnel and Federal employee pay under a "statutory pay system"—General Schedule. Although I opposed Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, I am, indeed, pleased that it was given final approval with this provision included.

However, I am quite concerned that it only provides coverage for employees who are subject to the General Schedule [GS] but does not extend coverage to employees who are subject to the "prevailing rate" pay system. I am certain that Congress did not intend a partial personnel exemption from sequestration orders, when Gramm-Rudman-Hollings was enacted, and my bill will correct this oversight. Without this legislation, pursuant to a spending reduction order under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, the salaries of agency personnel not covered by the provision are to be considered part of the agency's "administrative costs" and therefore, are subject to reductions. It is almost inevitable that this will happen if my legislation isn't enacted. Therefore I urge my colleagues to join me in extending the same protection assured GS Federal employees to all Federal employees and support early passage of this critical piece of legislation.●

INTERIM FUNDING FOR SUPERFUND

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am today introducing two pieces of legislation which represent alternative methods of providing interim funding for the Superfund Program through May 31 of this year. I am joined in this effort by Senators STAFFORD and BENTSEN, chairman and ranking minority member of the environment and Public Works Committee, Senator LEAHY, ranking minority member of the HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriations Subcommittee, and Senators CHAFEE, MITCHELL, DURENBERGER, BAUCUS, MOYNIHAN, HUMPHREY, BURDICK, BRADLEY, KENNEDY, HATFIELD, and GORE.

Taxing authority for the Superfund Program expired on October 1, 1985. The trust fund is virtually depleted. On April 1, the Environmental Protection Agency will begin to dismantle Superfund by terminating contracts with companies that are currently involved in cleanup actions. Enforcement actions will be reduced by half and no new cases will be developed. Emergency removals will be curtailed by 80 percent. And, EPA would only be able to handle three or four major emergencies a month. Last month, EPA began the process of furloughing its own employees.

We cannot permit this dismantling of the program to occur. It is not possible to start and stop a program the size and complexity of the Superfund Program without irreparable damage.

The House of Representatives and the Senate last year approved legislation reauthorizing the Superfund Program. The House bill provides for slightly over a $10 billion program. The Senate bill calls for $7.5 billion. But, the administration has held out for a program of only $5.3 billion. In addition, other controversial issues separate the two Houses and the administration on this complicated legislation.

A House-Senate Superfund conference has been meeting regularly to resolve differences between the House and Senate bills since it convened late last month. Nevertheless, there is no realistic prospect that the conference will be able to complete its work prior to the congressional Easter recess. Our legislation is designed to keep pressure on the conference to complete its work, but provide enough funding to protect the integrity of the Superfund Program until a 5-year reauthorization bill is enacted into law.

Time is of the essence. We have 1 week left before the Congress adjourns for the recess, leaving EPA to dismantle the Superfund Program. Along with my cosponsors, I strongly support a 5-year reauthorization bill to enlarge and strengthen the Superfund Program. But, we feel that while the conference continues to work on this bill, it would be irresponsible to permit the dismemberment of this program. If we do not provide this interim funding, Superfund will suffer serious and, perhaps, irreversible harm.

Today I am introducing two proposals to provide interim funding for Superfund. They would provide $150 million for 2 months, a level consistent with the annual rate of funding provided in the fiscal year 1986 HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriations bill. This legislation is necessary because that money remains fenced, pending a reauthorization bill or further action by the Congress. Our legislation would unfence $150 million of the $861 milion provided by that bill after the March 1 Gramm-Rudman sequester order.

The first bill is an emergency supplemental appropriation of $150 million from the General Fund into the Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund. Under this bill, funds would be available immediately as repayable advances.

The second bill would extend the Superfund taxing authority that expired last fall for a period of time sufficient to generate $150 million in revenues, to be available through Mar. 31, 1986 as a repayable advance from the General Fund against these receipts.

The objective of both pieces of legislation is to assure adequate funding to keep Superfund intact and functioning effectvely without removing the incentive to complete action on reauthorization of the program. The HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriations Act (Public Law 99-160) included an appropriation of $900 million from the Trust Fund to support Superfund Program activities. That amount was reduced to $861.3 million by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequester on March 1.

The problem is that, with the expiration of Superfund taxes last fall, the resources in the trust fund are inadequate to support this level of operation and the moneys are now "fenced" pending further action. The bills I am introducing today would infuse enough money into the Trust Fund to release 2 month's worth of the 1986 Superfund appropriation.

Mr. President, it does not matter which of these alternatives the Congress chooses to enact. But it is imperative that we enact one or the other before the Easter recess begins on March 27. The Superfund Program is rapidly running out of money and will actually start shutting down operations as of April 1.

We cannot allow this to happen. Contractors must be able to count on work in the pipeline, or else they have to lay off employees. EPA personnel need the resources to do their jobs. And, it is important that we let them know that they will have a job, to ward off morale problems, and loss of talent at EPA.

There is no way to replace the knowledge, technical skill, and experience embodied in contractor project teams at a moment's notice. It takes time to build organizational resources of this kind. EPA Administrator Thomas testified last Wednesday before the HUD-Independent Appropriations Subcommittee that it would take at least a full year to get contractors back on board once their contracts were terminated. And that assumes that they would want to come back on board after having been cut off—a questionable proposition at best.

Mr. President, it would be unwise to provide open-ended financing for Superfund at this point. To do so would almost guarantee prolonged and even more difficult negotiations among the two Houses and the administration on the issues that remain to be resolved. The result could well be a stalemate that would kill the chance of a reauthorization bill during this session of Congress. It would force us to start from scratch next year. No one wants to see that happen. For this reason, the legislation I am proposing would limit the availability of program funding, making funds available only until May 31.

Mr. President, we must move quickly. We have about a week before we recess. We have about 2 weeks before EPA begins dismembering Superfund. The Senate likes to move in a deliberative manner. A week is seldom enough time to get a measure through a subcommittee, let alone enacted. But I also know that when a real emergency exists, the Congress can respond. We have seen that over the past few weeks on farm legislation. I am confident that, working together, we can meet this challenge.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this legislation and to support efforts to move this bill as quickly as possible.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter that I have sent to Majority Leader DOLE, along with my cosponsors, be printed in the RECORD, along with a copy of each bill, for the information of my colleagues.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, March 19, 1986.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Majority Leader,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR BOB: Today we introduced legislation to provide short-term, interim funding for the Superfund program. We are writing to seek your assistance in providing a vehicle for the Senate to consider this issue before we recess for the Easter break.

As you know, taxing authority for the Superfund program expired on October 1, 1985. The trust fund is virtually depleted. On April 1, EPA will begin to dismantle Superfund by terminating contracts with companies that are currently involved in cleanup actions. Enforcement actions will be reduced by half and no new cases will be developed. Emergency removals will be curtailed by 80%. And, EPA would only be able to handle 3 or 4 major emergencies a month. Last month, EPA began the process of furloughing its own employees.

We cannot permit this dismantling of the program to take place. It is not possible to stop a program the size and complexity of the Superfund program and start it over again without irreparable damage.

The Superfund conference has been meeting regularly since it convened late last month. Nevertheless, there is no realistic prospect that the conference will be able to complete its work prior to the Easter recess. Our legislation is designed to keep pressure on the conference to complete its work, but provide enough funding to protect the integrity of the Superfund program.

We have introduced two proposals to provide interim funding for Superfund. They would provide $150 million for 60 days, a level consistent with the annual rate provided in the FY86 HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriations bill.

One proposal would extend the existing Superfund tax to raise $150 million for the program, with the funds available for obligation from April 1 to May 31 as a repayable advance. The second proposal would merely make a direct appropriation of $150 million available to the program as a repayable advance, without extending Superfund taxing authority.

Both proposals require EPA to operate the program at a pace and scale consistent with one-quarter of the post-sequester FY86 appropriation of $861 million.

Time is of the essence. We have one week left before the Congress adjourns for the recess, leaving EPA to dismantle the Superfund program. We all support a full, five-year reauthorization bill for Superfund. But, we feel that while the conference continues to work on this bill, it would be irresponsible to permit the dismemberment of this program. If we do not provide this interim funding, Superfund will suffer serious and, perhaps, irreversible harm.

Calendar Order 393, H.R. 3629, is pending on the calendar and could be used as a vehicle for a direct appropriations bill. If a short-term extension of existing Superfund taxes, combined with an unfencing of FY86 monies is preferable, a House-passed revenue measure in the Finance Committee could be used.

We urge you to give our proposals serious consideration and schedule an appropriate bill for Senate consideration as quickly as possible.

Sincerely,

Robert T. Stafford, Patrick J. Leahy, John H. Chafee, Dave Durenberger, Gordon J. Humphrey, Quentin N. Burdick, Frank R. Lautenberg, Lloyd Bentsen, George J. Mitchell, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, Max Baucus, Edward M. Kennedy, Bill Bradley.●

By Mr. BRADLEY (for himself, Mr. GLENN, and Mr. WILSON):

S. 2213. A bill to amend section 406 of title 37, United States Code, to authorize transportation for the dependents and household effects of a member of a uniformed service who received a punitive discharge, is dismissed from service, or is sentenced to a certain period of confinement, and to amend chapter 55 of title 10, United States Code, to authorize certain medical and dental care for certain dependents of members of the uniformed services who receive a punitive discharge or are dismissed for abuse of dependents; to the Committee on Armed Services.

MILITARY DEPENDENTS PROTECTION ACT

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, on behalf of my distinguished colleagues, Senator GLENN and Senator WILSON, I send a bill to the desk and ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. President, this bill corrects a serious problem suffered by a small but significant population—military dependents who have been physically or sexually abused by a member of the military who is less than honorably discharged from the service.

This matter came to my attention when I tried to help one of my constituents, a military wife, who had a tragic problem. Her husband had sexually abused their children. When she reported him through appropriate military channels, court martial proceedings were initiated. She then realized that after many years in the service with her husband, she and her children were going to lose all benefits, including those that would help them cope with the crisis of family violence. She felt that she had no choice but to plead for leniency for her husband. Despite the fact that he had sexually abused her children, and despite her efforts to protect those children, she and her children would be further jeopardized if her husband were punished.

I contacted the military authorities on her behalf but was told that under current law, there was no way to help this family. As frustrated as I was trying to assist in this case, I learned that, unfortunately, it was not an isolated case. I believe that we have a special obligation to those families who are victimized by the military spouse.

Mr. President, dependents who have been physically or sexually abused by a member of the military are in double jeopardy. Many choose to endure the abuse rather than report it and face, not only the shame of being victimized, but also the loss of benefits that may be critical to cope with this crisis. Loss of the breadwinner is a major disincentive in the civilian population that frequently deters mothers from reporting violence against themselves and their dependent children. Military dependents are even more vulnerable. In addition to loss of support, they are denied access to medical treatment necessary to deal with their situation.

Mr. President, research and clinical evidence on family violence points to the victims' need for therapeutic intervention. These families need, at the very least, to have their medical needs attended to for a transitory period until they can reestablish themselves in the civilian community. This legislation would provide dependents who have suffered through intrafamilial physical and sexual abuse a year of such medical care. Physically and sexually abused children can be helped, but only if they are provided with appropriate intervention. Without help, the intergenerational cycle of abuse is allowed to persist unabated such that the abused children of today are most likely to become the abusive parents of tomorrow.

Mr. President, the military has made great strides in recent years to address the problems of child and spousal abuse. Victims of this hidden violence must not be allowed to fall through the cracks of both military and civilian communities when the military member is discharged under less than honorable circumstances.

Mr. President, an immediate problem faced by all families of less than honorably discharged military members is that they are abandoned far from family and support networks. They must vacate military housing, usually within 30 days, but are not entitled to movement of their household goods. A sympathetic base commander may allow the family to remain in military housing a bit longer than permitted, or the Red Cross may step in with assistance.

Mr. President, military dependents frequently relocate with the military member, as often as every few years. Military families deserve a minimum level of security that if their spouse or parent violates the law, they will not be abandoned in a place far from their home of origin and their support networks. This legislation will ensure that such families are able to move back to their homes, where they can resume their lives. After uprooting for a military move every few years, they should not find themselves far from family and friends, with no way to get home.

Mr. President, all families, civilian and military, whose spouses and parents engage in wrongdoing suffer. However, in the military, problems are exacerbated since families are isolated from kin and frequently without the longer term friendships that families outside of the military can establish in their communities. Also, with frequent moves, about which they have little say, spouses do not have the same opportunities as their civilian counterparts to develop their own careers to provide economic security.

Mr. President, this legislation would assure families that if they make a commitment to support those defending our country, they will not be abandoned by our Government. It will assure them that if they are subjected to intrafamilial physical or sexual assault they will not be denied medical treatment when they are most in need of it. It will provide dependents with their minimal need to return to their homes if, through the wongdoings of their spouses and parents, they are no longer under the protection of military.

Mr. President, when I was first made aware of this problem, it seemed impossible that we would allow families to be so unduly punished and abandoned by our Government that they have tried to serve. Yet, that is the case today. While the military spouse has behaved badly, and been separated from the service as a result, it does not seem fair to unduly jeopardize the future of those family members who in good faith have supported the defense of our country. This legislation makes help possible.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2213

(2) The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply to contracts entered into under section 1079(a) of title 10, United States Code, on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator BRADLEY and Senator WILSON in introducing this legislation to help alleviate some of the problems caused by the tragedy of spouse abuse or child abuse in military families.

The existence of spouse and child abuse is a tragic reality that pervades all segments of our society, including the military. Although the Defense Department estimates that the number of military members discharged from the services each year for some form of dependent abuse is probably only in the hundreds, this relatively small number does not diminish the seriousness of this problem or the need for this legislation.

This bill would give the Secretaries of the military departments discretionary authority to provide a permanent change of station separation move to dependents of military members who receive an other than honorable discharge, and to provide medical care in a military medical facility or under CHAMPUS for dependents of a military member convicted of dependent abuse for up to 1 year after the member's discharge from the service.

Under current law (10 U.S.C. 404, 406), a military member who is discharged from the service under other than honorable conditions is provided a permanent change of station separation move for himself and his dependents "only by transportation in kind by the least expensive mode of transportation available or by a monetary allowance that does not exceed the cost to the Government of such transportation in kind."

The effect of this provision is to deny dependents of military members separated from the service under other than honorable conditions any ability to move their household goods at Government expense as part of a separation move.

The effect of this provision, however, has been limited to military members serving in the continental United States. Section 406(h) of title 10 currently gives the service Secretaries discretionary authority to provide a full permanent change of station move to return military members and their families from overseas areas "if the Secretary concerned determines it to be in the best interests of the member or his dependents and the United States." In practice, the service Secretaries have been using this discretionary authority to provide a full permanent change of station separation move to most military members, their dependents and their household goods who are discharged overseas under other than honorable conditions.

Section 1 of our legislation would provide the same discretionary authority for the service Secretaries to provide a full permanent change of station separation move for a military member with dependents who is separated under other than honorable conditions in the United States that currently exists in overseas areas. Under this authority, the service Secretary could authorize a full permanent change of station separation move for a military member with dependents who is discharged from the service for other than honorable conditions if he determined such a move to be in the best interests of the member, his dependents, or the United States. The sole purpose of this discretionary authority, Mr. President, is to allow the service Secretaries to mitigate the hardship on the family members in the case of a military member who is discharged under other than honorable conditions.

Our legislation contains one change to current practice in this area. Currently, military members are authorized a permanent change of station separation move no longer than the move necessary to go from their final duty station to their home of record. Our legislation provides the service Secretary discretionary authority to provide a permanent change of station move to an "appropriate location," which in some instances could be beyond the home of record.

The purpose of this change is to give the service Secretaries discretionary authority to provide military dependents who may have been the victims of dependent abuse a permanent change of station separation move to a supportive environment that may be beyond the military member's home of record. In providing this authority, however, we expect the Defense Department to use their rulemaking authority to provide transportation beyond the home of record only when absolutely necessary and only in cases of dependent abuse. The Manpower and Personnel Subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee will carefully monitor the implementation of this provision to ensure that the military services comply with the intent of this legislation.

With the second provision of our legislation, Mr. President, we are fulfilling a moral obligation to the victims of dependent abuse in military families. Section 2 of our bill gives the service Secretary discretionary authority to provide medical care in a military medical facility or under CHAMPUS, upon request, to the abused dependents of a military member who receives a dishonorable or bad-conduct charge or who is dismissed from the service as a result of a court-martial conviction for an offense involving abuse of a dependent of the member.

Under current law, the dependents of a military member discharged from the service for spouse abuse or child abuse lose all eligibility for medical care in a military medical facility or under CHAMPUS when the member leaves the service. In essence, because they lose all benefits through no fault of their own, these dependents are victimized a second time. They may be left with no apparent means of support, and are also denied basic, necessary medical care that may be required as a result of injury inflicted by the former service member.

Our bill would allow victims of dependent abuse, upon request, to continue to receive medical care at Government expense for up to 1 year following the military member's discharge. This care would be provided under the same priority system and on the same space available basis as if the member were still in service.

Mr. President, the Defense Department has been unable to identify the exact number of military members discharged from the services each year for some form of dependent abuse. The number is relatively small—probably in the hundreds—and as a result the cost of extending medical care to the victims of dependent abuse in these cases will be small.

In closing, I want to commend Senator BRADLEY for bringing this matter to the attention of the Manpower and Personnel Subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

We have a moral obligation to assist abused dependents of military members in restoring their health and well-being. Unfortunately, we can't legislate away spouse abuse or child abuse in the military or in any other segment of society. But we can try to create a supportive environment in which the victims can recover from this tragedy. That is the purpose of this legislation.●

By Mr. LUGAR (for himself, Mr. LEAHY, and Mr. PROXMIRE):

S. 2215. A bill to amend the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act to ensure safer pesticides and to better protect the public and the environment, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

FEDERAL INSECTICIDE, FUNGICIDE, AND RODENTICIDE ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill to amend the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act [FIFRA]. This act establishes the standards and procedures by which the Environmental Protection Agency regulates the production and application of pesticides used for agricultural purposes, as well as for many general household products.

The bill is a bipartisan effort that reflects an accord reached between the National Agricultural Chemicals Association, a trade association representing 92 manufacturing companies, and the Campaign for Pesticide Reform, a coalition of 41 environmental, consumer, and labor groups. The accord addresses some 13 broad areas in FIFRA where there has been traditional disagreement among these groups.

I am very encouraged by the willingness of the agricultural chemical industry and the public interest groups to negotiate their differences and develop bipartisan solutions to difficult problems. The Congress has not enacted amendments to FIFRA since 1978 and clearly the opportunities for passage of such amendments were very limited as long as the chemical industry and the environmental groups remained at odds. Farmers, environmentalists, as well as the chemical manufacturing industry, suffered as a result of this stalemate.

The most fundamental change proposed by this bill is the reregistration of pesticides marketed prior to the creation of FIFRA in 1972. These products were registered using standards that are not reflective of today's more stringent testing requirements. For nearly 13 years, the current statute has instructed the Environmental Protection Agency to reregister these pesticides using today's standards. Progress in this area has been slow with more than 600 active ingredients remaining on the market. This bill proposes an aggressive reregistration program whereby each of these active ingredients must be reregistered within 7 years. The manufacturer of the reregistered pesticide is assessed a fee in order to assist the Environmental Protection Agency in meeting these aggressive reregistration deadlines.

In addition to the reregistration question, the bill requires the Environmental Protection Agency to cancel a pesticide registration if the registrant has willfully submitted false or invalid data to support such a registration. The bill limits the use of conditional registrations until the registrant has provided adequate health and safety data.

With regard to pesticides involved in international commerce, the bill prohibits food imports that contain residues exceeding the Government-established tolerance levels for pesticides. It also requires that U.S. pesticide manufacturers give foreign governments better notification prior to exporting canceled, suspended, or restricted-use pesticides.

For many years, chemical manufacturers and environmentalists have argued over this issue of the public's access to health and safety registration data. Environmentalists argued for full public disclosure and the industry pressed for limited releases in order to protect proprietary information. This accord calls upon the manufacturers to develop a summary of health and safety data. Such summaries shall be made available to the public upon request. In addition, the public will be allowed limited access to health and safety registration data prior to the Environmental Protection Agency's approval of a pesticide registration.

The bill increases the Environmental Protection Agency's authority to regulate inert ingredients with priority given to those inert ingredients that present the greatest risk to the environment. A case has been made that many inert ingredients which may be inactive to plants and pests may remain quite active and toxic to other life forms. I am aware of the concerns expressed by many groups for the regulation of inert ingredients and I can assure these groups that the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry will review this area carefully in the hearing process.

Mr. President, given the extent of this bipartisan effort, I do not claim to wholeheartedly endorse each provision contained in this bill. I believe, however, this legislation represents a good starting point to bring about needed changes if FIFRA. It is a good-faith effort to resolve major differences among competing interests.

As chairman of the Agricultural Research Conservation, Forestry and General Legislation Subcommittee, I am aware that some organizations have concerns with specific aspects of this bill. I am aware of concerns by the Environmental Protection Agency over the aggressive schedule for reregistration of old pesticides that has been proposed in this legislation. I would simply indicate that I am prepared to receive testimony from all interested and affected parties and will give full consideration to those concerned with certain aspects of this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this legislation and an executive summary be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TITLE I—PREREGISTRATION ACCESS TO DATA

SEC. 101. PREREGISTRATION ACCESS TO DATA.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 3(c) (7 U.S.C. 136a(c)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(9) PREREGISTRATION ACCESS TO DATA.—

"(A) Prior to the registration of a pesticide, the Administrator shall provide, in accordance with this paragraph, public access to health, safety, and environmental data that are submitted in support of an initial application for the registration of a new active ingredient or initial food use of a previously registered active ingredient.

"(B) The Administrator shall publish in the Federal Register a notice of such application in accordance with paragraph (4).

"(C) Not later than 30 days after the publication of such notice, to obtain access to the data referred to in subparagraph (A), a person must send by certified mail a request for such access and the affirmation referred to in subparagraph (E) simultaneously to the Administrator and to the applicant for the registration of the pesticide.

"(D) Not later than 15 days after receipt of a request for access to such data and affirmation, the Administrator shall grant or deny such request. The Administrator may not extend the 15-day period for acting on such request.

"(E)(i) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, data referred to in subparagraph (A) may be made available only to a person who provides an affirmation (and such supporting evidence as the Administrator considers necessary) that the person is neither employed by nor acting directly or indirectly on behalf of a person or entity engaged or affiliated with a person engaged in the production, sale, or distribution of a pesticide.

"(ii) For purposes of this subparagraph, an affiliate is a person who directly or indirectly, through one or more intermediates, controls or is controlled by or is under common control with the person specified.

"(iii) The affirmation required under clause (i) shall—

"(I) state that the person is neither employed by nor acting on behalf of any business or entity, or affiliate thereof, engaged in the production, sale, or distribution of a pesticide;

"(II) identify any business, employer, or other entity, if any, on whose behalf the person is requesting access to the data; and

"(III) affirm that the person will not intentionally or recklessly violate this paragraph.

"(iv) Section 1001 of title 18, United States Code, shall apply to an affirmation made under this subparagraph.

"(F)(i) Data relating to a pesticide shall be made available to a person only for the purpose of permitting the person to comment to the Administrator on the application for registration of the pesticide.

"(ii) Except as provided in clauses (iii) and (iv), data so obtained may not be—

"(I) published, copied, or transferred to any other individual or entity for use to obtain approval to sell, manufacture, or distribute a pesticide anywhere in the world; and

"(II) may not be used for any purpose in any court or agency of the United States or any State or political subdivision thereof prior to the decision of the Administrator on the registration of the pesticide or after such decision if the application for registration is denied.

"(iii) Data relating to a pesticide may be reasonably quoted in comments submitted to the Administrator. Such comments may not be made public prior to the decision of the Administrator on the registration of the pesticide or after such decision if the application for registration is denied.

"(iv) Such data and comments may be disclosed consistent with section 10 after registration of the pesticide.

"(G)(i) Data relating to a pesticide may be examined at an office of the Environmental Protection Agency or an appropriate State agency that complies with this section and may not be removed from such office.

"(ii) The Administrator shall maintain a record of the persons who inspect data. A copy of the record entry shall be sent to the data submitter.

"(iii) Once access to the data is granted, the data may be examined and comments on the application shall be filed within 60 days, unless extended an additional 30 days for good cause.

"(iv) If access to the data is denied, comments on the application shall be filed within 60 days from the determination of the Administrator denying access.".

(b) NOTICE OF APPLICATION.—Section 3(c)(4) (7 U.S.C. 136a(c)(4)) is amended—

(1) in the first sentence, by striking out "promptly" and inserting in lieu thereof "not later than 30 days"; and

(2) in the second sentence, by striking out "30" and inserting in lieu thereof "60".

SEC. 102. CRIMINAL PENALTIES FOR DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION.

Paragraph (3) of section 14(b) (7 U.S.C. 136l(b)(3)) is amended to read as follows:

"(3) DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION.—

"(A) Any person who, with intent to defraud, uses or reveals information relative to the formula of a product acquired under section 3, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than 3 years, or both.

"(B) Any person, including any officer, contractor, or employee of the United States or a State, who—

"(i) is granted access to data under section 3(c)(9); and

"(ii) in furtherance of a commercial purpose involving the production, registration, distribution, or sale of a pesticide—

"(I) knowingly violates such section; or

"(II) knowingly allows data to be made available in violation of such section, shall be fined not more than $100,000, or imprisoned for not more than 3 years, or both.".

TITLE II—CONDITIONAL REGISTRATION

SEC. 201. CONDITIONAL REGISTRATION.

Subparagraphs (B) and (C) of section 3(c)(7) (7 U.S.C. 136a(c)(7)(B) and (C)) are amended to read as follows:

"(B)(i) The Administrator may conditionally amend the registration of a pesticide to permit additional uses of such pesticide notwithstanding the fact that data concerning the pesticide may be insufficient to support an unconditional amendment, if the Administrator determines that—

"(I) the applicant has submitted all additional data that are required solely for the proposed additional use;

"(II) amending the registration in the manner proposed by the applicant would not materially increase the risk of any unreasonable adverse effect on the environment; and

"(III) the additional use is in the public interest.

"(ii) Notwithstanding clause (i), no registration of a pesticide may be amended to permit an additional use of such pesticide if the Administrator has issued a notice stating that such pesticide, or any ingredient thereof, meets or exceeds risk criteria associated in whole or in part with human dietary exposure specified in regulations issued under this Act.

"(iii) An applicant seeking amended registration under this subparagraph shall submit such data as would be required to obtain registration of a similar pesticide under paragraph (5).

"(iv) Except as provided in clause (v), if the applicant is unable to submit an item of data (other than data pertaining to the proposed additional use) because it has not yet been generated, the Administrator may amend the registration of a pesticide under such conditions as will require the submission of such data not later than the time such data are required to be submitted with respect to similar pesticides already registered under this Act.

"(v) If data concerning chronic toxicity (oncogenicity, reproductive effects, and mutagenicity), neurotoxicity, or teratogenicity are required for registration of an additional use of a pesticide that is not a minor use, and such a data requirement was in effect at the time the studies to obtain the data commenced, a conditional registration for such use shall not be granted under this subparagraph unless such data have been submitted.

"(vi) An amendment to an existing conditional registration, other than an amendment for an additional use, may be issued if the registrant has—

"(I) initiated necessary tests to secure such data, even though the data have not been submitted; and

"(II) satisfied the other requirements for the amendment of a conditional registration imposed under this paragraph.

"(C)(i) Except as provided in clauses (ii) and (iii), the Administrator may conditionally register a pesticide containing an active ingredient not contained in any registered pesticide for a period reasonably sufficient for generation and submission of required data (that are lacking because a period reasonably sufficient for generation of the data has not elapsed since the Administrator first imposed the data requirement) if—

"(I) by the end of such period the Administrator receives such data;

"(II) such data do not meet or exceed the risk criteria specified in regulations issued under this Act; and

"(III) such other conditions as the Administrator may prescribe are met.

"(ii) A conditional registration under this subparagraph shall be granted only if the Administrator determines that—

"(I) use of the pesticide during such period will not cause any unreasonable adverse effect on the environment; and

"(II) use of the pesticide is in the public interest.

"(iii) If data concerning chronic toxicity (oncogenicity, reproductive effects, and mutagenicity), neurotoxicity, or teratogenicity are required for registration of the pesticide, and such a data requirement was in effect at the time the studies to obtain the data commenced, a conditional registration shall not be granted under this subparagraph unless such data have been submitted.".

TITLE III—REREGISTRATION AND REVENUES

SEC. 301. DEFINITION OF OUTSTANDING DATA REQUIREMENT.

Section 2 (7 U.S.C. 136) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(ff) OUTSTANDING DATA REQUIREMENT.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'outstanding data requirement' means any study, required information, or data necessary to make a determination under section 3(c)(5) that—

"(A) has not been submitted to the Administrator; or

"(B) has been submitted to the Administrator but which the Administrator determines are not valid, complete, or adequate to make a determination under section 3 and the regulations and guidelines issued thereunder.

"(2) FACTORS.—In making a determination under paragraph (1)(B), the Administrator shall examine, at a minimum, relevant protocols, documentation of the conduct and analysis of the study, and the results of the study to determine whether the study and the results of the study fulfill the data requirement for which the study was submitted to the Administrator.".

SEC. 302. REREGISTRATION OF PESTICIDES.

Subsection (g) of section 3 (7 U.S.C. 136a(g)) is amended to read as follows:

"(g) REREGISTRATION OF PESTICIDES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The Administrator shall reregister each pesticide in accordance with this subsection.

"(2) LISTS OF PESTICIDE ACTIVE INGREDIENTS.—

"(A) Not later than 60 days after the effective date of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1986, the Administrator shall publish in the Federal Register a list of 300 pesticide active ingredients not reregistered since September 30, 1978, in the order of their priority, for reregistration under this Act.

"(B) Not later than 90 days after the effective date of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1986, the Administrator shall publish in the Federal Register a list of all pesticide active ingredients remaining after subparagraph (A) that have not been reregistered since September 30, 1978, in the order of their priority, for reregistration under this Act.

"(3) PRIORITY.—In establishing the lists required under paragraph (2), the Administrator shall give the highest priority to pesticides that—

"(A) are in major use on or in food or feed that may result in postharvest residues;

"(B) may result in residues of potential toxicological concern in potable groundwater, edible fish, or shellfish;

"(C) have previously been determined by the Administrator to have the most significant outstanding data requirements; or

"(D) are used on crops, including in greenhouses and nurseries, where worker exposure is most likely to occur.

"(4) REMOVAL.—Not later than 90 days after the publication of a list containing an active ingredient of a pesticide under paragraph (2), the Administrator shall remove such ingredient from the reregistration list if the Administrator is requested by each registrant of each pesticide containing such ingredient that the registration of such pesticide be canceled.

"(5) JUDICIAL REVIEW.—The establishment of a list by the Administrator under this subsection shall not be subject to judicial review.

"(6) DATA REQUIREMENTS.—

"(A) Not later than 18 months after the effective date of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1986, the Administrator shall—

"(i) identify and publish in the Federal Register a list of each outstanding data requirement for each pesticide active ingredient referred to in paragraph (2)(A); and

"(ii) simultaneously notify pursuant to subsection (c)(2)(B) each existing registrant of each pesticide containing such ingredient that, in order to maintain the registration of such pesticide under this Act, such registrant must complete studies to fill such outstanding data requirement within a reasonable period of time, but not to exceed 4 years after such notice.

"(B) Not later than 24 months after the effective date of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1986, the Administrator shall—

"(i) identify and publish in the Federal Register a list of each outstanding data requirement for each pesticide active ingredient referred to in paragraph (2)(B); and

"(ii) simultaneously notify pursuant to subsection (c)(2)(B) each existing registrant of each pesticide containing such ingredient that, in order to maintain the registration of such pesticide under this Act, such registrant must complete studies to fill such outstanding data requirement within a reasonable period of time, but not to exceed 4 years after such notice.

"(C) The Administrator may extend the period referred to in subparagraph (A)(ii) or (B)(ii) by no more than 2 years if extraordinary circumstances beyond the control of the registrant prevent the registrant from filling the outstanding data requirement for a pesticide active ingredient.

"(D) If a hearing is requested following the issuance of such notice, the registrant may appeal in such hearing—

"(i) the classification of a study as an outstanding data requirement; and

"(ii) other matters for resolution referred to in subsection (c)(2)(B)(iv).

"(7) FILLING DATA REQUIREMENTS.—

"(A) Not later than 6 months after issuance of a notice required under paragraph (6) with respect to a pesticide active ingredient, the Administrator shall determine whether appropriate tests have been initiated to fill the identified outstanding data requirements for such ingredient.

"(B) A registrant shall submit annual progress reports to the Administrator that indicate the status of such testing and report interim results.

"(8) SUSPENSION.—The Administrator shall issue a notice of intent to suspend the registration of a pesticide pursuant to subsection (c)(2)(B)(iv) if the Administrator determines that—

"(A) necessary tests to fill an outstanding data requirement for such pesticide have not been initiated within 1 year of the issuance of a notice under paragraph (6);

"(B) progress is insufficient to ensure completion of such tests within the deadlines established in such notice;

"(C) the required test data have not been submitted to the Administrator within the specified deadline; or

"(D) a registrant fails to comply with clauses (ii) and (iii) of subsection (c)(2)(B).

"(9) REREGISTRATION.—

"(A) Not later than 1 year after receipt of the data required by this subsection with respect to a pesticide, the Administrator shall complete reregistration of such pesticide by determining whether such pesticide fulfills the requirements of subsection (c)(5).

"(B) The Administrator shall determine whether a pesticide shall be reregistered under this Act by conducting a thorough examination of all data required by the regulations and guidelines issued pursuant to this section or taking such other steps as are necessary to make such determination.

"(10) FEES.—

"(A) The Administrator shall charge and collect reregistration fees from registrants in accordance with this paragraph.

"(B) To identify outstanding data requirements in accordance with paragraph (6) for each pesticide required to be reregistered under paragraph (2), on issuance of the notice required under subsection (c)(2)(B), the Administrator shall charge and collect from the registrant or registrants of such pesticide a one-time fee of $50,000 for each active ingredient of such pesticide registered for use on food or feed, except that no such fee shall be collected for a pesticide voluntarily canceled in accordance with paragraph (4).

"(C) To subsequently evaluate data and reregister a pesticide in accordance with paragraph (9) for each pesticide required to be reregistered under paragraph (2), on submission of the data required by the notice issued under subsection (c)(2)(B), the Administrator shall collect from the registrant or registrants of such pesticide an additional one-time fee of $100,000 for each active ingredient of such pesticide registered for use on food or feed.

"(D) If an active pesticide ingredient of a pesticide is registered under this Act solely for uses other than for food or feed, the Administrator may levy a reduced fee for the registration of such pesticide, but no less than one-half of the fee charged for an active ingredient of a pesticide registered for use on food or feed.

"(E) On payment of fees for the reregistration of an active ingredient in accordance with this paragraph, the Administrator may not levy any other fees for the reregistration of such ingredient.

"(F) If there are two or more registrants for an active ingredient registered under this Act, the fees shall be apportioned by such registrants in accordance with this section.

"(11) REVOLVING FUND.—

"(A) There shall be established in the Treasury of the United States a revolving fund.

"(B) All fees collected by the Administrator under paragraph (10) shall be deposited into the revolving fund and shall remain available without fiscal year limitation to carry out this subsection.

"(C) Money in the revolving fund not currently needed to carry out this subsection shall be—

"(i) maintained on hand or on deposit;

"(ii) invested in obligations of the United States or guaranteed thereby; or

"(iii) invested in obligations, participations, or other instruments that are lawful investments for fiduciary, trust, or public funds.

"(D) The Administrator shall—

"(i) provide an annual accounting of the fees collected and disbursed from the revolving fund; and

"(ii) take all steps necessary to insure that expenditures of such funds are solely utilized to carry out this subsection.

"(12) COMPENSATION OF DATA SUBMITTER.—

"(A) On submission of data or fees required under this subsection, the data submitter shall be compensated in accordance with subsection (c)(1)(D).

"(B) If data or fees are submitted jointly by two or more registrants, an agent shall be appointed by the registrants, at the time of the joint submission or payment of a reregistration fee, to handle any subsequent compensation matters.".

"(ii) The Administrator shall publish in the Federal Register notice of the definition of the terms 'validated test' and 'other significant evidence' as used in this subparagraph.

"(iii) Criteria for initiating an interim administrative review shall be established on the basis of levels of risk, and may include consideration of currently available exposure data.

"(iv) Absence of exposure data shall not delay or preclude initiation of an interim administrative review. The Administrator shall not decline to initiate an interim administrative review solely on the basis of exposure unless adequate data on all relevant means of exposure have been considered.

"(v) On receipt of data demonstrating that interim administrative review triggers are exceeded, the Administrator shall immediately notify all registrants of the pesticide and provide the registrants with appropriate information and an explanation of the manner in which the trigger has been exceeded.

"(vi) Not later than 30 days after receipt of such notice, a registrant may respond to such notice.

"(vii) Not later than 30 days after the Administrator receives a response from a registrant, the Administrator shall determine whether an interim administrative review of the pesticide shall be initiated.

"(i) to cancel its registration or to change its classification together with the reasons (including the factual basis) for the action of the Administrator; or

"(ii) to hold a hearing to determine whether or not its registration should be canceled or its classification changed.

"(B)(i) The Administrator may require changes to the labeling of a pesticide by informal rulemaking unless the changes are equivalent to a cancellation of a use, render the product unmarketable, or otherwise have a major economic impact on the product, in which case the changes shall be subject to the hearing procedures provided in this section.

"(ii) Label changes issued through informal rulemaking shall not be effective pending any judicial review requested under section 16 after a final order of the Administrator.

"(C) Notice shall be sent to the registrant and made public.

"(iv) The time requirements imposed by this subparagraph may be waived or modified to the extent agreed on by the Administrator and the Secretary.

"(G) Notwithstanding any other provision of this subsection and section 25(d), in the event that the Administrator determines that suspension of a pesticide registration is necessary to prevent an imminent hazard to human health, on such a finding, the Administrator may waive the requirement of notice to and consultation with the Secretary of Agriculture pursuant to this subsection and of submission to the Scientific Advisory Panel pursuant to section 25(d) and proceed in accordance with subsection (c).

"(2) HEARING.—

"(A) The proposed action shall become final and effective at the end of 30 days from receipt by the registrant, or publication of a notice issued under paragraph (1)(A)(i), whichever occurs later, unless within that time—

"(F) The hearing examiner shall schedule the presentation and examination of witnesses so that the presentation of evidence is completed within 60 days, except that the schedule shall not prejudice the right of a party to present evidence.

"(G) The parties shall submit briefs within 20 days of receiving a transcript of the hearing.

"(H) The hearing examiner shall render a recommended decision within 20 days from the submission of briefs by the parties.

"(I) A hearing conducted under this section shall be completed and the Administrator shall make a final decision within 6 months of the issuance of the notice that gave rise to the hearing.

TITLE XIV—EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 1401. EFFECTIVE DATE.

Except as otherwise provided in this Act, this Act and the amendments made by this Act shall become effective 60 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY OF THE FEDERAL INSECTICIDE, FUNGICIDE, AND RODENTICIDE ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

REREGISTRATION AND REVENUES

The bill establishes a schedule for completion of the reregistration of pesticides by requiring EPA to develop two lists of pesticide active ingredients for reregistration. A priority list of 300 active ingredients scheduled for reregistration must be developed within sixty (60) days of enactment, followed within thirty (30) days thereafter by a second list of the remaining chemicals.

Within eighteen months of enactment for the first list, and within twenty-four months of enactment for the second list, EPA is required to fully evaluate the existing data supporting registrations for the active ingredients and to issue notices to registrants to fill any outstanding date requirements. Registrants then have up to four years to complete the studies required, with an exceptional circumstance extension of up to two years for unanticipated delays. Failure to submit data within such deadlines will result in suspension of registration. Following submission of the studies, EPA has one year to reregister the pesticide.

The bill provides for a one-time fee on active ingredients to assist EPA's reregistration effort. The fee is divided into two parts. After an initial opportunity for registrants to voluntarily cancel registrations which they do not wish to reregister, a fee of $50,000 is assessed on each active ingredient when EPA issues its notification of outstanding date requirements for that active ingredient. Another fee of $100,000 is assessed when the registrants submit the required data. Lesser fees may be assessed for registrations of active ingredients not used on food or feed. The reregistration fee is apportioned among active ingredient registrants. Formulators are exempted from paying the fee.

FALSE OR INVALID DATA

The bill provides for expeditious EPA review and regulatory action on registrations that are based on false or invalid data.

First, the bill requires EPA to issue a notice of intent to suspend and to cancel the registration of a pesticide if, prior to the effective date of the amendments, the EPA has previously determined that data submitted by a registrant to the EPA in support of an existing registration were invalid, have not been replaced or will not be replaced by April 1, 1988, and are material to the registration.

Second, if EPA determines subsequent to enactment of the amendments that invalid data have been submitted by a registrant in support of a registration, the amendments also authorize EPA either to require the registrant to submit valid replacement studies on an expedited basis or to issue a notice of intent to cancel the registration. These amendments are designed to allow EPA to take action on situations where the EPA discovers that pivotal studies, previously thought to be valid in justifying a product's registration, are in fact invalid and the continued use of the product may cause an unreasonable risk.

Finally, the proposal provides that EPA must immediately cancel a registration if a registrant willfully submits material data know to be false in support of the registration.

The EPA is authorized to conduct a hearing to be concluded within seventy-five (75) days after receipt of the request for such a hearing upon notice of cancellation. The hearing will address only a limited number of issues relevant to whether the data are false or invalid and the appropriate impact on the registration.

The proposed amendments also provide that willful falsification of data or knowing submission of false data are unlawful acts, subject to civil and criminal penalties.

CONDITIONAL REGISTRATION

The bill proposes to restrict the availability of conditional registrations for new products and new major uses.

The proposal provides that EPA will not grant a conditional registration for a new use or active ingredient where the data concerning chronic toxicity (oncogenicity, reproductive effects, and mutagenicity), neurotoxicity, or teratogenicity are required for registration, such date have not been submitted, and the date requirement was in effect at the start of date development. Additionally, EPA may amend conditional registrations for existing uses to allow revisions of labels—for example, application methods, efficiency claims, and safety instructions—except if such modifications introduce uses prohibited by the amended statute.

The proposed amendments provide that such conditional registrations must not materially increase the risk of any unreasonable adverse effect on the environment, registrants must provide all additional date required for the proposed additional use, and the additional use is in the public interest.

PUBLIC RIGHT TO KNOW

The bill directs registrants to develop and submit to EPA a summary of health and safety data supporting their registered active ingredients and on priority inert ingredients. Such summaries will be made available to local communities and the public on request. The priority inert ingredients requiring summaries are those 50 to 75 inert ingredients to be listed and regulated under other proposed FIFRA amendments described below. The summaries must be developed within 120 days of enactment of the amendments. The EPA may require modifications to the summaries as needed.

Registered establishments must also obtain and make available to the public on request such summaries on active and inert ingredients used in the establishment.

Finally, the amendments clarify that registrants must provide a list of plant locations in the United States where active ingredients are produced and to make this list available to the public upon request.

PREREGISTRATION ACCESS TO DATA

The bill expands the public's access to health and safety data submitted in support of registrations on new active ingredients and initial food uses of existing registered pesticides. Access to such data is allowed prior to EPA's action on registration applications and is permitted solely for the purpose of public comment on pending applications. The amendments allow access immediately following EPA's publication of receipt of the application for registration and, once the supporting data is disclosed, allow sixty (60) days for public comment. The data will be made available in the offices of EPA or authorized state agencies upon submission of an affirmation that the data reviewer is not acting for a pesticide company and will not intentionally or recklessly violate other restrictions in the Act to protect confidentiality. Comments may quote and discuss the data and may be exchanged for peer review, but will not be made public until after a registration decision has been reached and in compliance with section 10 confidentiality provisions. The data shall not be used for commercial purposes and penalities are provided for wrongful use of data.

INERT INGREDIENTS

The bill gives increased authority to EPA to regulate inert ingredients in pesticides. It requires EPA to develop a priority list of fifty (50) inert ingredients within ninety days of enactment and allows expansion of the list to seventy-five (75) inert ingredients fifteen months after enactment. Criteria are provided to focus the list on inerts with potentially the greatest risk to health or the environment.

Once an inert is listed, EPA is required to develop and publish within one year a plan on what toxicity studies must be conducted and the deadlines for submission of such studies. Once the data development plan is published, pesticides containing listed inerts must list such inert ingredient on the product label. Studies required by the data development plan must be submitted in no more than four (4) years and must be reviewed and appropriate action be taken by EPA within one year of receipt.

The amendments also establish requirements for testing inert ingredients used to replace listed inerts, submission of amended confidential statements of formula, registration of pesticides containing listed inerts, labelling of listed inerts and misbranding provisions, and data development cost allocation.

EXPORT OF PESTICIDES

The bill addresses a number of issues in the export and foreign use of U.S. pesticides.

First, the proposal expands the current notice requirements of registrants to inform, at least annually, foreign importers and importing countries about their products in international trade whose registrations are cancelled, suspended, are restricted use pesticides, are not registered for any U.S. use, or have been voluntarily withdrawn for health or environmental reasons. Export cannot proceed until the notice and evidence of its delivery have been provided to the EPA and made available to the public. Notices will identify the exporter, foreign purchases, the appropriate regulatory office in the importing country, and a clear statement of the reason why the product cannot be legally sold in the U.S. or is a restricted use. EPA must annually provide similar notices to foreign governments and appropriate international agencies.

Second, the bill requires exported pesticides which are substantially similar in composition and use pattern to pesticides registered in the U.S. to have labels containing the same health, safety and hazard precautions as U.S. products, unless such precautions on the label are in conflict with the law of the importing country.

Third, the proposal required EPA within sixty days to revoke or amend food tolerances on imported and domestically grown food when a pesticide registration has been cancelled, suspended, denied, or voluntarily withdrawn, unless any of such actions were due solely to environmental effects. The action on the tolerance may take into account consumption of food in commerce, use of existing stocks, and unavoidable environmental contamination.

Finally, the bill encourages the EPA to assist foreign governments in establishing comprehensive pesticide programs and allows EPA to regulate the maintenance of records by pesticide exporters.

CANCELLATION PROCEDURES

The bill establishes expedited procedures for EPA's conduct of interim administrative or "special" reviews of pesticides, and sets time limits on those reviews and product registration cancellation hearing. The amendments also permit certain modifications of labels by informal rulemaking unless they are equivalent to a cancellation, render the product unmarketable or have a major economic impact.

With respect to interim administrative reviews initiated after January 1, 1986, the proposal established criteria for initiating a review on the basis of levels of risk and permits consideration of currently available exposure data. The absence of exposure data will not delay or preclude initiation or reviews. When administrative review triggers are exceeded, EPA shall immediately notify the registrants, who shall respond with thirty (30) days to the Agency's assessment that the trigger has been activated. Once a notice of a review is formally initiated, the amendments further provide that the interim administrative review must be completed within one year. Key elements of the schedule call for a ninety (90) day public respose to the EPA's notice of an interim administrative review, ninety (90) day EPA review of public comments and issuance of a proposed decision, and sixty (60) day deadline thereafter for final EPA decision. The overall time limit of one (1) year may be extended up to an additional year for exceptional circumstances and under certain limitations.

With respect to product registration cancellation hearings, the amendments establish a time limit of six (6) months for hearings conducted subsequent to an interim administrative review and twelve (12) months for hearings not following such a review. In either instance, a hearing may be requested by an adversely affected party. The amendments prescribe the conditions under which EPA may grant a hearing and the hearing procedures. Essentially, a hearing which follows an interim administrative review must be conducted on the following schedule: The hearing must commence sixty (60) days from appointment of the Hearing Examiner and conclude sixty (60) days thereafter, briefs must be filed within twenty (20) days of transcript receipt, and the Examiner's recommended decision made twenty (20) days from submission of briefs. The schedule may be extended for up to 180 days in exceptional circumstances.

EMPLOYEE PROTECTION

The bill requires that no employer may discharge or otherwise discriminate against any employee with respect to the employee's compensation and conditions of employment because the employee or a person acting at the request of the employee has initiated a proceeding under FIFRA, testified, or participated in such a proceeding. EPA is instructed to implement these protections in a manner consistent with a similar section of the Toxic Substances Control Act.

DATA DISCLOSURE TO STATES

The bill permits EPA to disclose to States any data or information acquired under FIFRA, if the State and EPA assure that the owner of the data will receive no less protection with respect to disclosure and use of the data than is provided under FIFRA. The bill additionally provides for remedies if improper disclosure is made.

INSPECTION OF LABORATORIES

The bill authorizes EPA to inspect relevant parts of laboratories, related books and records, and data supporting applications for experimental use permits and registrations. Additionally, the bill requires EPA to coordinate such inspections with actions taken under other Federal laws to avoid duplication.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator LUGAR and Senator PROXMIRE in submitting this important legislation to strengthen the Nation's pesticide law. The bill represents literally years of effort on the part of several organizations concerned about safer uses of pesticides. Organizations supporting the bill include the Campaign on Pesticide Reform—a coalition of 41 consumer, environmental, and labor groups—and the National Agricultural Chemicals Association, whose membership includes some 92 companies.

The bill amends the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act [FIFRA], the primary Federal law regulating registration, sale, and use of pesticides and certain other agricultural and household chemicals.

The bill improves the existing statute in several ways. First, the bill establishes a schedule for completing the required reregistration of certain pesticides by the Environmental Protection Agency [EPA]. The bill provides for a one-time fee for the reregistration of each active ingredient for which additional data is required. Proceeds generated by the fee will be used to defray the costs of the reregistration effort.

Expedited procedures will be established for EPA to review and take regulatory action on pesticide registrations that may have been based on false or invalid data submitted in the past. In addition, if a registrant willfully submits information known to be false in the process of registering a pesticide, EPA must immediately cancel the registration.

The availability of conditional registrations for new products or for new major uses is restricted under the bill. Conditional registration will not be permitted if data concerning some of the more dangerous potential side effects of a pesticide would be required for its registration. In addition, conditional registrations must not materially increase the risk of any unreasonable adverse effect on the environment.

The public's right to know more about pesticide ingredients is strengthened by the bill. A summary of health and safety data used to support applications for registration of active ingredients and certain inert ingredients must be developed by pesticide registrants and submitted to EPA. The data will be available to the public. In addition, the bill provides for increased public access to health and safety information submitted in support of the registration of new active ingredients and any initial food use of existing registered pesticides. Such access is allowed prior to any EPA action on a registration application but will be permitted solely for the purpose of public comment on the pending application.

The bill gives EPA broader authority to regulate inert ingredients in pesticides. EPA's efforts will be focused on inert ingredients that pose the greatest risk to the environment.

The bill will also improve in several ways the existing statutory provisions related to export and foreign use of pesticides produced in the United States. The bill would require foreign purchases of a pesticide of its cancellation, suspension, use restriction, or voluntary withdrawal. More strict labeling requirements are established for exported pesticides.

Under the bill requires EPA, within 60 days, to revoke or amend food tolerances on imported and domestically grown food when a pesticide registration is canceled, suspended, denied, or voluntarily withdrawn.

With regard to registration cancellation procedures, the bill will establish expedited procedures for conducting interim administrative or "special" reviews of pesticides. In addition, the bill provides for: First, increased employee protection in cases where an employee has initiated a proceeding under FIFRA; second, disclosure to appropriate State agencies of certain information acquired under FIFRA, and third, authorized, coordinated inspection of laboratories.

Mr. President, I look forward to seeing this bill rapidly enacted. I hope that the Senate Committee on Agriculture will conduct hearings on the bill at an early date and begin markup as soon as may be practical.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am delighted to be cosponsoring with Senators LUGAR and LEAHY the new consensus pesticide bill worked out by the National Agricultural Chemicals Association and the Campaign For Pesticide Reform, a coalition of environmental, consumer and labor groups.

The bill tightens existing law insuring for the first time that all registered pesticides have been tested for their effects on human health and the environment. It's outrageous that almost 15 years after the passage of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide (FIFRA) amendments, the vast percentage of all pesticide active ingredients are still missing vital tests for cancer, mutations or birth defects.

Even more, without this legislation EPA lacks effective measures for dealing with pesticides whose active ingredients were registered based on invalid or fraudulent data.

The bill also:

Tightens up the enormous loopholes in the existing registration process;

Provides new public access and right to know for pesticide health and safety data;

Requires new labeling for inert ingredients;

Applies new requirements to exported pesticide and imported food products grown with pesticides banned in the United States;

Streamlines the process for cancelling pesticide registrations;

Includes protections against discharge or discrimination for workers who initiate or participate in FIFRA proceedings;

Permits EPA data disclosure to States;

Authorizes laboratory and record inspection, and;

Clarifies existing requirements on data confidentiality.

Even more important than the bill's contents is the process used in its drafting. I can think of no other example of historic adversaries coming together and producing a strong consensus bill which protects human health while considering effects on the regulated industry. This bill is truly a stunning achievement and one which should be imitiated again and again for other tough environmental problems.

Unfortunately, while the bill covers a considerable percentage of the pesticide program's lonstanding weaknesses, it does not cover them all.

In some cases, such as groundwater protection, negotiations between the NACA and the CPR are still continuing. I hope both sides will realize the importance of this issue and resolve their differences prior to hearings in the Agriculture Committee.

With other items, such as workers safety and training, separate negotiations with affected groups are proceeding in parallel with the CPR-NACA negotiations. Here too it is my hope that discussions be resolved favorably as soon as possible so that these topics can be included in the committee's deliberations.

Mr. President, this bill is not a total solution, covering every thorny pesticide problem. However, it is a splended first step which leads the way to the ideal program sought by Congress since 1972.

By Mr. STEVENS (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. HATCH):

S. 2216. A bill to designate September 17, 1987, the bicentennial of the signing of the Constitution of the United States, as "Constitution Day", and to make such day a legal public holiday; ordered held at the desk until the close of business on Monday, March 24, 1986.

CONSTITUTION DAY

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, to me there is no day more worthy of celebration than the day the U.S. Constitution was signed.

Along with Senator THURMOND and Senator KENNEDY, I have the privilege to represent this body on the Commission created to organize the celebration of the bicentennial of the adoption of our Constitution. We have joined together in sponsoring this bill to make September 17, 1987, a onetime national holiday—Constitution Day.

Even more than the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the signing of the Constitution by the Constitutional Convention marked the beginning of our Nation. That Convention, representing a loose confederation of former British colonies, and empowered to redraft the Articles of Confederation, went beyond their charge and instead drew up the blueprint of the most successful government in history. When the framers of our Constitution sent their new document out to what would become the States for it to be ratified our country's life began.

There have been amendments to our Constitution—we just spent some time here in the Senate on a proposed amendment which we will vote on next week—but the basic form of our Government has remained unchanged. The balance between our three branches has not only provided successful in our country; it has set a standard by which other countries have measured their own governments.

It is only appropriate that we celebrate the 200th anniversary of our Constitution with all the energy we can muster. This is more than just another day for parades and parties: it is an opportunity to reflect on the history of our Nation, and the great concepts which have made us what we are today. However, while it is important that we think about the wisdom embodied in the Constitution, it is just as important that we do have parades to celebrate the bicentennial.

This national celebration is the best way to convince Americans to think of ways to commemorate the founding of our Government. And, a key part of such a celebration must be a day devoted only to the anniversary of our Constitution. I hope that all Senators will join with us in calling for a national holiday to celebrate this bicentennial.

Mr. President, I understand the leadership will ask unanimous consent that this bill be printed in the RECORD and that it be held at the desk until the close of business Monday so that all who wish to do so may be an original cosponsor, and that at the close of business Monday this bill be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2216

To designate September 17, 1987, the bicentennial of the signing of the Constitution of the United States, as "Constitution Day", and to make such a day a legal public holiday

SEC. 3. September 17, 1987, shall be treated as if it were a legal public holiday under section 6103(a) of title 5, United States Code, for purposes of—

(1) any statute relating to pay or leave of employees (as defined by section 2105 of title 5, United States Code);

(2) section 2(d) of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to codify and emphasize existing rules and customs pertaining to the display and use of the flag of the United States of America", approved June 22, 1942 (36 U.S.C. 174(d));

(3) section 15(a) of the Federal Contested Election Act (2 U.S.C. 394(a)); and

(4) any other law.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased today to cosponsor this important legislation establishing September 17, 1987, as "Constitution Day" and proclaiming that day as a onetime national holiday commemorating the bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution.

Over the years, our Government has chosen to observe, through annual national holidays, a number of great leaders and great events in our Nation's history. I cannot imagine an occasion of greater historical significance of the people of the United States than the 200th birthday of its unique and unparalleled Constitution.

Mr. President, the bicentennial provides an opportunity for our citizens to gain a new appreciation of the vital role which the Constitution has played in making the United States the greatest country in the world. Establishment of a one-time holiday, by underscoring the significance of the Constitution, should stimulate many of our citizens to study and analyze its origin and meaning.

I am honored to be a member of the Commission on the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution. The Commission, under the leadership of its chairman, Chief Justice Warren Burger, is working with Federal entities, with the States and local communities, and with numerous nonpublic entities, to ensure that our observance of the bicentennial is meaningful. The Commission has strongly endorsed the onetime holiday proposed by this legislation, and believes that it will greatly enhance our bicentennial celebration.

Mr. President, I am hopeful that my colleagues in the Senate will support this important initiative. A one-time holiday would be an excellent way to observe 200 years of democracy under a document which, in my view, is the greatest that man has ever penned for the governing of a people.

By Mr. GRAMM:

S. 2217. A bill to provide fair incentives for the domestic production of oil and gas; to the Committee on Finance.

OIL AND GAS DEREGULATION AND INCENTIVE ACT

● Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, today I am introducing the "Oil and Gas Deregulation and Incentive Act of 1986." This legislation addresses four major areas of concern to our Nation's troubled oil and gas industry: Tax policy, banking policy, repeal of the Windfall Profits Tax and deregulation of the gas industry.

There has been a dramatic decline in oil and natural gas exploration and development in the United States. Broad sectors of the domestic oil and gas industry have suffered severe economic reversals, and rapidly declining oil prices are exacerbating an already serious economic climate in the industry.

There are a number of contributing factors. These include the uncertainty created by pending tax legislation and inadequate regulatory authority on the part of Federal banking agencies, as well as the passage of events that precipitated the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978, the Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 and the Crude Oil Windfall Profit Tax Act of 1980.

The legislation I am introducing today addresses these problems in the following ways. First, the bill eliminates by resolution those provisions of the Rostenkowski tax bill (H.R. 3838) that detrimentally affect the oil and natural gas industry. Retained specifically are existing rules regarding intangible drilling costs and percentage depletion allowances. Also retained are the alternative minimum tax net income offset provisions and the reserve method for bad debt deductions utilized by banks. Retention of these tax benefits should assist in the ability of the industry to provide for capital formation and to quell existing concerns regarding additional and potentially disastrous taxing of the industry.

Next, the bill provides enhanced flexibility to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve Board in establishing regulatory procedures to allow the restructuring of appropriate oil and gas industry debt. More particularly, the bill provides the sense of the Congress that Federal banking agencies acting in their regulatory capacity should work in cooperation with well managed financial institutions whose capital may be temporarily impaired by adverse economic conditions beyond their control. The bill also provides for the use of Financial Accounting Standards Board No. 15 in troubled debt restructurings, allowing financial institutions to account prospectively for modifications to the term of their borrowers' debts, and provides for a special classification category for renegotiated loans. There is also provision for forebearance of capital standards by the Federal banking agencies in appropriate circumstances. The bill specifically amends the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Act to allow for "extraordinary acquisitions" of both closed banks and banks "experiencing financial difficulties" by in-state and out-of-state banks and bank holding companies. The FDIC is required to consult with appropriate State bank supervisors and the FDIC can solicit proposals from any qualified purchasers. Any further acquisitions in the involved State must be in accordance with State law.

Third, the bill repeals the Windfall Profits Tax and changes the withholding requirements of the act to conform to the effective date of the repeal.

Fourth, the bill deregulates the natural gas industry by removing various provisions of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 and the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978, and by providing for the nondiscriminatory transportation of natural gas. More specifically, the bill repeals certain sections of the Fuel Use Act, retaining those sections of the act that provide for expedited environmental review. These changes will allow any new or existing electric utility plant or major industrial user to choose natural gas as its energy source. This repeal should lead to increased use of natural gas by utilities and industrial installations.

This section of the bill also repeals the incremental pricing requirements of the NGPA, allowing industrial users to buy gas on a nondiscriminatory basis. The price of natural gas will no longer be tied to an artificial figure, and rules promulgated by the Commission will continue only with respect to flowthrough of costs incurred before enactment. The bill also repeals wellhead price control provisions of the NGPA, in effect excluding first sales and renegotiated contracts, while still providing for contract sanctity in certain area rate clause situations.

Further, the bill repeals Natural Gas Act jurisdiction over first sales of committed or dedicated natural gas and those provisions of the NGPA that would allow the reimposition of price controls. The bill also provides for the transportation of natural gas without undue discrimination as to class of shipper or recipient, and provides that rates and charges with respect to such transportation must be just and reasonable. This provision grants significant latitude to the Commission in its rulemaking capacity.

As additional provisions of a general nature, the bill provides a sense of the Congress regarding the inappropriateness of State regulations that require the premature plugging of marginal wells, and also provides for certain modifications regarding the period of time required in which to explore and develop land under the Mineral Lands Leasing Act. The bill would change the present 10-year period to 20 years.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in this long overdue effort to deregulate the oil and gas industry and provide the mechanisms necessary to address the current situation.●

S.J. Res. 300. Joint resolution to recognize and honor 350 years of service of the National Guard; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RECOGNIZING THE NATIONAL GUARD FOR 350 YEARS OF SERVICE

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a joint resolution recognizing the 350th anniversary of the National Guard, and honoring the Army and Air National Guard for services rendered to their communities, their States, and to our Nation. Congressman THOMAS DASCHLE is introducing identical legislation in the House of Representatives.

Three hundred and fifty years ago, the first settlers organized militia units to defend their property and their lives, establishing the tradition of the citizen-soldier in the United States. The citizen-soldiers evolved into the National Guard. These patriotic and dedicated men and women have answered the call to duty in virtually every conflict in which the United States has been involved. In peacetime the National Guard also has always been ready to serve by protecting lives and property when disaster strikes.

Mr. President, 1986 marks 350 years of the National Guard's impressive service to our Nation. It is only fitting that we recognize their important contributions.●

S.J. Res. 301. Joint resolution designating the week of May 18, 1986, through May 23, 1986, as "National Food Bank Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL FOOD BANK WEEK

● Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President today I am introducing a joint resolution which would designate the week of May 18, 1986 through May 23, 1986 as "National Food Bank Week".

It is estimated that there are approximately 20 million people in the United States that periodically go hungry. Nonprofit food banks all over the country have provided a valuable service in helping to provide food for those in need.

In 1985, Second Harvest, a recognized leader in food banking, distributed over 1 million pounds of food products to help combat hunger. With a growing demand for food assistance, the work of food banks is increasing daily. Therefore, I introduce this joint resolution today not only to recognize the work of food banks, such as Second Harvest, but to also bring a much needed awareness to the American public of the problem of hunger in America and the need for food assistance.

It is my hope that other Senators will join me in honoring the work of those who sacrifice time and energy on behalf of the needy in the distribution of food.●

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. EAGLETON, and Mr. DANFORTH):

S.J. Res. 302, Joint resolution to commend Project Equality, Incorporated, participants for 20 years of dedicated service to equal employment opportunity; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMMENDING PROJECT EQUALITY INCORPORATED

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President. I am pleased to introduce a joint resolution commending an outstanding Kansas City-based group called Project Equality on its 20th anniversary.

Project Equality was founded to promote equal employment opportunities for those traditionally excluded from the economic mainstream of our society. It is comprised of many different religious and public interest groups, all tied together by a strong commitment and dedication to equality in the job market. Over the past two decades, Project Equality has prodded and cajoled corporations and businesses throughout the country to open their doors and implement fair employment practices. And by doing so, this organization has helped untold numbers secure jobs which may otherwise have been unavailable to them.

Mr. President. There is currently an intense debate going on about whether numerical goals and timetables should be required under affirmative action plans and, in general, to what extent race- or sex-conscious measures should be used to promote employment opportunities for women and minorities. But regardless of disagreements about means, I think we can all agree on the end, which is a job market completely devoid of discrimination. Project Equality has made a large contribution toward achieving that goal and I congratulate them on their 20th anniversary.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 302

Whereas equal employment opportunity programs have made significant improvements in our society;

Whereas Project Equality, Incorporated, is a nationwide organization comprised of religious organizations and public interest groups with a membership totaling in excess of thirty million persons;

Whereas Project Equality, Incorporated, the Nation's largest private fair employment program, serves as an advocate in support of equal employment opportunity;

Whereas Project Equality, Incorporated, through publication and distribution of the "Buyer's Guide", rates participating companies on their equal employment opportunity for endorsement purposes;

Whereas Project Equality, Incorporated, willingly furnishes consultation services, resources, and manpower to assist organizations in developing equal opportunity programs beneficial to corporations and employees; and

Whereas the contributions of Project Equality, Incorporated, are invaluable toward the continued improvement of fair employment practices: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in support of the principles and activities of Project Equality, Incorporated, the Representatives commend this organization and recognize their twentieth anniversary.

SENATE RESOLUTION 370—ENCOURAGING AMERICANS TO CONSUME MEAT AND MEAT FOOD PRODUCTS

Mr. ABDNOR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

S. RES. 370

Whereas agriculture is the largest industry in the United States, with assets totaling $1,000,000,000,000;

Whereas the beef cattle industry is the largest segment of American agriculture, accounting for more than 20 percent of all farm marketings;

Whereas every dollar that this $30,000,000,000 a year industry generates is multiplied five or six times in related industries;

Whereas for every job created on a farm or ranch, there are six jobs created in related industries;

Whereas balance and moderation are the keys to good diet;

Whereas about 50 separate nutrients are essential to good health, and no single food contains all of these nutrients;

Whereas the high quality and abundant meat supply of the United States is the most regulated, most inspected, and safest meat supply in the world; and

Whereas the American Heart Association has stated that a healthy person may eat up to seven ounces of lean red meat, poultry, and seafood per day, and that Americans currently consume an average of only two ounces of cooked lean beef per day (considerably less than the recommended daily intake of foods from the meat group): Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that Americans are encouraged to consume meat and meat food products.

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, there are lot of predators which plague the livestock industry these days. There is one such predator which would shut down the livestock industry tomorrow if it had the chance. This group has the gall to call itself FARM, the Farm Animal Reform Movement. This organization states in its literature that "next to nuclear weapons, the meat industry and its associates in animal agriculture pose the greatest threat to the quality of life on this planet." They warn of "the holocaust of animal agriculture." Today, March 20, these mindless, misinformed, self-appointed regulators of the American dinner table are picketing restaurants and supermarkets holding meatless receptions for public officials and handing out propaganda in shopping malls. Their objective is to get America to "kick the meat habit."

Well, Mr. President, I'm going to do a little kicking myself. It's time to stand up for meat.

Agriculture is the Nation's largest industry, with assets totaling about $1 trillion. And the beef cattle industry is the largest segment of American agriculture, accounting for more than a fifth of all farm marketings. And every dollar that this $30 billion a year industry generates is multiplied five or six times in related industries. Furthermore, for every job created on the farm or ranch, there are six jobs created in related industries. The beef industry is indeed an essential part of this country's economy.

I think it is time to stand up for beef producers and their product. And it is time to stand up against those who malign this great industry.

Balance and moderation are the keys to good diet. About 50 separate nutrients are essential to health, and no single food contains all of these. For example, beef is an excellent source of vitamin B-12, but is not a source of vitamin C. Oranges contain vitamin C, but virtually no protein. That's why it's important to eat a varied diet.

So what nutrients does beef contribute? Beef offers a substantial amount of protein—nutritionally complete protein containing all eight essential amino acids in the ideal proportions for human nutrition. A 3-ounce portion of cooked sirloin trimmed of fat contributes 40 percent of the U.S. recommended daily allowance for vitamin B-12, 37 percent of the zinc RDA, 18 percent of the niacin, 57 percent of the protein, and 16 percent of the iron. Furthermore, that is heme iron, which is three to five times more easily absorbed by the body and actually serves as a catalyst for the absorption of other types of iron. And since deficiency is one of the most common dietary deficiencies among women in the United States today, it makes sense to include beef in the diet.

Three ounces of cooked lean beef contains only 73 milligrams of cholesterol. By comparison, the same amount of roast chicken contains 76 milligrams; cheddar cheese 90 milligrams; and shrimp 130 milligrams.

Cattlemen have been steadily improving their product—using new breeding and feeding technologies—so that beef is 10 percent leaner today than it was 20 years ago. Three ounces of cooked lean beef contains only 9 grams of fat, and less than half of that is saturated. Of all the fat in the U.S. food supply, only 36 percent comes from meat and fish. The increase in fat consumption which we have seen in recent years is the result of an increase in the use of vegetable fats.

Beef has received a bum rap, not only regarding nutrition, but regarding safety, as well. What we too often forget is that our meat supply is the most regulated, the most inspected, and the safest meat supply in the world.

Despite this, we continue to hear scare stories about drugs used in beef production. I'd like to clear the air on some of these issues.

Criticism of the use of growth promotants has also been leveled at the beef industry. But this needs to be put into perspective. The amount of estrogen in 1 gram of meat from a hormone-implanted steer is 22 picograms. That's equivalent to one grain of wheat in a shipment of 65,000 metric tons. And, compared to the estrogen in other foods, it is actually very small. For instance, wheat germ contains 4,000 picograms per gram, and soybean oil contains 2 million picograms. So, in a meal containing potatoes, whole wheat bread, green salad, green peas, and ground round steak from estrogen-treated cattle, the food containing the least estrogen is the steak.

But none of these foods present a hazard when you consider how much estrogen the human body produces. Men produce 39,700 times the amount of estrogen that is in hormone-treated beef, women produce 466,000 times that amount, and pregnant women produce 18,750,000 times that amount.

But the whole beef safety issue is best summed up in a statement made by Gilbert Leveille, then of the Department of Food Science and Human Nutrition at Michigan State University. Dr. Leveille said:

It is ironic that such effort is directed at faulting the diet of the United States, when there is little doubt that this is the most abundant, most varied, and the safest food supply in the world.

The American Heart Association says that a healthy person can eat up to 7 ounces of lean red meat, poultry, and seafood per day. Presently, Americans consume an average of only 2 ounces of cooked lean beef per day—considerably less than the recommended daily intake of foods from the meat group.

Government agencies recommend moderation in the diet, and they often caution against "too much" fat, saturated fat and cholesterol. In fact, most agencies now say that "lean meat" can be an appropriate part of restrictive diets as well as more conventional diets. The problem is that people interpreting diet recommendations—including some people in the media—automatically assume, and state, that red meat is a "fatty" food and that its intake should be cut back. Unfortunately, the sources fo such stories have not assumed responsibility for seeing that their advice is properly interpreted. If government agencies and organizations are going to issue dietary guidance, they should be obligated to see that health professionals, the news media, and the public get all the facts. And they should be obligated to help see that their diet recommendations are correctly interpreted.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place into the RECORD at this point an article published in the January/February 1986 edition of the Sciences magazine titled "the 100,000-year Hunt."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Reprinted from the Sciences, January/February 1986]

THE 100,000-YEAR HUNT

(By Marvin Harris)

Picture a line of people dressed in shabby raincoats, umbrellas in one hand and assorted plastic bags in the other. As they shuffle forward in the gray dawn, the ones up front grudgingly make room for women who are pregnant or carrying infants. Those behind grumble and make jokes about pillows stuffed under dresses and babies borrowed for the morning. One woman in a knit cap remarks, "Nothing has gone up in price at this stand because there's nothing here anyway." The Polish people are beginning their daily hunt for meat.

Problems with the meat supply endanger the security of Poland's state socialist system. If the butcher shop lines grow longer and the shelves emptier, watch out. In 1981, the government announced a twenty percent cut in subsidized meat rations and then had to declare martial law to restore order. "The patience of harassed housewives has snapped," reported a correspondent for The Economist. "Used to queuing for hours, clutching empty shopping bags and waiting for meat deliveries that sometimes never come, several thousand of them have taken to the streets in noisy banner-waving hunger marches in Kutno, Lodz, Warsaw and other major towns."

Why are the Poles (and other Eastern Europeans) desperate over a shortage of what many nutritionists consider a luxury and others increasingly condemn as bad for your health? Are they malnourished? Is their diet deficient in calories or proteins? According to the World Health Organization, an adult male weighing one hundred seventy-six pounds needs about sixty grams of protein a day.

In 1980, Poles were getting more than one hundred grams of protein a day. They got sixty-one grams from animal foods alone (meat, fish, poultry, and dairy products)—enough to satisfy the recommended daily allowance without any plant foods. As for calories, they were consuming more than three thousand per capita each day. By way of comparison, in the United States, consumption of animal protein in 1980 was sixty-five grams a day for each person—only four grams more than in Poland—and calorie consumption in the two countries was almost even. Of course, averages cover up some painful details. In Poland, the supply of meat and other animal foods is erratic.

Further, some people get a lot of it and others very little. But these problems are partly a consequence of panic buying. They help make my point: the Poles could eat less meat and easily remain well nourished, yet they are willing to spend a good part of their lives in exasperating pursuit of meat and other animal products.

One might suppose that the Polish government would be trying hard to get people to accept the dietary status quo. Yet it has met each crisis by promising more meat. At great expense to the rest of the economy, it raised meat, fish, and fowl production by forty percent between 1970 and 1975. By 1980, the monthly ration of low-cost meat in state shops was costing the government two and a half billion dollars, about half the national food subsidy.

Are the Poles merely indulging an arbitrary cultural taste? Is their meat hunger nothing but a symbol of the rejection of the Polish brand of socialism? Both state bureaucrats and their opponents recognize that meat is a symbol with the capacity to stir revolutionary thoughts. But it would be an injustice to the Polish people to view their craving for meat as nothing but a symbolic form of hunger. There are good reasons why the Poles and other Eastern Europeans should be concerned about cutbacks in their meat rations; animal foods and plant foods play fundamentally different biological roles in the human diet.

Despite recent findings that link the overconsumption of animal fats and cholesterol to degenerative diseases in affluent societies, animal foods are more critical for sound nutrition than are plant foods. This is not to say that we can dispense with plant foods altogether; we are best off when we consume both kinds. Rather, my contention is that while plant foods can sustain life, access to animal foods bestows health and well-being above and beyond mere survival. There is nothing arbitrary about the inclination of people all over the world, as well as in Poland, to honor and crave animal foods more than plant foods and to lavish a disproportionate share of their energy and wealth on producing them.

No, I haven't forgotten the hundreds of millions of people who are vegetarians and supposedly prefer plant foods to animal foods. But the term vegetarian is misleading. Whereas significant numbers of people spurn meat, fish, fowl, and other flesh, only a tiny minority of cultists, monks, and mystics have professed a bias against all foods of animal origin—eggs, milk, cheese, and other dairy products included. True vegetarians are technically known as vegans. Like followers of the macrobiotics leader George Ohsawa, who aim to exist on little more than brown rice, soya sauce, and herbal teas, they are few and far between. The existence of vegans no more refutes the universal preference for animal foods than the fasts of holy men refute a preference for food over hunger. The lesson to be drawn in both cases is that such practices are not only unpopular but don't last long.

No major world religion has ever urged its followers to practice veganism nor entirely banned the consumption of eggs and animal flesh from the diets of ordinary people. The Hindu diet, for example, does not conform to popular stereotypes. In India, some members of the priestly Brahman caste reject all animal flesh; but most Brahmans consume eggs, poultry, or fish in addition to copious quantities of milk and other dairy products. Brahmans, at any rate, constitute a small minority of the Hindu population; all the other castes consume various combinations of dairy products, eggs, poultry, mutton, fish, pork, goat, and even beef. It is true that the total quantity of animal flesh eaten by Hindu Indians amounts to less than a gram a day per capita, but that is because all kinds of animal foods are in scarce supply. For most Hindus, goat, sheep, and poultry are "delicious foods," and they would eat more of them if they could afford them.

Buddhism is the other great world religion whose eating habits Westerners frequently confuse with veganism. Again, only a relatively small number of extremely devoout priests voluntarily deprive themselves of all animal foods. Buddhists may not slaughter or witness the slaughter of animals, but they may eat animal flesh as long as they are not responsible for ending of the animal's life. Buddha himself never gave up eating boar meat, and in Tibet, Sri Lanka, Burma, and Thailand, Buddhist priests eat meat as well as dairy products. As for ordinary Buddhists, they tend to eat as much meat or fish as they can afford, especially where ecological conditions prevent the raising of cattle for dairy products.

Less than one percent of the world's people voluntarily spurn every type of flesh food, and less than one-tenth of one percent are bona fide vegans. Involuntary rather than voluntary abstinence characterizes the meat-eating patterns of people in less developed countries. Witness the changes in these patterns with improvements in per capita income. The Japanese experience should be taken as a harbinger of Asian things to come: Between 1961 and 1971, Japanese consumption of animal protein rose thirty-seven percent and plant protein consumption fell by three percent. Worldwide, the consumption of grain by livestock is rising twice as fast as the consumption of grain by people.

Within most societies, developed as well as underdeveloped, the higher the income bracket, the greater the proportion of animal products in the diet. In Jamaica, for example, wheat flour is the number one source of protein for the poorest twenty-five percent of the population, with chicken and beef ranking tenth and thirteenth respectively. But for the top twenty-five percent of Jamaicans, beef and chicken rank first and second, and wheat flour ranks seventh. In Madagascar, the elites consume twelve times as much animal protein as the people at the bottom of the social hierarchy. Even in the United States, people at the top eat twenty-five percent more meat than those at the bottom.

Anthropologists in remote parts of the world regularly report cases that invite comparison with the efforts of Poland and other industrialized nations to increase meat consumption. Janet Siskind recounts how the daily life of the Sharanahua, a jungle village people of eastern Peru, revolves around meat shortages. Sharanahua women relentlessy cajole and taunt their menfolk into going hunting. If two or three meatless days go by, the women get together, put on their beads and face paint, and corner each man in the village one by one. They gently tug at his shirt or belt and sing a song: "We are sending you to the forest; bring us back meat." The men pretend not to hear, but they go hunting the next morning, knowing that the women will not sleep with them if there is no meat in the village.

Reports about band and village peoples from other continents paint a similar picture. Richard Lee, in his study of the !Kung San of Africa's Kalahari Desert, states that both men and women value meat more highly than plant food. In New Guinea, despite the ready availability of yams, sweet potatoes, sago plam flour, taro, and other vegetable foods, people devote an inordinate amount of time to raising pigs; they relish pork more than any other food and hold great pig feasts at which they stuff themselves to the point of nausea.

Out of necessity, meat portions are often small and eaten in combination with grains and starch tubers. But even the present of a few ounces of aminal food can make people feel good. Hunter-gatherers and village horticulturists commonly complain that they are "meat hungry," a condition their languages denote by words different from those for ordinary hunger. Among the Canela of Amazonia, ii. mò plàm means "I am hungray," but iiyate means "I am huyngry for meat." In the jungles of Malaysia, a Semai native who has not had animal flesh recently will say "I have not eaten for days."

Virtually every band or village society studied by anthropologists expresses a special esteem for animal flesh by using meat to reinforce the social ties that bind campmates and kinfolk together. Far more commonly than plant foods, animal products must be shared among producers and consumers. Yanomami hunters, for example, believe that if they do not share their catch they will lose their hunting skills. Individuals and families rarely share their plantains and other crops, but they never consume meat without cutting it into portions and distributing it to the important men in the village, who make further distributions to the women and children.

Lorna Marshall depicts meat distribution among the !Kung as progressing in waves from the hunter to his helpers to primary relatives, to more-distant relatives and in-laws, until everybody in the camp gets some, even if it is only a single mouthful. The !Kung cannot imagine one family eating meat and others not. "Lions do that," they say, "not men." Through meat sharing, Marshall writes, "the fear of hunger is mitigated; the person with whom one shares will share in turn when he gets some meat; people are sustained by a web of mutual obligation." The !Kung also share other foods, but nothing else occasions the care and concentration that accompanies having meat passed from one hearth to another.

Meat hunger can be a powerful disruptive as well as harmonious force. In band and village societies, especially those that do not possess significant domesticated sources of animal flesh, eggs, or milk, lack of success in the hunt may lead to quarrels, a split in the community, or the outbreak of warfare among neighboring camps and settlements. There need not be an actual scarcity of meat or animal or plant protein from a nutritional standpoint for events to take a quarrelsome turn. Like the Poles, the Yanomami are generally well nourished; they average as much as seventy-five grams of animal protein per capita each day and show few signs of protein deficiency. But as the population of a village grows, and the hunters deplete nearby game, complaints about meat hunger increase and some men find it increasingly difficult to reciprocate the gifts of meat they have received.

The "web of mutual obligation" turns into a web of mutual suspicion. Portions must be cut smaller and smaller, and some villagers may have to be left out altogether. Resentments build, and soon hunters begin to slight one another deliberately. As their communal supply of meat dwindles and tensions mount, groups such as the Yanomami split into hostile factions that move off to establish new villages where there is more game. Or they may step up their attacks on enemy villages as a means of gaining access to additional hunting grounds. Recent studies show that the problem of dwindling animal resources lies behind much of the endemic warfare found in native Amazonia and other tropical forests.

Reinforcing the ethnograpic evidence that animal foods play a special role in the nutritional physiology of our species is evidence that we have descended from a long line of meat-hungry animals. Not so long ago anthropoligists believed that monkeys and apes were strict vegetarians. Now, after closer and more-meticulous observation in the wild, we see that most primates are omnivorous—like us. And many species of monkeys and apes further resemble humans in making a big fuss when they dine on meat.

Being small creatures, monkeys prey mostly on insects rather than game. But they expend much more time in capturing and eating insects than was previously believed. This new information has cleared up a long-standing puzzle about the way monkeys feed in the wild. As they make their way through the forest canopy, members of many species send down a constant rain of half-chewed pieces of leaves and fruit. Close study of the morsels they discard indicates that they are not being sloppy but finicky. Monkeys do a lot of sniffing, feeling, exploratory nibbling, and spitting out before they pick the fruit they want.

Yet they are not looking for the prefect, ripe, unblemished Garden of Eden apple; they are trying to find the ones with worms inside. Some Amazonian species will open a weevil-infested fig, eat the weevil, and discard the fig. Some eat both fruit and larva, spitting out the portion that has not been spoiled. Some simply ignore fruits that show no signs of insect-induced decomposition.

Several species of monkeys not only consume insects but actively pursue small game as well. Baboons are especially keen hunters, killing and eating small vertebrates such as infant gazelles and antelopes. To be sure, baboons normally spend most of their time in the wild eating plant foods. But, as among many vegetarian human populations, this meager meat consumption may be more a matter of necessity than choice:

baboons have difficulty finding and capturing suitable prey. When there is a choice, according to William Hamilton, the baboons he has observed in Namibia and Botswana prefer to eat animal matter first; roots, seeds, fruits, and flowers second; and leafy materials and grasses third.

The most startling discovery about nonhuman primate meat-eating is that chimpanzees, perhaps our closest relatives in the animal kingdom, are devoted and fairly effective hunters. (So much for the theory that humans are unique "killerapes.") On the basis of ten years of observation in Gombe National Park, in Tanzania, Geza Teleki estimates that chimpanzees use about ten percent of their time to hunt small mammals—mostly young baboons, other kinds of monkeys, and bush pigs—and that adult males eat noninsect meat about once every two weeks.

Chimpanzee hunters frequently cooperate, as many as nine individuals, mostly males, coordinating their movements, sometimes for an hour or more, to surround the quarry and effectively prevent its escape. After capturing their prey, they typically spend several hours tearing apart the carcass and eating it. Some individuals beg for morsels by holding their hands, palms up under the chin of a dominant male; others snatch pieces from one another and dart in and out to recover dropped fragments—behavior that seldom occurs when they dine on plant foods. Through one means or another, as many as fifteen individuals share in eating a single prey animal.

I do not see how it can be either arbitrary or coincidental that animal foods evoke special behavior among so many human groups as well as among our primate cousins. But this does not mean that humans are compelled by genetic programming to seek out and consume such foods, the way lions and eagles and other true carnivores are driven to eat meat. There is too much variation in the ratios of plants to animals in the diets of different cultures to support the idea that we instinctively recognize animal foods as something we must eat. A more plausible explanation is that our species-given physiology and digestive processes predispose us to learn to prefer animal foods. We and our primate cousins pay special attention to foods of animal origin because such foods have special characteristics that make them exceptionally nutritious.

What's so nutritious about them? First of all, they are generally a better source of protein than are plant foods. Compared with most foods of plant origin, a higher percentage by weight of cooked meat, poultry, and fish consists of protein. And with one or two exceptions, the quality of proteins is higher in foods of animal origin than it is in plant foods.

The nutritional importance of protein is that the body uses it to promote and regulate tissue growth. Muscles, organs, cells, hormones, and enzymes all consist of different kinds of proteins formed by particular combinations of amino acids linked into long, complex chains. Between fifteen and forty percent by weight of cooked meat, fish, fowl, and milk solids consists of proteins. In contrast, the protein content of cooked cereals ranges from about two and a half to ten percent. Cooked legumes—beans, lentils, peas—all into the same range (they have higher percentage by dry weight, but they cannot be digested uncooked). Starchy root crops, such as potatoes, yams, and manioc, along with fruits and green leafy vegetables, rarely contain more than three percent protein by weight.

The only plant foods that are as proteinaceous as meat, fish, fowl, and milk solids are nuts and soybeans. But with the exception of soybeans, the quality of the proteins in plant foods—including nuts and legumes—is significantly lower than that in foods of animal origin. To understand why, one must understand the relationship between proteins and amino acids.

It takes about twenty kinds of amino acids to build the body's thousands of proteins. Out of molecules obtained by eating other kinds of nutrients, such as starches, sugars, vegetable fats, and water the body can itself synthesize many of these amino acids. The ten that it cannot synthesize are the essential amino acids; these we can obtain only by eating a plant or animal that has the ability to produce them or has ingested them for us. When we eat a food that contains proteins, the proteins get broken down into their constituent amino acids, and the amino acids are then distributed throughout the body to form a pool that is drawn upon as needed by the cells in various organs and tissues.

When we stop eating foods that contain the essential amino acids, the assembly of proteins needed for maintenance, repair, and growth continues only until the essential amino acid in shortest supply—the limiting amino acid—gets used up. (Other essential amino acids remaining in the pool will then be converted into energy and either burned up or deposited as fat.)

Many plant foods contain all ten of the essential amino acids. The problem is that the ratios in which they occur limit their ability to be converted into proteins. The least abundant essential amino acids in plants are precisely the ones most needed by the human body. For example, humans need twice as much methionine as threonine, but beans have four times as much threonine as methionine. Taking into account their digestibility, the quality of most animal sources of protein can be said to be about twenty-five to fifty percent higher than the best proteinaceous plant foods (soybeans, again, being a conspicuous exception).

As every nutritionist knows, there are strategies that can raise the protein quality of diets based on plant foods. If one eats cereals along with legumes, for example, the essential amino acid balance can be considerably improved. But this does not alter the relative nutritional value of plants and animals as sources of protein. Both quantitatively and qualitatively, animal foods are a better source of proteins than are plant foods.

Protein is only one, and not necessarily the most important, nutritional reason why humans find animal foods so attractive. Meat, fish, fowl, and dairy products are also a concentrated source of such vitamins as A and E and the entire B complex. And they are the only source of vitamin B12, a deficiency of which leads to pernicious anemia, neural disorders, and psychotic behavior. If vegans do not regularly develop B12 deficiencies, it is only because the plant foods in their diets are tinged by insect residues or by certain cobalt-digesting bacteria.

This explains why Hindu vegans suffer an increase in the incidence of pernicious anemia when they migrate from India to England: in England, the use of pesticides and the washing of fruits and vegetables wipes out the B12 supply. Vegans are also at risk of rickets, a bone-crippling disease caused by vitamin D deficiency.

Normally, we get enough vitamin D from sunlight. But in northerly latitudes, where winters are long and there are many misty, cloudy days, dietary vitamin D often becomes critical, and animal foods, especially eggs, fish, and liver, are the best sources. Animal foods even contain enough vitamin C to satisfy daily recommended allowances. By eating copious amounts of animal flesh and bone marrow; the Eskimos long maintained themselves in excellent health on an all-meat diet, without the slightest trace of scurvy or other vitamin C-deficiency diseases. Recently though, Eskimo health has deteriorated, as a result of the consumption of sweets and starches introduced into their diet by outsiders.

Animal foods are also concentrated sources of essential minerals. Iron, needed for oxygen transport in the blood, occurs in animal foods (except milk) in greater abundance and in more usable form than in spinach and other leafy plant foods. Milk and other dairy products are the best sources of calcium, essential for bone growth. And many animal foods are excellent sources of zinc, essential for male fertility, as well as copper, iodine, and almost every other element needed in trace amounts.

To say that animal foods are especially good to eat is not to say that we can dispense entirely with plant foods or that we can eat all kinds of animal foods in unlimited quantities without harming ourselves. A glaring deficiency in the animal foods package is fiber, which, paradoxically, is not a nutrient. Fiber adds bulk and roughage to the content of the large intestine, stimulates peristalsis, and is excreted without being digested.

What's more, the evidence that links diets deficient in fiber to cancer of the colon must be taken seriously. (One theory is that in the absence of fiber, the transit time of digested matter is slowed and carcinogenic substances accumulate in the bowel. Another theory stresses that phytic acid, one of the components of cereal fiber, binds to potential carcinogens and aids in their excretion.)

Though fiber deficiency has become a serious problem in affluent industrial societies, throughout history and prehistory the problem has been too much rather than too little fiber. Until the twentieth century, fiber was the cheapest food element, and its absence from animal foods was a positive aspect of the animal food package. Everybody got more than enough fiber simply by consuming imperfectly milled cereals. Additional fiber from vegetables and fruit was not only useless (fiber, having no nutritive value, does not even provide empty calories), it was potentially hazardous.

One of the most distinctive features of human physiology is that our digestive tract can cope with only small amounts of fiber. To derive essential nutrients and energy from a high-fiber diet, an animal needs to have a long and voluminous gut (or special fermentation "vats" such as cattle and sheep possess) and must spend most of the day eating. Gorillas and chimpanzees eat continually, digest slowly, and process cellulose fiber by fermentation in their voluminous colons. About thirty-five hours elapse between the time they eat something and its first appearance as fecal matter.

Humans, like gorillas and chimpanzees, have a lengthy small intestine, but our colon is conspicously smaller. Some absorption of nutrients takes place there, but the principal function of the human colon is to conserve and resorb body fluids. Transit time in the human gut is quite short—about twenty-five hours—indicating that we are not well suited for highfiber diets; rather, we seem to be adapted to dense, highquality food that can be rapidly digested. Animal foods are exactly what this formula calls for.

Whereas the absence of fiber does not substantially detract from the package of nutrients in animal food, the presence of other substances—especially fat and cholesterol—seems, at first glance, to do so. For example, much evidence links coronary heart disease with the overconsumption of saturated animal fats and cholesterol. In general, societies that consume large quantities of them have high rates of mortality from heart attacks. Also, several studies show that lowering cholesterol levels the risk of heart disease.

In the Lipid Research Clinic's Coronary Primary Prevention Trial—the best designed of these studies—middle-aged men were divided into two groups. The men in one group were given the cholesterol-lowering drug cholestryamine, in the other, a placebo. After seven years, the group that was not treated had experienced nineteen percent more coronary events, such as heart attacks.

Despite this kind of evidence, the nature of the causal links remains obscure. Fifty to sixty percent of patients with heart disease do not have elevated cholesterol counts. And many groups with diets extremely high in animal fat and cholesterol, such as the Eskimos and the Lapps, have rates of cardiovascular disease lower than expected. What's more, though diet and anticholesterol drugs may reduce pathologically high cholesterol levels in humans, no studies have yet shown that diet alone can lead to pathologically high levels of cholesterol in otherwise healthy people.

This interpretive problem is anologous to evaluating the meaning of high blood sugar levels in diabetics: diet can lower the sugar level, but diet alone may not cause the disease.

All this suggests that much more than cholesterol and animal fats is involved in the high incidence of coronary heart disease in countries where they are consumed in large amounts. Other known dietary contributors include the overconsumption of calories, salt, and alcohol. And many nondietary factors put people at risk of heart attacks: high blood pressure, cigarette smoking, air pollution, lack of exercise, and chronic repressed anger—just to mention a few.

No one knows what proportion of the risk associated with high cholesterol and animal fat reflects the combined effect of other dietary and nondietary risk factors as they interact with cholesterol and animal fat in people with modern life-styles.

Our understanding of the link between animal foods and cancer is no less fragmentary. Dietary fat—not cholesterol—is a risk factor in cancer of the breast and the colon, but no one knows if the problem arises from too much fat of all types or from too much saturated animal fat in particular. (Saturated fats are denser, harder, and have a higher melting point than do unsaturated fats.)

There is even some evidence that the least-saturated fats—the polyunsaturated vegetable fats—which are supposedly better from the standpoint of preventing cardiovascular disease, are worse from the standpoint of preventing cancer. Cancer of the colon has increased severalfold since the Second World War, precisely the period during which margarine and other polyunsaturated vegetable fats and oils substantially replaced butter and lard in the American diet.

Despite the contradictory and fragmentary nature of the evidence, the rational thing for affluent industrial societies to do—or, as the Senate's Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs put it, the "prudent thing" to do—is to cut back on cholesterol and animal fat consumption. But we must maintain a distinction between prudently cutting back on some possibly hazardous components of animal foods and imprudently giving up the entire animal food package. No one knows what will happen if we drastically reduce the amount of dietary cholesterol for the entire population, starting in childhood.

Further, there may be hidden dangers in reducing fat intake. Fat, after all, is necessary for a healthy diet, since it is needed for the absorption, transport, and storage of vitamins A, D, E, and K—the fat soluble vitamins, which enhance, respectively, vision, bone strength, fertility, and blood coagulation. Diets severely limited in fat content can, for example, hamper the body's absorption of the precursor of vitamin A and thus contribute to a form of blindness known as xerophthalmia.

The increasing unpopularity of animal fats as a source if dietary fats must be placed in a historical context. Just as animal foods formerly were more rather than less desirable because they contained little fiber, so until recently they were more rather than less desirable if they contained a lot of fat. Much of the nearly worldwide hunger for meat is really a craving for fatty meat. The reason is that lean meat needs to be supplemented by calorie-rich substances to prevent the meat's amino acids from being converted into energy rather than into bodybuilding proteins.

Although calorie for calorie, carbohydrates are about thirteen percent more efficient than fats in thus "sparing" proteins, fats provide one hundred percent more calories each gram than do carbohydrates (such as sugar or starch). This means that far fewer grams of fat than carbohydrates are needed to achieve a given protein-sparing effect.

Before the development of industrial methods of stuffing cattle, pigs, and chickens with grains, fish meal, growth hormones, and antibiotics, the problem with most meats was that they were too lean to achieve a protein-sparing effect. Today the carcasses of most livestock are thirty percent or more fat. In contrast, a survey of fifteen species of free-ranging African herbivores revealed an average carcass fat content of less than four percent. This explains a practice often observed among people who depend on hunting for their protein supply. During the height of the hungry season, when sources of nourishment are scarce, hunter-gatherers frequently refuse to eat certain cuts of meat or even whole animals that they have hunted and killed.

The Pitjandjara of Australia have been seen to walk up to a slain kangaroo, inspect its tail for signs of body fat, then walk away, leaving the animal to rot, if the signs are negative. Archaeologists have also long puzzled over ancient bison-kill sites on the American Great Plains from which only a few parts of the slain animals had been removed. The explanation for these seemingly inexplicable practices is that hunters run the risk of starving to death if they reply too heavily on lean meat. Vilhajalmur Stefansson, who learned from years of living among the Eskimos how to stay in excellent health by eating nothing but uncooked meat, warned that such a diet would work only if the meat were fatty.

He left a vivid description of a phenomenon that Eskimos, Indians, and many earlier explorers of the Far West recognized as a symptom of eating too many lean rabbits (serious dieters may find this account reminiscent of the money-making, effective, but highly dangerous diet of Irwin Maxwell Stillman, which lets people eat as much as they want of lean meats, poultry, and fish, but little else):

"If you are transferred suddenly from a diet normal in fat to one consisting wholly of rabbit you eat bigger and bigger meals for the first few days until at the end of about a week you are eating in pounds three or four times as much as you were at the beginning of the week. By that time you are showing both signs of starvation and of protein poisoning.

"You eat numerous meals; you feel hungry at the end of each; you are in discomfort through distention of the stomach with much food and you begin to feel a vague restlessness. Diarrhea will start in from a week to 10 days and will not be relieved unless you secure fat. Death will result after several weeks."

Not only is there less fat in wild animals, but its composition is different as well. Wild game contains over five times more polyunsaturated fats in a gram than does domestic livestock. Thus the threat to health associated with eating too much cholesterol and fat of animal origin is newly arisen.

Notwithstanding this threat, there is no strictly nutritional justification for lowering the consumption of meat, fish, poultry, and dairy products in the United States and other affluent countries. High levels of consumption need not imply overconsumption of cholesterol and saturated fats. Various government committees recommended that saturated animal fat be reduced to ten percent of energy intake and that the consumption of cholesterol be no more than three hundred milligrams a day. But this can be achieved without reducing the current reliance on animal foods. The key is to select foods low in cholesterol and saturated fat—lean cuts of beef and pork, more fish and poultry, more skimmed milk and skimmed milk products. (There is even a place for eggs; the cholesterol is in the yolk, not the white.)

Lean cuts of meat contain less than thirty milligrams of cholesterol and less than sixty calories to the ounce. One could therefore eat as much as ten ounces (two hundred eighty-three grams) of lean red meat, fish, or poultry every day without exceeding either the recommended fat or cholesterol percentages. That adds up to two hundred twenty-eight pounds a year, about the amount of meat, poultry, and fish that Americans currently consume. .

Before blaming cancer and heart disease on the consumption of too much animal flesh, we had better take a look at what our hunter-gatherer ancestors were doing during the hundred thousand or so years preceding the domestication of plants and animals. By piecing together evidence from archaeology, palenontology, and the study of contemporary hunter-gatherers, an estimate can be made of how much meat our paleolithic forebears consumed. S. Boyd Eaton and Melvin Konner, of Emory University, conservatively suggest, in an article published in The New England Journal of Medicine, that preagricultural peoples living in temperate climates regularly derived thirty-five percent of their calories from meat.

This means that for most of our species' history, our ancestors' bodies were adapted to the consumption of about seven hundred eighty-eight grams of red meat a day—ten times the amount of beef, pork, sheep, and goats the average American now consumes. Our ancestors probably consumed as much or more cholesterol, but less fat than is taken in by the typical American. This is the pattern, Eaton and Konner suggest, "for which human beings are in essence genetically programmed."

Anyone who contends there is something inherently more "natural" about a diet rich in wheat or rice than one rich in meat knows little about either culture or nature. Cereal grains contributed an insignificant part of the calories and proteins in the paleolithic diet; only after the adoption of agriculture a mere ten thousand years ago did grains become the staple foods of humankind. Of course, if it's the chemical adulterants, preservatives, and polyunsaturated fat that one has in mind, what we are eating by way of meat is clearly not what our ancestors ate. (But then again, neither did they eat our chemically nourished grains.)

It is important to understand that cancer and heart disease result from long-term degenerative processes; the basic reason why heart disease and cancer have become the number one and number two causes of death in the United States and other affluent countries is that people are living longer. This is not to say that these diseases are caused by old age or are in some sense inevitable, but that the effects of all the risk factors—dietary and nondietary—take a long time to express themselves. What has allowed us to live long enough to run these risks? Meat, among other things.

The increased consumption of animal foods and decreased consumption of grains are strongly associated with increased longevity. Between 1909 and 1976, United States life expectancy at birth rose by forty percent. During the same period, per capita consumption of red meat, fish, and poultry rose by thirty-five percent. Indeed, all the countries whose citizens have the highest life expectancies have undergone similar dietary changes.

A simple correlation, of course, is not evidence of causality, but given that animal foods contain essential proteins, minerals, and vitamins in concentrated forms, would it not be imprudent to conclude that improved longevity is due entirely to other factors? Since the beneficial effects of high levels of animal food consumption have been achieved despite the deleterious effects of the fats and cholesterol they contain, we simply ought to remove these offending substances and thereby further improve the nutritive value of the animal food package. And of course this is exactly what is happening, as evidenced by the rapid rise in the United States of the consumption of fish, fowl, and lean cuts of meat since 1980.

In third world countries, where undernutrition rather than overnutrition is the prime danger, animal foods retain a clear-cut nutritional advantage over plant foods, even without any reduction of their fat and cholesterol levels. The continuing world hunger for more meat, fish, fowl, and milk therefore represents a thoroughly rational preference. It will never be in the best interests of any country to eat less animal food (as distinct from less animal fat and cholesterol) as a health measure.

No one can blame a nation, like Poland, that does not rush to embrace such a fate. Perhaps someone should tell the Poles that they would be better off eating leaner meats, more fish, more poultry, fewer eggs, more skimmed milk, and less butter and lard. But woe to the would-be savior of socialism who decides to solve Poland's meat hunger by telling the people to eat more bread and beans.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, the author of this article is Marvin Harris, author of 16 books, formerly a department chairman at Columbia University and now teaching at the University of Florida. Dr. Harris' contention is that while plant foods can sustain life, access to animal foods bestows health and wellbeing above and beyond mere survival.

Before any drug can be used in food production, it must undergo extensive testing. The manufacturer must show that it is not only safe, but that a reliable test exists for detecting residues. Then, and only then, does the Food and Drug Administration approve its use.

Once the drug is approved, its use is regulated by State and Federal officials who inspect feed mixing facilities and randomly sample animal feed to insure that the approved levels of the drug are not exceeded.

USDA, through its Food Safety and Inspection Service, oversees the slaughter and processing of all livestock and poultry to insure that the animals are healthy and that all appropriate sanitation measures are taken. They also sample for drug residues.

Once again, meat is randomly inspected when it reaches the retail store—this time by FDA. But because of the precautions taken prior to delivery to the retail store, these residue tests have repeatedly demonstrated that beef is safe and unadulterated.

Despite this, consumers have voiced concern about antibiotic use, and the beef industry has responded. Penicillin is not used at all for beef production, and tetracyclines are not frequently used for growth promotion. Nonetheless, to reassure consumers, the National Cattlemen's Association has recommended to their members that any subtherapeutic use of antibiotics for growth promotion be discontinued until the issue is resolved.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE NEED TO INCREASE STUDENT LOANS

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, yesterday morning, the Labor and Human Resources Committee reported out S. 1965, the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act. It does not contain all that some of us may have wanted, but it is a strong affirmation of our commitment to our young people and America's future.

Just yesterday, some very bright and articulate students from Needham, MA, who have been working with my staff on amendments to the Higher Education Act, were in my office to discuss the reauthorization. The eloquent statement that follows details the reasons why these students believe that increasing the availability of student aid is crucial. I strongly agree with them and I made it clear to them that it is crucial for students around the country to communicate with their Members of Congress to let them know how important access and choice are for their futures.

I ask that the statement be included in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

THE NEED TO INCREASE STUDENT LOANS

The government must enhance the dignity of the citizen, promote the maximum development of his capabilities, and widen the range of his opportunities. Education is the means to these ends. The cost of education is a restricting force when considering a wide range of opportunity for young people. It is vital that adequate financial aid for education be available for the students.

Adequate financial aid is not available. The current loan limits should be increased. Students have conducted several surveys. A survey of Needham High School seniors indicates that 100% of the students asked feel that the financial aid program should be extended to allow higher loan limits. Ninety percent of the surveyed seniors point out that the financial aid package will have a definite bearing on what college or university they choose to attend. Local college and university students were surveyed to examine the impact of federal aid on their higher education. The percentage of students from the following schools would benefit from our proposed increase:

	Percent
Boston College, MA	95
Wellesley College, MA	70
General Connecticut State University	100
Brandeis University, MA	80
Clark University, MA	50
Colby College, ME	100
Plymouth State College, NH	50

According to U.S. News & World Report, the cost of 1 year's tuition for colleges has risen by 8 percent in the last 2 years. The average cost of 1 year's tuition at a public college is $4,900. At private institutions, expenses run anywhere from $9,000 to $16,000. For example, Bates College in Maine has increased its tuition by 11 percent to $14,600 per year. U.S. News & World Report indicates further that 93 out of 100 student loans are being paid back on time, and that the net rate on defaults has declined. The surveys indicate that the high cost of college disallows the promotion of higher learning and is discriminatory. Unless loan limits are increased, many students will not be able to attend the higher learning institution of their choice.

The administration believes that the existing program should be simplified, but this need not mean cut loans. Much of the administration's proposal speaks to poor management, not the need for loans. Therefore, the focus of the problem should be proper administration and management, not reducing the loan limits. The answer is to increase the Federal funding and increase the quality of management. Needy students must not become victims of governmental mismanagement.

Our most precious resource is the American child. The dividends which come with the investment in the young people have no equal. The investment in youth will bear everlasting fruit.●

RULES OF COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, Senate rule XXVI requires each standing committee of the Senate to publish its rules in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The rules of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, of which I am chairman, remain quite similar to those under which the committee has operated productively and, in general, harmoniously for several years.

Mr. President, for myself and Senator BENTSEN, I ask that the current rules of the Committee on Environment and Public Works be printed in the RECORD.

A proxy given in writing shall be valid until revoked, while a proxy given orally or by personal instructions is valid only on the day given.

(b) At the descretion of the chairman, after consultation with the ranking minority member, members who are unable to be present and whose vote has not been cast by proxy may have their positions recorded on any vote on the same business day so long as the vote will not change the outcome.

Rule 9. Statements of Witnesses at Hearings.—(a) Each witness who is scheduled to testify at any hearing of the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall file a written statement of his proposed testimony not later than noon of the last business day preceeding the day on which he is scheduled to appear. Rule 14. Naming of Public Facilities.—No building, structure or facility authorized by the committee, shall be named for any living person, except former Presidents or former Vice Presidents of the United States; or former Members of Congress over 70 years of age.

Rule 15. (a) The committee shall act on all prospectuses for construction (including construction of buildings for lease by the government), alteration and repair, or acquisition submitted by the General Services Administration in accordance with section 7(a) of the Public Buildings Act of 1959, as amended, and such action shall be completed by the date of May 15 during the same session in which such prospectuses are submitted to Congress. The committee may consider prospectuses submitted for alterations or repairs necessitated by emergency building conditions at any time during the same session of the Congress in which they are submitted. Prospectuses rejected by majority vote of the committee or not contained in any bill reported to the Senate shall be returned to the GSA and must then be resubmitted in order to be considered for action by the committee during the next session of the Congress.

(b) Reports of building project surveys submitted by the General Services Administration to the committee under section 11(b) of the Public Buildings Act of 1959, as amended, shall not be considered by the committee as being prospectuses subject to approval by committee resolution in accordance with section 7(a) of that Act. Projects described in such survey reports shall be considered for committee action only if they are submitted as prospectuses in accordance with section 7(a) and they shall be subject to the provisions of subsection (a) of this rule.

(c) Proponents of committee resolutions shall submit appropriate evidence showing need for review or reports on river and harbor and flood control projects.

During public hearings, photographers and other reporters using mechanical recording or filming devices shall position and use their equipment in such fashion as will not interfere with the seating, vision, or hearing of Committee Members or staff on the dais, nor with the orderly process of the hearing.

Rule 17. Amendment of Rules.—The rules may be added to, modified, amended, or suspended by a majority of the Committee Membership.●

AIR CONTROLLERS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the Aurora Beacon News is a conservative newspaper in Illinois. It is part of the Copley chain. If they have ever endorsed a Democratic candidate for office, I am not aware of it. I may be wrong in that assumption. But their bent is clear.

Recently, they had an editorial on the problem with the air controllers that makes more sense than anything I have seen on the subject.

I urge my colleagues to read it.

I particularly urge the staff members of the appropriate committees to take a look at this.

What is significant about this editorial is that it appears in the community where the facility is that controls traffic for much of the Midwest. I am sure the editorial writers there have had the same experience I have had of talking to the people in that facility, both management and air controllers, virtually all of whom tell the same story—that if we want better safety, we had better pull back, in a careful way, some of the experienced air controllers.

I ask that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the Aurora (IL) Beacon News, Feb. 10, 1986]

REHIRE FORMER AIR CONTROLLERS

The friendly skies aren't so friendly any more.

Civil aviation in the United States is coming off back-to-back record years in numbers of both accidents and fatalities, with nearly 2,000 lives lost in 1985 air disasters.

A number of last year's fatal crashes were caused by mechanical defects that critics claim slipped through increasingly loose Federal Aviation Administration maintenance safety inspections, and a federal judge blamed one accident on air traffic controller error.

Beyond that, so-called "near-miss" violations of air safety standards have become almost commonplace weekly occurrences throughout the FAA's 23 regional centers—including the busy Chicago Center located in Aurora—and 448 other air traffic control facilities.

The reasons for the current and growing air safety epidemic no doubt are multiple, but a logical contributing cause is the fact deregulation-engendered increases in scheduled commercial flights have overburdened FAA safety inspection and air traffic control forces.

In the case of air traffic control, it is now more than four years after the August 1981 walkout in which President Reagan fired 11,400 striking controllers.

Prior to the strike, a 16,300-member controller force manned FAA consoles and complained of overwork.

Today, with considerably more flights, there are only 14,000 controllers on duty, many of whom lack the experience necessary to handle the critical jobs necessary at the Aurora and other regional centers, as well as at the control towers at some of the nation's busiest airport.

Also today, with a pair of new unions fighting to get a foot into currently nonunion FAA doors, the same old complaints of long hours, overwork and burnout are emerging anew.

It is amazing the FAA—which continues to rely on delayed senior-controller retirements, substantial overtime and the return of administrators to the consoles—has been able to limp along and keep America's commercial carriers and private pilots flying in the relative safety it has.

We thus were glad to see, in reviewing President Reagan's 1987 budget proposal last week, that even in this Gramm-Rudmanized era of federal budgeting, the administration chose to hike the FAA budget by $200 million in the next fiscal year.

This came in spite of an overall $1.6 billion cut in the budget of the FAA's parent U.S. Department of Transportation.

The increased funding is to hire an additional 138 safety inspectors and another 500 controllers.

Both manpower increases appear necessary, and Congress ought readily to approve the request.

Instead of rounding up a new batch of green recruits who will take years of costly training and apprenticeship before they are able to help out where they are needed most, however, why not give some among that already-trained force of 11,000 fired controllers a shot at rehiring?

Among present-day supporters of that viewpoint, Illinois' junior U.S. Senator, Paul Simon, is waging a vigorous campaign in Congress to authorize just that.

Simon—the former U.S. representative who, in a rare show of support for any Reagan action, has backed the president's firing of the strikers continuously—says the need for experienced help—now—is too critical to ignore this valuable resource pool which likely could step back into key slots with relatively little retraining.

We said as much a year ago, after a U.S. Supreme Court refusal to hear a challenge filed by former controllers thoroughly ensconced the precedent that strikes against the federal government are illegal.

We agree with Simon that any program to open new FAA jobs to the strikers should include "selective screening" to weed out those who led the 1981 walkout.

Other than that, however, we see no useful purpose to further punish a highly trained force of experienced air controllers whose only crime was to be duped and coerced into following faulty leadership—especially not now, when safety statistics show their services to be a critical need.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with the committee's intention to see that such information is immediately available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD the notification which has been received. The classified annex referred to in the covering letter is available to Senators in the office of the Foreign Relations Committee, room SD-423.

The notification follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., March 17, 1986.

In reply refer to: I-00355/86ct.

Hon. RICHARD C. LUGAR,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b)(1) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding herewith Transmittal No. 86-26 and under separate cover the classified annex thereto. POLICY JUSTIFICATION

INDONESIA F-16A/B AIRCRAFT

The Government of Indonesia has requested the purchase of 8 F-16A/B aircraft (with an option for an additional four F-16A/B aircraft) with associated AIM-9P4 missiles, other aircraft munitions, support equipment, spares, contractor engineering technical support and training. The Indonesian request is for an initial purchase of eight aircraft, but it may be increased up to a total of twelve. The estimated cost is $432 million for 12 aircraft and supporting material.

This proposed sale will contribute to the foreign policy objectives of the United States by helping to improve the security of a friendly country in East Asia. Indonesia is a strategically important country as it is astride the major air and naval routes between the Indian Ocean and the Western Pacific. The F-16 is considered to be an appropriate capability in the face of the Soviet build up at Cam Ranh Bay.

Sale of these aircraft to Indonesia will improve the solidarity of the relationship with the United States and strengthen our influence in that region. It will also enhance interoperability with United States forces. Indonesia will have no difficulty absorbing these aircraft into its armed forces.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractor will be General Dynamics of Fort Worth, Texas.

Implementation of this sale will require the assignment of two additional U.S. Government personnel and 40 contractor representatives in Indonesia for one year.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

TRADE ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, among the victims of the continuing impasse among the House, the Senate and the White House over the reconciliation bill are the many thousands of men and women who are out of work and who urgently need the extended unemployment benefits provided under the trade adjustment assistance portion of the bill.

In my home town of Shreveport, more than 3,000 workers who have been laid off from the AT&T consumer products plant are eligible for this compensation. Funding for trade adjustment assistance has already been appropriated but the program is still awaiting authorization under the budget reconciliation.

I think it is tragic that those people and their families, and families like them across the Nation, have become the forgotten pawns of this ongoing policy dispute between Congress and the administration.

It is difficult for us in Congress, and certainly for those in the President's Office of Management and Budget who have helped to stall this legislation for so long, to understand what being unemployed really means. And the anguish, the desperation, and the helplessness these families must feel grows deeper with each day that we delay trade adjustment assistance.

And it is especially tragic for the people in Shreveport and other areas of my State because the prospects of a new job are so dismal. We now have a quarter of a million people out of work statewide. We have the second highest unemployment rate in the Nation and are rapidly approaching West Virginia as the State with the highest per capita unemployment.

There are, indeed, important policy disagreements involved in the dispute over reconciliation. But I hope my colleagues will remember that there are people involved as well, people like the laid-off AT&T workers in Shreveport and countless others around the country who are looking to us for help in this time of absolute despair.

I sincerely hope we will not let them down by giving up on the reconciliation bill, and I urge the leadership to continue working with the House to resolve our differences over this measure as quickly as possible and send it to the President for his signature.●

If any member so requests in advance of the meeting, the matter shall be held for meeting rather than being polled. The clerk shall keep a record of polls; if the Chairman determines that the polled matter is one of the areas enumerated in rule 2.3, the record of the poll shall be confidential. Any member may move at the Committee meeting following a poll for a vote on the polled decision.

RULE 4. INVESTIGATIONS

4.1 Authorization for investigations. All investigations shall be conducted upon a bipartisan basis by Committee staff. Investigations may be initiated by the Committee staff upon the approval of the Chairman and the ranking Minority member. 4.2 Subpoenas. Subpoenas for the attendance of witnesses or the production of memoranda, documents, records, or any other materials shall be issued by the Chairman, or by any other member of the Committee designated by him. Prior to the issuance of each subpoena, the ranking minority member, and any other member so requesting, shall be notified regarding the identity of the person to whom the subpoena will be issued and the nature of the information sought, and its relationship to the investigation.

Any witness desiring to make an introductory statement shall file 50 copies of such statement with the Chairman or clerk of the Committee 24 hours in advance of his appearance, unless the Chairman and Ranking Minority Member determine that there is good cause for a witness's failure to do so. A witness shall be allowed no more than ten minutes to orally summarize his prepared statement.

5.4 Counsel.

(a) A witness's counsel shall be permitted to be present during his testimony at any public or closed hearing or deposition or staff interview to advise such witness of his rights, provided, however, that in the case of any witness who is an officer or employee of the government, or of a corporation or association, the Chairman may rule that representation by counsel from the government, corporation, or association creates a conflict of interest, and that the witness shall be represented by personal counsel not from the government, corporation or association.

(b) A witness who is unable for economic reasons to obtain counsel may inform the Committee at least 48 hours prior to the witness's appearance, and it will endeavor to obtain volunteer counsel for the witness. Such counsel shall be subject solely to the control of the witness and not the Committee. Failure to obtain counsel will not excuse the witness from appearing and testifying.

5.5 Transcript. An accurate electronic or stenographic record shall be kept of the testimony of all witnesses in executive and public hearings. Any witness shall be afforded, upon request, the right to review that portion of such record, and for this purpose, a copy of a witness's testimony in public or closed session shall be provided to the witness. Upon inspecting his transcript, within a time limit set by the committee clerk, a witness may request changes in testimony to correct errors of transcription, grammatical errors, and obvious errors of fact; the Chairman or a staff officer designated by him shall rule on such request.

5.6 Impugned persons. Any person who believes that evidence presented, or comment made by a member of staff, at a public hearing or at a closed hearing concerning which there have been public reports, tends to inpugn his character or adversely affect his reputation may;

(a) file a sworn statement of facts relevant to the evidence or comment, which shall be placed in the hearing record;

(b) request the opportunity to appear personally before the Committee to testify in his own behalf; and

(c) submit questions in writing which he requests be used for the cross-examination of other witnesses called by the Committee. The Chairman shall inform the Committee of such requests for appearance or cross-examination. If the Committee so decides, the requested questions, or paraphrased versions or portions of them, shall be put to the other witnesses by a member or by staff.

5.7 Minority witnesses. Whenever any hearing is conducted by the Committee, the minority on the Committee shall be entitled, upon request made by a majority of the minority members to the Chairman, to call witnesses selected by the minority to testify or produced documents with respect to the measure or matter under consideration during at least one day of hearing. Such request must be made before the completion of the hearing or, if subpoenas are required to call the minority witnesses, no later than three days before the completion of the hearing.

5.8 Conduct of witnesses, counsel and members of the audience. If, during public or executive sessions, a witness, his counsel, or any spectator conducts himself in such a manner as to prevent, impede, disrupt, obstruct, or interfere with the orderly administration of such hearing the Chairman or presiding Member of the subcommittee present during such hearing may request the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, his representative or any law enforcement official to eject said person from the hearing room.

RULE 6. DEPOSITIONS AND COMMISSIONS

6.1 Notice. Notices for the taking of depositions in an investigation authorized by the Committee shall be authorized and issued by the Chairman or by a staff officer designated by him. Such notices shall specify a time and place for examination, and the name of the staff officer or officers who will take the deposition. Unless otherwise specified, the deposition shall be in private. The Committee shall not initiate procedures leading to criminal or civil enforcement proceedings for a witness's failure to appear unless the deposition notice was accompanied by a Committee subpoena.

6.2 Counsel. Witnesses may be accompanied at a deposition by counsel to advise them of their rights, subject to the provisions of Rule 5.4.

6.3 Procedure. Witnesses shall be examined upon oath administered by an individual authorized by local law to administer oaths. Questions shall be propounded orally by Committee staff. Objections by the witness as to the form of questions shall be noted by the record. If a witness objects to a question and refuses to testify on the basis of relevance or privilege, the Committee staff may proceed with the deposition, or may, at that time or at a subsequent time, seek a ruling by telephone or otherwise on the objection from a member of the Committee. If the member overrules the objection, he may refer the matter to the Committee or he may order and direct the witness to answer the question, but the Committee shall not initiate procedures leading to civil or criminal enforcement unless the witness refuses to testify after he has been ordered and directed to answer by a member of the Committee.

6.4 Filing. The Committee staff shall see that the testimony is transcribed or electronically recorded. If it is transcribed, the witness shall be furnished with a copy for review. No later than five days thereafter, the witness shall return a signed copy, and the staff shall enter the changes, if any, requested by the witness in accordance with Rule 5.6. If the witness fails to return a signed copy, the staff shall note on the transcript the date a copy was provided and the failure to return it. The individual administering the oath shall certify on the transcript that the witness was duly sworn in his presence, the transcriber shall certify that the transcript is a true record of the testimony, and the transcript shall then be filed with the Committee clerk. Committee staff may stipulate with the witness to changes in this procedure; deviations from this procedure which do not substantially impair the reliability of the record shall not relieve the witness from his obligation to testify truthfully.

6.5 Commissions. The Committee may authorize the staff, by issuance of commissions, to fill in prepared subpoenas, conduct field hearings, inspect locations, facilities, or systems of records, or otherwise act on behalf of the Committee. Commissions shall be accompanied by instructions from the Committee regulating their use.

RULE 7. SUBCOMMITTEES

7.1 Establishment. The Committee will operate as a Committee of the Whole, reserving to itself the right to establish temporary subcommittees at any time by majority vote. The Chairman of the full Committee and the Ranking Minority Member shall be ex officio members of all subcommittees.

7.2 Jurisdiction. Within its jurisdiction, as described in the Standing Rules of the Senate, each subcommittee is authorized to conduct investigations, including use of subpoenas, depositions, and commissions.

7.3 Rules. A subcommittee shall be governed by the Committee rules, except that its quorum for all business shall be one third of the subcommittee membership, and for hearings shall be one member.

8. Reports. Committee reports incorporating Committee findings and recommendations shall be printed only with the prior approval of the Committee, after an adequate period for review and comment. The printing, as Committee documents, of materials prepared by staff for informational purposes, or the printing of materials not originating with the Committee or staff, shall require prior consultation with the minority staff; these publications shall have the following language printed on the cover of the document: "Note: This document has been printed for informational purposes. It does not represent either findings or recommendations formally adopted by the Committee."

9. Amendment of Rules. The rules of the Committee may be amended or revised at any time, provided that not less than a majority of the Committee present so determine at a Committee meeting preceded by at least 3 days notice of the amendments or revisions proposed.●

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am here on the Senate floor to once again join the congressional call to conscience on behalf of the thousands of persecuted Jews in the Soviet Union. I commend Sentor MITCHELL for his leadership in organizing the call to conscience this year.

Last fall, I spoke about the plight of Aleksandr Rozman, who had been cruelly and arbitrarily separated from his wife, Jan Feldman, a resident of Vermont. I am delighted to report that for whatever reason, the Soviets saw fit to reunite this young couple, who are now living together in Burlington.

But the successful resolution of one case—or even a handful—should not lull us into inactivity. Behind Mr. Rozman are thousands of other Soviet Jews, all yearning for the freedoms that are stifled so ruthlessly in the country of their birth.

Today, I would like to talk about the case of Boris Rivkin.

Boris Rivkin first applied for an exit visa 10 years ago. Educated at an engineering institute and working in a lab associated with weather forecasting, Boris was treated by the government as if he had access to sensitive information.

It is a policy in the Soviet Union to make people who have worked in security sensitive areas wait 5 years before being allowed to emigrate. Boris dutifully left his work and took a job as an elevator operator. After 5 years passed, Rivkin applied for an exit visa. His request was denied.

He then made a tragic and heroic decision. He divorced his wife so she and their children would have a chance to leave the country. When OVIR again refused them permission to emigrate, Rivkin demonstrated in their office. His wife and children were granted permission to leave, and he was told that if he remained quiet for 1 year, a visa for him would be forthcoming. The chief of OVIR did not follow through on this promise.

Five more years have passed. Boris continues to be stonewalled. His son, now 21 years old and able legally to send his father invitations has repeatedly done so. His ex-wife, no longer a relative, of course, is prohibited from sending Boris invitations. When Rivkin presented his invitation from his American son, he was told by OVIR that he needed an invitation from Israel. This, in spite of the fact that invitations must come from relatives and Boris has none in Israel. Moreover, he now has no relatives in the Soviet Union.

Rivkin has been on several hunger strikes, all to no avail. His health is very fragile. He has only one kidney—the second having been removed. He is determined, but he is losing his optimism and hope, especially after the invitation set last year by his son and signed by Secretary of State Shultz was not even accepted, let alone, acted upon.

Finally, Boris speaks excellent English, and Hebrew, has published several noteworthy articles in his field. It is a tragic situation when a man of his courage and ability is separated from his family and forced to languish in a country where he has no family, and importantly, no freedom or hope.●

SETON HALL LAW WEEK 1986

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, during the week of March 31, 1986 through April 5, 1986, Seton Hall Law School of Newark, NJ, will be celebrating Seton Hall Law Week. The theme this year will be the legal profession in the community at large. The student bar association of the law school is coordinating activities sponsored by the individual student organizations and some other law school groups in an attempt to show the important role of the lawyer in the community.

The members of the student bar association and its president, Timothy F. McGoughran, are to be commended for their efforts to share with their fellow students and the public, the importance and role of attorneys in our society.

Mr. President, these aspiring lawyers are working in the tradition of a vital profession in this country. I want to share with my colleagues the fine efforts of these students.●

INDIAN GAMBLING

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, for several months, I have been working closely with the administration on alternative legislation to those bills now pending before the Congress on the regulation of Indian gambling activities. While the final details have not been agreed upon, I believe it is timely to inform my colleagues about our thoughts on the matter.

The attached letter to Congressman UDALL is from John R. Bolton, Assistant Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice. The letter and summary of the administration proposal explain our basic position. We do not intend to interfere with so-called "ceremonial gaming" that is conducted along with tribal rituals. We do establish a Federal commission to regulate bingo, and we would require that all other forms of gambling be regulated by the 50 States according to their laws and regulations.

I believe this is a balanced approach to the potential problems of expanding gambling activities on Indian reservations, and I will be happy to know of original cosponsors for introduction shortly after the Easter recess.

The letter and summary follow:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF LEGISLATIVE AND INTERGOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC.

Hon. MORRIS K. UDALL,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We understand that the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs has reported H.R. 1920, a bill to establish federal standards and regulations for the conduct of gaming activities on Indian reservations and lands, and that the bill may soon reach the floor of the House of Representatives for a vote. This Department has previously expressed its concerns with H.R. 1920 and we would like to reiterate our opposition to its passage as presently drafted.

As you know, the Department of Justice is responsible for criminal law enforcement as well as representation of the Secretary of the Interior in matters involving Indian tribes. Thus, we are in a unique position to perceive all of the possible ramifications of H.R. 1920, recognizing both the very real and serious potential for criminal infiltration in such a lucrative enterprise as well as the economic benefit such an enterprise can afford the Indian tribes. The Department testified in November 1985 on proposals to address the issue and outlined the major concepts of the Administration's policy on Indian gambling that is very close to being finalized.

A major objection to H.R. 1920 is that it fails to recognize that widespread, high-stakes gambling on Indian reservations, involving large sums of cash and lucrative peripheral service industries, would draw organized crime like a magnet, and in its trail would follow fraud and corruption. Indians are no more susceptible to infiltration by organized crime than any other segment of society. It is, however, the inherent nature of the enterprise itself that we have seen time and time again draw criminal elements solely because there is so much profit to be made. H.R. 1920 fails to provide the high degree of regulation and control, including intensive background checks, licensing procedures, management contract review and approval by the Secretary, auditing and oversight that is necessary to ensure the integrity of the games this legislation intends to legitimate.

Of significant concern to this Administration is H.R. 1920's fragmented approach to enforcement. First, the bill requires that the National Indian Gaming Commission adopt comprehensive regulations for Class III gaming which are "identical to that provided for the same or similar gaming activity by the state within which such Indian gaming activity is to be conducted." While the Committee states that its intent is not to require that all state laws relating to gaming activity be incorporated into a federal Commission's regulatory scheme, this provision could result in 50 different sets of regulations, which would be impossible to monitor or enforce. Second, criminal enforcement of gambling laws would be severely hampered because certain states (those that have criminal jurisdiction under Public Law 280) would be empowered to enforce, while others would not. Federal enforcement authorities do not have the resources or expertise to investigate gambling violations based on state laws. States, on the other hand, already have in place the necessary enforcement mechanisms to regulate and enforce their gambling laws. Prosecution of criminal cases arising out of state gambling laws must remain primarily the responsibility of the states, with the federal government playing a back-up role where states are reluctant to act. This comports with applicable constitutional principles.

The Administration's proposal to regulate Indian gambling is nearing completion in a matter of weeks. A summary of that proposal is attached. We feel that it represents a balanced approach to the regulation of this highly lucrative, easily corrupted enterprise while allowing the tribes to improve their economic position by promoting these games. We request that the Committee postpone any further activity on H.R. 1920 until it can consider the Administration proposal.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised this Department that there is no objection to the submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

JOHN R. BOLTON,
Assistant Attorney General.

SUMMARY OF ADMINISTRATION PROPOSAL TO REGULATE INDIAN GAMBLING

Gambling is divided into three categories: ceremonial, bingo and "all other" forms. Ceremonial would be uncontrolled; bingo would be controlled by a federal commission; and "all other" gambling would be controlled by the law of the state where the tribe is located.

Tribally operated bingo would not be permitted in any state which does not permit any form of legal bingo. Five states currently prohibit all types of bingo.

The Native American Bingo Commission would be created to license and police tribal bingo operations. The Secretary of the Interior will appoint the majority of the Commission who will serve at his pleasure. The Secretary will also appoint the Chairman. The Attorney General will appoint one member of the Commission, a career Department of Justice employee who will serve at the pleasure of the Attorney General. All expenses of the Commission, except the salaries of the Commissioners, will be borne by the tribes operating bingo through licensing fees.

Subject to approval by the Secretary, the Commission is authorized to draft rules and regulations regarding management contracts and other specified subjects relating to the conduct of gambling.

The Secretary's involvement in the Commission's day-to-day decisions concerning license applications and inspections of bingo operations is to be minimal. The Commission is to operate independently in these areas, although its decisions are subject to judicial review. The Secretary and Attorney General will maintain overall policy control through their authority to dismiss the Commissioners they appointed.

Any federally recognized tribe (except a tribe in one of the five states that prohibits bingo) may apply for a license to operate bingo, or authorize a separate entity, such as a tribal corporation, to do so. The Commission will then conduct a background investigation to determine the prospective licensee's fitness and ability (and that of any management contractor) to run a bingo operation in compliance with the law and for the general economic benefit of the tribe. The Commission may contract with tribal, federal, state, or private agencies for such investigations. If the Commission denies or fails to issue a license within the specified time—90 days if the prospective licensee is not going to use a management contractor and 270 days if the prospective licensee is going to use such a contractor—the applicant is entitled to a hearing before the Commission. An adverse decision would be subject to judicial review.

The Commission must approve management contracts, and the legislation contains a number of provisions relating to such contracts. Management contractors can receive no more than forty percent of the net income from the bingo operation, but the Commission can decide that in a particular case that a certain figure is too much and only approve a contract that provided for a lesser amount. Existing contracts would be allowed to remain in effect until October 1, 1987, unless terminated earlier by the Secretary pursuant to his general supervisory powers over such contracts.

The Commission is authorized to issue regulations concerning which, if any, individual employees of bingo establishments and of management contractors must obtain a license from the Commission and to establish the criteria for a license. The Commission is also authorized to conduct background investigations on persons required to be licensed and may conduct these investigations by contracting with outside agencies. The license must be issued in 90 days or the applicant is entitled to a hearing before the Commission. The Commission's decision is subject to judicial review.

The Commission is authorized to inspect and examine licensed bingo operations and to institute disciplinary action for violations of its rules. When the Commission has reason to believe that a tribal licensee, an individual licensee, or a management contractor has violated a statutory provision or rule of the Commission in such a manner that the license or approval of the management contract should be suspended, modified or revoked, or that a monetary penalty should be imposed, it must give the suspected violator notice and a hearing. Disciplinary action is also subject to judicial review.

THE GENOCIDE OF INDIANS BY THE COMMUNIST SANDINISTAS IN NICARAGUA

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, in this proliferation of statements about Nicaragua and Soviet plans for military and political domination of that country, there is a chapter which demands our attention as citizens of a civilized nation dedicated to fundamental principles of human rights. This is the systematic program that the Communist-backed Sandinistas have for persecution, torture, and genocide of the Indian tribes of Nicaragua. The Sandinistas are engaging in actual genocide of the Nicaraguan Indian tribes on a scale which rivals that of the Pol Pot in Cambodia or the Soviets in Afghanistan. The American Indians of Nicaragua are being pillaged, raped, tortured, and carried away in Soviet-supplied helicopters. They are being killed after tortures which should appall all civilized people. The Sandinistas have gotten away with this without one blink from the United Nations or any protest by the human rights activists in our country, in the Western democracies, or in the Third World.

I want to call this genocide in Nicaragua to the attention of the Congress and the American people. I want us to know that this is happening and to do all we can to stop it. If the Genocide Treaty is worth anything at all, it should be called into play immediately in this situation. But I am not persuaded that this will happen or that if it did, it would stop the killing. If the treaty has any of the validity its proponents so recently claimed, it will be involved. Does anyone think it will? Only the outrage of the community of civilized nations can put pressure on the Sandinistas to begin to cease this awful genocide. Only a victory by the forces of democracy can stop it completely.

I never thought that I would be in agreement with certain people in the American Indian Movement. But in this case, I not only agree, but I wholeheartedly support their efforts to bring this genocide of the Indians of Nicaragua to our attention. For this reason, I ask that the attached articles be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

A VOICE FOR INDIANS' PLIGHT IN NICARAGUA

(By Marc Lee)

Russell Means, the American Indian Activist known for his 1973 shootout with the FBI at Wounded Knee, S.D., yesterday called Daniel Ortega's Sandinista government in Nicaragua one of the 20th century's most violent regimes.

"They stand next to [former Cambodian leader] Pol Pot in their thirst for genocide," said Mr. Means, still smarting from a shrapnel wound sustained during a just completed clandestine tour of Indian villages in eastern Nicaragua.

"Support of the Sandinistas is unholy. I just don't want to have to be proven right after the holocaust," he said, following his monthlong adventure.

Mr. Means, a founder of the American Indian Movement, is in Washington to ask the Reagan administration to give financial and military aid to Indian tribes opposing the Sandinista government.

Sandinistas frequently raid Indian villages, taking children away in Soviet-made helicopters, he said. "They take them off and kill them. I saw 29 teen-age boys, ages 12 to 16, taken from one village. They are never seen again once they're taken."

Mr. Means said the Sandinistas are bent on genocide, killing and torturing Miskito, Suma and Rama Indians. He described the Sandinistas' common methods of torture as electric shock to the testicles, breaking bones with 2-by-4s and pulling off fingernails.

"Burning people alive and raping women is also commonplace," said Mr. Means. "Village churches and schools have been transformed into torture chambers."

Mr. Means was accompanied on his trip by two other North American activists, Hank Adams of Olympia, Wash., and Clem Chartier, a Canadian who heads the World Council of Indigenous People.

The group set out secretly from Costa Rica, Jan. 7, protected by Misurasata fighters, an Indian rebel group led by Brooklyn Rivera.

During the group's stay in Nicaragua, the Sandinistas issued over public radio a death warrant for Mr. Means and told village Indians that Mr. Means "had to be exterminated because the team was in the country to discredit the government.

"They threatened to murder anyone giving us aid," he said.

The Nicaraguan armed forces set up a naval blockade to catch the group, Mr. Means said. "They hunted us with helicopters during the night."

Although pursued by government troops, the team escaped serious injury. But Mr. Means suffered an abdominal wound when a bomb exploded near him. The group pad-died out of Nicaragua in a canoe and made a 24-hour trip to the island of San Andres in Colombian territory.

Mr. Means said the Misurasata Indian rebels are "fearless fighters," but they now must capture all of their weapons from the Sandinistas.

"They just need guns, ammunition, boots and medicine," he said. "You'll never hear them asking for anything more, because they're a self-sufficient people."

The Indian activist said American liberals and radicals have not helped the Indian cause. "We certainly have no liberal friends," he said. "From hippies to Walter Mondale, they are a bunch of welfare clients. They're great at championing someone else's revolution, but they never do anything themselves.

"I describe liberals as opinion pollsters. Whatever the latest opinion poll shows, they move in that direction," Mr. Means said. "They are now vehemently condemming me on grounds that I've been bought by the CIA. Can you imagine that?"

Mr. Means opposes U.S. aid to the Nicaraguan resistance fighters, because he says the Contras are fighting a war that could last for another 60 years, whereas the "Indians and Creole," who claim to control 45 percent of Nicaraguan soil, could wage a winnable war.

"You're fighting a sophisticated communist regime, and the Contras lack the manpower and the military might needed to wage a successful war," he said.

The Sandinistas are dangerous because they are such "sophisticated liars," Mr. Means said. "They have managed to turn the word 'atrocity' into the word 'mistake.' They have systematically persecuted Catholics, and yet they get Catholic support from this country."

During his stay in Washington, Mr. Means said he will try to arrange a meeting with President Reagan to report his findings and gain support for the Indians' plight in Nicaragua.

"I admire [Mr. Reagan] because he lets you know exactly what he stands for," Mr. Means said. "Hopefully, he'll be able to give us some support. The Reagans are not the dangerous people in the world. It's the Carters and the Mondales who are really dangerous."

If the United States doesn't offer assistance, Mr. Means said he will seek support from other nations and international organizations. Mr. Means said he will present documents of his recent trip to the United Nations Commission of Human Rights and to Congress.

"My people only have two choices," he said. "Fight or be exterminated."

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 11, 1986]

THE REAL FREEDOM FIGHTERS IN NICARAGUA

(By Russell Means)

The United States is following the logic of self-defeat in Nicaragua. Recently, while traveling clandestinely in that country, I realized that one force, without any outside support whatsoever, had waged a five-year, armed resistance against the Marxist-led government. It is made up of American Indians fighting under the banner of an organization known as Misurasata.

The Reagan administration claims its objective in Central America is the transformation or overthrow of the Sandinista government. Yet it restricts its material support to the contras, an odd assortment of supposed "freedom fighters" waging an unsuccessful guerrilla war against Managua from Honduras. Such a policy is nonsense in terms of both strategic military and economic planning, virtually guaranteeing that the use of American troops will eventually be required to change the course of the Sandinista regime.

The reason for this odd situation is that thg resistance fighters inside Nicaragua are American Indians of the Miskito, Sumu and Rama nations on the Atlantic coast. Rallying behind their representative politico-military organization, Misurasata, and enlisting allies from the region's Creole and Latino communities, the Indians are struggling for preservation of their own autonomy and self-determination. Hence, the wizards of the State Department have deemed Misurasata unacceptable.

The magnitude of the error involved in this position—which is manifestly more anti-Indian than anticommunist—is readily evident. While the Reagan-backed contra units are collapsing in the field, Misurasata has managed to secure the bulk of the traditional Atlantic coast Indian territory against ground invasion by Sandinista troops.

I personally witnessed the massive Indian support to Misurasata, which allows it to maintain 2,000 to 3,000 warriors on the basis of materials captured from the Nicaraguan army. I witnessed firsthand the fact that the Indians control not only the land within their territory but also the rivers and logistics all along the Atlantic Coast.

I also experienced firsthand the nature of Managua's response to the effectivenss of Indian resistance. Unable to maneuver on the ground within Indian territory, they have resorted to air strikes and helicopter assaults on villages and other civilian targets, as welll as attempting a blockade by sea. I have seen the mass graves that result and have documented accounts from 28 different villages concerning the Sandinista program of torture and execution intended to terrorize the Indians into submission to centralized rule. This policy of terror has backfired on Managua.

The level of Indian resistance is such that with proper material support Misurasata could immediately field at least 15,000 warriors and fully liberate Indian territories—about a third of Nicaragua—in a matter of months. In a meeting with me on March 3, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs Elliot Abrams agreed that Misurasata is a major factor in anti-Sandinista resistance, but suggested the Indians should abandon their own agenda and merge with the contras as a prerequisite to receiving any sort of American support.

Specifically, Abrams felt it appropriate that Misurasata put itself under Kisan, a tiny "Indian" contra group based in Honduras and unable to show support of any kind from the Indian communities of Nicaragua. It is interesting to note that, while the U.S. State Department promotes Kisan as a "legitimate Indian voice," so does Managua, a situation that suggests the lengths to which Washington is prepared to go to avoid emergence of any true expression of Indian sovereignty in this hemisphere.

My response to Abrams is that no such political strings were attached to congressional allocation of $27 million in humanitarian aid last year. It is precisely this sort of manipulation and compulsory political subordination that caused the Indian resistance to Sandinista policies in the first place. There is no reason to expect them to be more willing to accept such behavior from Washington than from Managua. If by some fluke the contras were able to unseat the Sandinistas tomorrow, they too would have to deal with Indian rights to autonomy and self-determination on the Atlantic coast.

There has been a lot of talk lately about "being on the right side of history" where Nicaragua is concerned. Indeed, a crossroads has been reached. America now has the opportunity to cross over from the side of history that has been marked by the genocide of Indian peoples for 500 years and which is evident today in the looming forced relocation of 10,000 traditional Navajos from their Arizona homeland, the similar forced relocation of the James Bay Cree in Canada, the slaughter of the Ache people in Paraguay, the decimation of the Indians of Brazil and Guatemala, and the counterinsurgency warfare directed at the Indians of Nicaragua.

The alternative is to remain on the side of history marked by the European world view, to insist that Indians are inherently subordinate to non-Indians, and that they are ultimately expendable peoples.

A decision to remain on this latter side of history will not only be morally wrong, but, for once, politically, economically and militarily unworkable as well. It carries with it a greatly increased likelihood that direct U.S. military intervention will be necessary to effect change in Managua. The sole other option will be to admit, once and for all, that the United States prefers any European-derived form of government—even a Marxist-Leninist one—to the true exercise of Indian sovereignty.

I will put it clearly: there is a choice that must be made by Ronald Reagan or the American people. They must decide whether the continued suppression of Indian rights is worth the risk of another Vietnam-type quagmire, with all the human and financial cost this entails, or whether they are finally willing to accept that notions of freedom and democracy must inevitably include Indians.●

JACQUELINE OWENS—A DEDICATED VOLUNTEER

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to commend the work of Mrs. Jacqueline Owens, of Miami, FL. Mrs. Owens is a dedicated volunteer who for 18 years has served our Nation's veterans at the Veterans' Administration Medical Center in Miami, FL.

Initially, Mrs. Owens served as a clerical assistant in the office of the center's Chief of Dental Services. In 1970, on her own initiative, through her own generosity and donations she encouraged from others, she started an arts and crafts program at the center.

The program she created aided the hospitalized veterans both physically and emotionally, and in some instances hastened the veterans' return to the community in a productive capacity.

This petite, older woman has shown great strength of character. Health problems within her own family have not prevented her from developing this program, which started with five participants and now regularly serves 50 veterans who are hospitalized or who are residents of the center's nursing home.

She promotes volunteerism in others and personally provides transportation so that other volunteers may help with the program. She is most pleased, though, when participants she has taught become teachers for new participants.

Studies have shown that particularly with elderly people the loss of mental skills may be more the result of disuse than disease. Mental exercise may reverse this process. Mrs. Owens' volunteerism may be very important to the well-being of those who participate because she keeps them actively engaged.

Her dedication to the patients and residents of the center extends beyond the arts and crafts program. When veterans are unable to participate because of illness, she may visit them in their room. She has occasionally become an advocate of such veterans to assure they receive appropriate attention.

Mr. Chairman, President Reagan has often encouraged Americans to participate more fully in the opportunities available for volunteers. Mrs. Owens has volunteered her services for many years and is an excellent example for all of us. I am proud that she is a resident of Florida. I am pleased to be able to recognize her excellent contribution.●

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE HARVARD MEDICARE PROJECT

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I call my colleagues' attention to an article which appeared in last week's issue of the New England Journal of Medicine. That article offers recommendations of the Harvard Medicare project, a distinguished group of health policy analysts and economists, on preparing to meet the future of Medicare. While I do not agree with all of their recommendations, I do agree wholeheartedly with some of their observations—for example:

That Medicare reform has too often proceeded in a piecemeal manner, driven by budgetary crises rather than deliberated health policy;

That the Medicare Program must be restructured and simplified so that beneficiaries and caregivers don't have to deal with so many unnecessarily different types of cost-sharing provisions, appeals processes, and covered versus uncovered services;

That this restructuring should be designed to offer greater protection to those with lower incomes or higher medical expenses in order to ease the disproportionate burden of out-of pocket costs they bear under the current system;

That a cooperative approach between the public and private sector must be encouraged—for instance, in the continued development of private health plans such as HMO's; that Medicare beneficiaries should be offered more choices, such as membership in an HMO; and that Medicare should continue to encourage enrollment in prepaid health care organizations;

That Medicare should revise the method of determining fee-for-service payments to physicians to eliminate the inflationary incentives inherent in the current reasonable charge formula;

That Medicare's philosophy should be changed from one which finances sick care to one which promotes prevention and staying well;

That Medicare must be restructured to include long-term care, the real need of the Medicare population; and finally;

That long-range considerations, not short-sighted goals, must shape the changes we make today.

Medicare was designed to meet those acute care needs of the older population that were unmet by private insurance in the 1960's. But that old framework doesn't fit the needs of the Medicare-eligible population of today. Nor will it meet the needs of this population in the future as it continues to grow. By 1990, the number of people aged 85 and older, the heaviest users of health care services, will double. By the year 2000, the number 65 and older will double. We must take steps to enable the Medicare Program to handle those needs.

I do take exception to the authors' criticism of the prospective payment system for hospitals. They predict that the system will not be effective in controlling costs in the long run because hospitals will simply increase admissions of Medicare beneficiaries. But with all of the Medicare participating hospitals now under prospective payment, there has been a decrease in the annual number of Medicare admissions. Clearly, the evidence shows that hospitals are not trying to game the system by fostering overutilization through unnecessary admissions.

Finally, I must add that I differ with the conclusions of the Harvard Medicare project on payment policy, I do not agree that the prospective payment system for hospitals is bankrupt. I believe the evidence shows very clearly that the prospective payment system has contributed to better management in the health care system. This Nation should move toward improving economic incentives in the health care marketplace, not dictating from the State or Federal level how hospitals and physicians do business. It's too bad that regarding hospital payment policy the report looks backwards to the 1970's approaches to health care cost containment.

Despite these reservations about the report, the Harvard Medicare project goes a long way in its recommendations for restructuring Medicare package. I ask that this thought-provoking article by the Harvard Medicare project be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

SPECIAL REPORT—THE FUTURE OF MEDICARE

Since the creation of Medicare 20 years ago, the program has done much to promote the health and well-being of elderly persons and the general public in the United States. Life expectancy at age 65 has increased by 2½ years. Elderly persons now visit doctors at least as often as do younger Americans. Middle-generation Americans no longer have to choose between providing for their children and financing health care for their parents.

However, Medicare does have a number of evident failings. The cost of physicians' services under Medicare continues to rise at an astronomical rate. Medicare provides the elderly only the most minimal protection againt catastrophic health care expenditures or the enormous, unpredictable, and growing costs of long-term care. Older persons now pay a larger portion of their income for health care than they did before Medicare was enacted. The program itself has become so complicated that few elderly people understand how it works, what it entitles them to, or even where to go to find answers to their questions.

At the same time, Medicare faces political challenges. In the drive to balance the federal budget, the program is a tempting target for cutbacks. During this era of government retrenchment, proposals have been made to replace Medicare with subsidized private savings plans and private insurance policies.

The participants in the Harvard Medicare Project saw the 20th anniversary of Medicare as an appropriate time to take stock of the program's successes and to make specific suggestions to meet the enormous challenges it faces. This report summarizes only the most of our 40 proposals. A complete discussion of all our recommendations appear elsewhere.[1] Although we hope our findings will be relevant to issues now on the legislative agenda, we, as academics, have the luxury of taking a longer view. In the past, Medicare reform has too often proceeded in a piecemeal manner, driven by moments of crisis or by purely programmatic concerns. Too much of the current political debate has focused solely on cost control, as opposed to more general program improvement. Many of our suggestions indicate the direction we think Medicare should take over the next 10 to 15 years. We hope that history will bear us out and that these proposals will contribute to a broad-ranging debate about the future of this essential but troubled program.

PREMISES AND GOALS

Our analysis is predicated on one premise and three goals. The premise is that the government must continue to play an important part in ensuring that elderly people have adequate access to health care services and adequate protection against the costs of illness. Our goals are to promote cost control, fairness, and simplicity in the Medicare program.

Footnotes at end of article.

As in other areas of social policy, it has become increasingly fashionable to address Medicare's problems with market-oriented solutions. We are neither opposed to private initiatives nor enamored of government. However, the special nature of older persons and their health problems argues for caution in relying primarily on private solutions to providing health care for them.

The Medicare program was enacted specifically because some elderly people were unable to obtain affordable private insurance. Today this problem is even more severe. The costs of health care have soared and private insurers face sharply increased competition, thus making them less able to subsidize unprofitable enrollees.

Even when options are available, older persons may be unable to reap the benefits fully. As compared with younger consumers, the elderly are often less capable of making knowledgeable choices about health care purchases and less able to change insurers or providers when dissatisfied. Partly because elderly persons are more likely to suffer from physical and mental impairments (declining eyesight, hearing, and memory), they have more trouble than younger persons in comprehending the increasingly complex insurance arrangements now available. The elderly also usually lack the counsel of the purchasing agents and benefits representatives who serve younger, employed populations.[2] Although some retired persons may be able to navigate our health care system, many others will not fare well in the rough and tumble of a health care marketplace.

Consequently, although we favor providing Medicare beneficiaries with more choices, we believe this can best be achieved by allowing them more options within the existing Medicare program and by encouraging a cooperative approach between the public and private sectors. Private health plans, such as health maintenance organizations (HMOs), can play a more avtive part in the program. However, the government must take an equally active role in making certain that the health care system provides the essential care that the elderly need. Recent reforms have demonstrated that Medicare can stimulate beneficial changes in the way we pay for health services (through prospective hospital payments) and in the way health care is delivered (for example, in hospices). Medicare should continue to have this role.

In discharging these responsibilities, the government should strive to achieve three goals. First, it is essential to contain Medicare ependitures. We are concerned not only about the current federal deficit; rather, cost control is a valuable objective in its own right, as long as it is achieved through changes that increase the efficiency of the program.

A second goal for the Medicare program is fairness—to the elderly, to health care providers, and to other groups (employers, insurance companies, and family members) who are effected by the program. The elderly should receive affordable health care that is comparable in quality and amount to that enjoyed by the average American. When cost considerations dictate limits on access to services or higher patient payments, the burden should fall more heavily on the healthy and the wealthy.

Medicare should end payment policies that treat providers in capricious or unpredictable ways. The program should also honor its broader responsibility to society. It should pay enough to cover the reasonable costs of caring for its own beneficiaries, and it should promote payment systems that discourage discrimination against any group of patients.

The third goal of the Medicare program should be simplicity. Medicare is currently composed of several parts, each with its own procedural requirements and appeals processes. Beneficiaries must deal with five different types of cost sharing and with seemingly arbitrary distinctions between covered and uncovered services. The Medicare program should be simplified so that both the elderly and their care givers can understand it.

REFORMS DIRECTLY AFFECTING BENEFICIARIES

Three aspects of the Medicare program have the most direct and immediate effect on its beneficiaries. The first is the amount patients must pay out of pocket at the time services are used—i.e., their copayment responsibilities (coinsurance and deductibles). The second is the nature of those covered services—i.e., what Medicare will and will not help to pay for. The third is the overall complexity of the program, which determines how easy or difficult it is for elderly people to use the Medicare program. Improvements can and should be made in all these areas.

Decreased copayments and increased premiums

Present cost-sharing arrangements for Medicare patients are unfair and poorly conceived. During the past 20 years, the proportion of Medicare costs paid through copayments has increased, whereas that paid through premiums (which are required only for Part B) has fallen. Monthly premiums have increased from $3 to about $15, but copayments and overall program costs have grown more than 10-fold. Copayments disproportionately burden the poor and the sick, they have become excessive overall, and their unpredictability undermines the principles of insurance that Medicare was designed to promote.

Because there are no limits on accumulating copayment liability, the sickest elderly persons—those who use many services—face the steepest Medicare copayments. We have estimated that each year more than 2.5 million enrollees pay more than $1,000 in copayments alone.[3] Since copayments are unrelated to income, they add to the disproportionate burden of the cost of health care on the poor. Currently, poor and near-poor elderly persons pay 25 percent of their income annually for health care. For those with incomes that are three times that of the poverty level or more, the figure is 2.5 percent.[4]

Because copayment requirements are linked to the use of services, they are inherently unpredictable, and their unexpectedness is a major handicap for retirees with fixed incomes. As a result of the rapid inflation of health care prices, many forms of copayment—which are set as a fraction of medical charges—have also become excessive. During the past decade, the total amount that Medicare beneficiaries paid in copayments has risen 50 percent faster than their income.[5,6] Between 1985 and 1986, the hospital deductible alone increased by 23 percent. As a result, policies intended to encourage elderly patients to be prudent purchasers of care have become an important deterrent to needed treatment, particularly for those with the lowest incomes.

To lessen or eliminate these drawbacks, we propose reducing or eliminating several of Medicare's deductible and coinsurance provisions and increasing beneficiary premiums to make up the lost revenues. We believe that the aggregate contribution of the beneficiaries should be maintained at the current level of 25 percent of program costs. We find premiums inherently preferable to coinsurance and deductibles for three reasons: they are predictable, they do not penalize the sick, and they can be related to income.

Specifically, we recommend that Medicare's hospital deductible, which is currently equivalent to the cost of a day in the hospital ($492), be cut in half; that the physician deductible (now $75) be eliminated; that the requirement that patients pay 25 percent of the cost of each hospital day after 60 days of hospitalization be eliminated; and that the physician coinsurance requirements be reduced from 20 to 10 percent. An additional annual premium payment of $150 to $200 for each beneficiary would offset any revenues that were lost because of these changes, as well as the costs of any additional health care.

The two forms of copayments that we would eliminate do little to control the use of health care services; they only add to the amounts paid by elderly users of those services. Copayments for long hospital stays are no longer sensible now that Medicare's new prospective payment system creates incentives for early discharge. Physician deductibles do not curtail the use of physician services by beneficiaries (about 50 percent of Medicare recipients) whose chronic illnesses require that they see physicians frequently. These patients know that they will always spend far more than the deductible each year.

Even with the reduced provisions for coinsurance and deductibles, copayments will accumulate into large bills for very sick and chronically ill elderly patients who use expensive services extensively.[7] This problem can be eliminated at a relatively small cost to the program (approximately $500 million) by limiting each beneficiary's total annual liability for copayments to $1,000.

Premiums adjusted according to ability to pay

Increases in the premiums paid by Medicare beneficiaries will disproportionately affect elderly persons with low incomes. To ease their burden, we propose, first, that uniform national standards be established for Medicaid's payment of Medicare premiums. Currently, because of varying state standards, only 25 percent of poor and near-poor elderly persons are covered by Medicaid, and states can refuse to purchase Medicare coverage (under Part B), even for those who are eligible to receive Medicaid. States should be required to purchase Medicare coverage for all older persons whose incomes are at or below 125 percent of the federal poverty level.

Second, to adjust premium contributions to the incomes of elderly people who are not poor, we recommend eliminating the extra personal exemption ($1,040) for all taxpayers who are 65 or over and assessing them a surtax that is equal to 5 percent of their taxes. The additional revenues raised in this way would be earmarked for the Medicare program. Because only slightly more than 40 percent of elderly persons pay any income taxes, most of the added funds would be collected from those most able to pay. Among those affected, elderly persons with higher incomes would pay more than those with lower incomes. These reforms would generate about $8 billion annually.

The Medicare premiums should be reduced by a comparable amount.

Expanded coverage of long-term care and chronic illnesses

Even through about 25 percent of the health care costs of elderly persons are for long-term care, Medicare now pays only a small part of the cost of nursinghome care and virtually none of the outpatient care of chronically ill elderly persons that is provided by nonphysicians. For those who are eligible, Medicaid pays some of these costs, but its coverage is incomplete and varies greatly from state to state. In many states, elderly people must impoverish themselves and their households before they become eligible for the Medicaid program.

Our society cannot in good conscience continue to deal with chronic illness in this manner. It robs the elderly of their dignity and of any real hope of economic and emotional security. Although we recognize that private insurers have begun to experiment with plans that cover some of the costs of nursing-home care, there are three major reasons why those insurers fail to offer reasonably priced insurance for long-term care.

First, few people are willing to purchase coverage until they reach an age at which their chances of needing nursing-home care are quite high. For most persons of that age, private insurance for nursing-home care is too expensive; in fact, the premiums for those older than 70 can approach $1,500 a year.[8] Second, because private companies fear that covered patients will overuse insured services, many of them will not offer coverage for a full range of noninstitutional care, or they will price such coverage beyond the reach of all but a few wealthy persons. Third, the marketing of insurance on an individual basis, which is necessary for most retirees, tends to make the policies even more costly.

In many ways, the problem of long-term care that now faces elderly persons closely resembles the problem they had with physician and hospital services that led to the enactment of Medicare—the costs are high, the needs are pressing, and the response of private insurers is insufficient.

To address the issue of long-term care, we propose two major reforms in the Medicare program. First, Medicare should cover the cost of extended nursing-home care (in addition to the limited, rehabilitative stays for which it currently pays), which constitutes the single largest out-of-pocket expense for health care of elderly persons today. This coverage should be mandatory, and it should ultimately be financed in the same way as the rest of the Medicare program—i.e., through a combination of Social Security taxes levied on the working population, premiums paid by elderly persons, and general revenues.

Our proposal that Medicare cover nursing-home care in this fashion raises a number of legitimate concerns. First, much of the cost of a nursing home represents living expenses (room and board), and many consider payment of such expenses by Medicare to be inappropriate. We propose that Medicare beneficiaries in nursing homes cover such nonmedical costs by making "residential copayments" that are equal to 80 percent of their Social Security benefits.

Another concern is that covered nursing-home services will be used inappropriately and excessively. The proposed residential copayment will partly discourage overuse, but we also suggest that Medicare beneficiaries be required to pay a deductible for extended nursing-home care (beyond that currently covered by Medicare in full) that is equal to the cost of one month of care. Furthermore, we suggest that the Medicare program designate geriatric assessment teams of physicians, social workers, and nurses in each community to act as nursing-home "gatekeepers." All admissions to nursing homes will require advance approval from those teams.

Our second major proposal is that Medicare provide more generous coverage of long-term care in out-patient settings, especially of home health care and mental health services. Currently, partly because of limitations on Medicare coverage, mentally ill older persons are half as likely to be treated as their younger counterparts.[9] Outpatient coverage would reduce the incentive to institutionalize patients with chronic illnesses, either in hospitals or nursing homes, in cases in which less expensive outpatient care would suffice. Currently, for example, 10 to 30 percent of the elderly persons in nursing homes are there because they could not find adequate outpatient services.[10] To prevent the excessive use of these long-term care benefits, the community-based "gatekeepers" should also determine eligibility for those services.

Despite financial and administrative safeguards, an increase in coverage for long-term care and chronic illnesses would be expensive. Additional expenditures could reach nearly $15 billion a year (1985 dollars) within 10 years of implementation (Table 1). We think that these costs are justified, but to accommodate concerns about the federal deficit, we suggest that the new benefits begin in 1990, after current efforts to reduce the deficit have had time to take effect.

Improved primary care

Good primary care involves timely diagnosis and treatment. Eliminating the deductible on physician service, as suggested earlier, will remove an important barrier to such care. We also propose that Medicare cover the entire cost of an annual physical examination (no copayment by the patient). This visit should be limited to a set of specified, preventive screening tests, such as cervical Papanicolaou smears, blood-pressure checks, cholesterol determinations, rectal examinations, and stool assessments for occult blood. For persons who are unable to visit a physician's office, Medicare should pay a home health agency to conduct similar examinations.

Administrative simplification

Many of the proposals discussed above would, if enacted, help to simplify the Medicare program for its beneficiaries. Their responsibilities for copayments would become simpler and easier to understand. The arbitrary coverage distinctions between acute and chronic care and between physical and mental illness would be eliminated.

To simplify the program further, we propose that Medicare's Parts A and B (which cover hospital and nonhospital services, respectively) should be combined into a single, unified program that would allow Medicare to offer older persons a uniform structure of benefits and cost-sharing requirements. The existence of separate programs is the product of accident and inertia, not of planning. When Medicare was enacted, legislators simply assumed that the program would be modeled on existing private health insurance plans, which typically offered separate policies for hospital and physician coverage.

REFORMS IN PAYMENT OF PHYSICIANS

Current methods for paying physicians under Medicare have a number of drawbacks that contribute to escalating costs and the unfair treatment of both beneficiaries and physicians.

From the beginning, Medicare has reimbursed physicians according to the "customary, prevailing, and reasonable" (CPR) method.[16] For several reasons, this system has contributed to escalating costs. First, since it pays physicians on a fee-for-service basis, it creates a built-in incentive for physicians to provide more services. Since payment is based partly on what physicians customarily charge, the method has perpetuated the relatively high fee scales of specialists and surgeons, thus encouraging such physicians to provide more high-technology services.

The Medicare payment system is also unfair to patients in that it allows physicians to accept or reject "assignment" (that is, to decide whether to accept the fee set by Medicare as full compensation) on a case-by-case basis. Physicians who refuse assignment must bill the patient directly to get paid, but they may then charge more than the fee set by Medicare. In 1983, 10 percent of the out-of-pocket expenses for physicians' services of Medicare beneficiaries were payments for unassigned charges. Such expenditures add to the confusion of elderly patients, they impair access to care, and they vary arbitrarily according to the physician and the region.

The current system for paying physicians also tends to treat certain groups of physicians unfairly. Even when specialists and surgeons provide services that are similar to those given by primary care practitioners, they receive more compensation. In 1982, for example, specialists were paid 20 to 53 percent more for a brief office visit than were primary care physicians. Another example of unfair treatment is that physicians in urban areas are generally paid considerably more than physicians in rural areas.

To ameliorate these problems of cost and fairness, we recommend that Medicare pursue four major avenues of reform. First, the program should continue to encourage enrollment in prepaid health care organizations (see below). However, we recommend caution in implementing systems that reimburse individual physicians for ambulatory services alone on a prepaid basis under "managed care" arrangements. Without the financial resources and management expertise that are available to large organizations, individual physicians might not be effective in containing costs while preserving the quality of care.

[3] For the 1990 projections, we assumed that nursing-home use would be limited by the available supply of beds. The supply is assumed to increase by 1995 in response to the following changes in use: 20 percent of those who would otherwise be in nursing homes remain in the community because of enhanced home care, all elderly persons who require personal care (e.g., feeding and dressing) and who are unmarried or living alone are in nursing homes, and half the elderly persons with impaired mobility who are living alone are in nursing homes.

As long as enrollment in prepaid health care organizations remains voluntary for Medicare beneficiaries, many—perhaps most—will continue to be cared for by physicians on a fee-for-service basis. Therefore, a way must be found to improve on the CPR method of determining fee-for-service payments. Thus, as a second major reform, we recommend that Medicare pay physicians according to a relative-value scale that is adjusted by a dollar-value multiplier.[17] A properly designed relative-value scale could help to control costs by making physician payments "fiscally neutral." It would reduce fees for certain services that are now expensive and overvalued under the CPR system (such as certain specialty service). Such a system would also eliminate unjustifiable differences in fees charged to beneficiaries and in those paid to physicians in different geographic regions.

Since any fee-for-service system encourages physicians to deliver more services, the implementation of a relative-value scale would not guarantee overall cost savings in the Medicare program. Thus, to ensure that such savings occur, we recommend, as part of a third major reform, that the federal government establish an annual target budget for total expenditures for physicians' services under Medicare. If payments exceeded that target in any year, the federal government could reduce the dollar-value multipliers for the following year by an amount that would be sufficient to recover the excess.

As a fourth major change in physician reimbursement, we recommend that Medicare require physicians to accept assignment—that is, accept Medicare's fee as payment in full (less any coinsurance and deductibles)—for all beneficiaries. Neither patients nor physicians should be eligible to receive Medicare payments for services rendered by physicians who refuse assignment. Failing to adopt "mandatory assignment" would undermine the effectiveness of a fee schedule based on relative values, since physicians who were dissatisfied with the fees paid by Medicare could charge patients whatever the Medicare feee schedule denied them. Unfortunately, immediate introduction of mandatory assignment could adversely affect access to care under Medicare, since physicians in certain areas might simply refuse to treat Medicare beneficiaries. Thus, this change in payment policy should be implemented gradually over 5 to 10 years, and it should start with mandatory assignment for all physicians' services to hospitalized patients.

REFORMS IN PAYMENT OF HOSPITALS

Medicare's current prospective payment system, a system of regulated prices that is based on diagnosis-related groups, is almost certainly an improvement over the cost-based approach to reimbursement that preceded it. Although the implementation of the prospective payment system does not deserve all the credit for recent declines in the rate of increase in hospital costs, it has contributed to growing cost consciousness among the nation's hospitals.

Nevertheless, the current prospective payment system has a number of flaws. First, it controls the amount paid for a hospital admission, but not the number of patients a hospital can admit. Since hospitals can thus boost revenues by increasing admissions of Medicare beneficiaries, the prospective payment system may not be effective in controlling costs in the long run.[18]

Second, Medicare's current prospective payment system may promote discrimination against certain groups of patients. Because that system controls only Medicare prices, it may make the elderly less desirable patients than privately insured persons, thus leading to a tendency to discharge older persons "sicker and quicker."[19] The prospective payment system also encourages hospitals to favor admission of Medicare patients who are in certain diagnostic groups and who are less severely ill. Uninsured patients also suffer under this system, since it is increasingly difficult to cross-subsidize their care from hidden surpluses that are built into Medicare charges and other fees.

We think that better prospective payment systems can be designed. We propose one here that should be considered if the flaws in the current prospective payment system create pressure for major reform. We recommend a system of prospectively set target budgets for hospitals that includes safeguards against discrimination against Medicare beneficiaries and uninsured patients. The fundamentals of this approach are as follows.

Each year, the federal government should set a target budget for hospital payments for each state. The states should then be empowered to devise ways to keep Medicare hospital costs within that target, or they should be required to make up the difference from their own resources. To achieve this goal, the states should have wide discretion in determining how hospitals within their boundaries will be paid for providing services to Medicare beneficiaries.

In designing payment systems, however, the states should meet certain federal requirements. All payers within their jurisdiction should use the same method for paying for hospital care, and the rates for different payers should reflect the costs of treating such patients—not the market power or the negotiating skill of the payers. The states and each hospital should negotiate a limit on the hospital's total revenues from all sources for the next year. If those target budgets are exceeded, the hospitals involved should be paid at a reduced rate for the rest of the year. The states should also be required to establish systems to cover the costs of caring for uninsured patients. Medicare should contribute to such uncompensated care schemes.

Experience in this country and abroad (Massachusetts and Canada, for example) has demonstrated that such a system is workable and that it can constrain the rise in hospital costs. Because this system limits hospital budgets instead of Medicare prices, it promises to be a better method than the prospective payment system for reducing the rate of growth in hospital costs over the long term. By limiting increases in hospital expenditures for both private and public patients, the system would use Medicare's leverage in the health care system to limit the growth in all health care costs, not just Medicare expenditures. In addition, because it would create an all-payers system, the plan would ensure that Medicare patients were treated as fairly as other consumers of hospital expenditures. Finally, the proposed plan would provide federal leadership in designing solutions to the growing problem of providing uninsured patients with access to hospital care.

REFORMS RELATED TO PREPAID HEALTH CARE

The virtues of prepaying for health care, especially in HMOs, have been widely discussed.[20,21] Sixty years of experience and research have documented the ability of HMOs to deliver high-quality care at costs that are lower than those in the free-for-service system. These organizations also expand the options available to consumers of health care, thereby creating pressures for innovation and enabling patients to find plans that cover services that best meet their needs.

Nevertheless, since most of our experience with HMOs involves working populations rather than retirees, some caution is indicated in applying that experience to Medicare beneficiaries. The very high costs of caring for some elderly patients may encourage prepaid health care organizations to enroll healthy Medicare beneficiaries selectively, thereby channeling costly patients back into the free-for-service system. If HMOs are paid the average cost of treating a Medicare beneficiary in the traditional system but they enroll only beneficiaries who are healthier than average, overall Medicare expenses may increase. Also, HMOs have not yet had to provide as much in the way of long-term care as Medicare patients need. The ability and willingness of prepaid health care organizations to provide such care remains to be tested.

Nevertheless, the track record of HMOs is long and strong enough to justify encouraging increased enrollment of Medicare beneficiaries in them. The Medicare amendments of 1983 went a long way in this direction by reimbursing HMOs at 95 percent of the age- and sex-adjusted average rate of Medicare spending in the communities where they are located. To encourage additional enrollment, Medicare should allow HMOs to recruit up to 75 percent of their members from the Medicare population. (The limit is now 50 percent.) This would permit specialization in the health needs of the elderly, without taking that group of patients completely out of the mainstream of care.

If the Medicare program and its beneficiaries are to benefit fully from the option to choose among HMOs, it is essential to promote informed decisions and to discourage selective enrollment of healthy older persons. Medicare should provide its beneficiaries with easily understandable information about the benefit packages and costs of all participating HMOs. To counteract incentives to stint on costlier services, such as those involved in the treatment of chronic illnesses, Medicare should monitor the performance of the HMOs. Currently, professional review organizations oversee the quality of hospital care to counteract similar incentives under the prospective payment system. They should do the same for HMOs.

CONCLUSION

Predicting the costs of all these suggested reforms in the Medicare program—some of which would not be implemented for 5 to 10 years—is difficult and hazardous. If we exclude additional long-term care benefits, we estimate that the financial impact of our proposals on Medicare expenditures in the year 2000 could range from a net saving to a net cost of approximately $3 billion (1985 dollars), depending on the assumptions used.[1] Coverage for long-term and nursing-home care would increase Medicare's spending by about $50 billion annually, although $35 billion of that amount would substitute for costs that would have been paid by Medicaid or by elderly persons and their families.

It is imperative to consider these costs in assessing the merits of our package of proposals. Yet, it is just as essential to consider other factors that have received less attention in the current fiscal and political climate. For example, given the current drift of Medicare policy, what kind of protection against the financial costs of illness will elderly persons have in the year 2000? What kind of access will they have to services? How will we care for the growing numbers of elderly persons who can no longer live alone?

These questions deserve study now, if only because current changes in policy should be informed by long-range considerations. In 1965, the political process produced a Medicare program that, for all its current failings, represented a triumph of humane public policy. It is now time to correct those failings so that the program can meet the challenges of the next 20 years.

INNA AND NAUM MEIMAN

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, Naum and Inna Meiman are Soviet Jews whose only desire is to emigrate to Israel. Inna is in her fifties and has cancer. Naum is in his seventies. What harm could it do to let the Meimans emigrate?

This Saturday, I will have the unique opportunity to visit with Naum's daughter, Olga Plam, who lives in Colorado. Olga is deeply concerned that she may never see her father again. Naum proudly displays pictures of Olga's family, as any father would do. Unfortunately, Naum has not had the same opportunity to see his daughter whenever he wishes.

Inna is critically ill. She and Naum desperately want the opportunity to live the rest of their lives in Israel. Still, the Soviet Government continues to deny the Meimans the rights to which they are entitled as human beings.

I strongly urge the Soviet Government to allow the Meimans to emigrate to Israel.●

INTERIM FUNDING FOR SUPERFUND

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of legislation to provide short-term, interim funding for the Superfund Program. I commend my colleagues, Senator LAUTENBERG and Senator STAFFORD, for their leadership on this issue. I understand that several other Members of the Senate also have been in contact with Majority Leader Dole to urge that this proposal be considered on the next possible vehicle.

Although I know that the overwhelming majority of my colleagues would prefer to see final passage of a 5-year Superfund reauthorization, and I share this preference, it is clear that immediate action is necessary to avoid an unacceptable disruption of the program.

By April 1, EPA expects to have delayed starting nearly 200 Superfund-financed projects, including planning studies, cleanup construction designs, and actual cleanup starts. Although some planning studies, designs, and cleanups are currently being continued, many of these also will be delayed without interim funding.

A disruption in the Superfund Program will be devastating for New York, which has the fourth highest number of Superfund sites in the Nation. In addition, the contractors and laboratories which have worked with EPA under this program are facing tremendous uncertainty, and in some cases may be forced to close permanently, causing severe long-term disruptions, even after funding is restored.

Today I am cosponsoring two proposals to provide interim funding for Superfund. Each would provide $150 million for 60 days, a level consistent with the annual rate provided in the fiscal year 1986 HUD-Independent Agencies appropriations bill.

The first proposal would raise $150 million by extending the existing Superfund tax, making funds available from April 1 to May 31 as a repayable advance. The second would make a direct appropriation of $150 million available as a repayable advance, without extending the taxing authority.

Mr. President, I cannot overemphasize the urgency of this situation. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting swift passage of interim fundings.●

ACID RAIN

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, the subject of acid deposition, sometimes mistakenly hyped as acid rain, is again in the news. President Reagan has met with Canadian Prime Minister Mulroney, and the subject of transboundary pollution was high on the agenda. My colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, has just introduced a stringent new bill on the subject.

Several scientific and background studies have recently emerged, but from the point of view of the West, the most significant study is Acid Deposition and the West—A Scientific Assessment by Dr. George M. Hidy, president of the Desert Research Institute at the University of Nevada in Reno, and five other distinguished scientists. This study was commissioned by Western Energy Supply and Transmission [WEST] Associates, a research and planning organization of 20 electric utilities—publicly owned, investor owned, and rural electric cooperatives—serving nearly 19 million consumers in 11 States in the West and Southwest.

First, I would like to emphasize the excellent scientific credentials of the six authors of this report:

CREDENTIALS OF THE SCIENTIFIC PANEL

George M. Hidy, D. Eng., served as director of the advisory panel, interpreted the data collected and analyzed atmospheric processes. He is President of the Desert Research Institute at the University of Nevada in Reno. Having specialized in atmospheric sciences for 28 years, Dr. Hidy has been involved in major experiments and issues relating to acid deposition since 1975. His involvement in acid deposition problems is an outgrowth of his long-term interest in atmospheric chemistry and atmospheric aerosols. He has written an authoritative textbook on state-of-the-art aerosol science entitled "Aerosols—An Industrial and Environmental Science."

Dr. Hidy is a member of the Science Advisory Board of the Environmental Protection Agency and a past member of the Environmental Studies Board of the National Academy of Sciences. He has served as reviewer of the U.S. National Acid Precipitation Assessment Program and of its Canadian counterpart. His doctorate in chemical engineering is from Johns Hopkins University with an M.S. in engineering from Princeton University, a B.S. in chemical engineering from Columbia University and an A.B. from Columbia College.

James R. Young, Ph.D., collected and analyzed the deposition information for this study and served as publications manager for the Technical Report. Dr. Young is a Senior Scientist for ERT, Inc., in Newbury Park, California. ERT is an environmental consulting firm which specializes in air quality issues including acid deposition. He has been involved in review and analysis of precipitation chemistry data and in long-range transport and acid deposition model development at ERT since 1981, and before that in environmental research at the California Institute of Technology. His interest in acid deposition stems from his involvement in the aquaeous-phase chemistry of natural systems.

Dr. Young is a member of the American Chemical Society and of Sigma Xi, the scientific research society. His doctorate and M.S. are in environmental engineering science from California Institute of Technology with a B.A. in chemistry from St. Mary's College in Winona, Minnesota.

Dale W. Cole, Ph.D., served as the panel's expert on forests and forest soils. Dr. Cole is Associate Dean and Professor of Forest Soils at the College of Forest Resources at the University of Washington in Seattle, where he has been since 1963. With over 25 years experience in areas relating to the mineral cycling of forests, he has published numerous articles and papers. Ten years ago he began studying soil acidification and became concerned that acid deposition might influence natural processes of mineral cycling. He then began a program to monitor the rate of acid deposition and to investigate its effects on soil.

Dr. Cole is a research group leader of the International Union of Forest Research Organizations and a member of the American Geophysical Union, Ecological Society of America and other organizations. He serves on the Forest Effects Review Panel for the Science Advisory Board of the Environmental Protection Agency. He holds a doctorate in forest soils from the University of Washington, an M.S. in soils from the University of Wisconsin and a B.S. in forestry from the University of Washington.

Robert W. Brocksen, Ph.D., provided expertise on aquatic ecosystems for the study. He was Director of the Wyoming Water Center and Professor of Zoology at the University of Wyoming at Laramie. In this position, he initiated research to determine if acid deposition exists at high elevation lakes and streams. His research focuses on the release of acidity in water as snow melts in the spring and its impact, if any, upon fisheries. In 1986, Dr. Brocksen took a leave of absence from the University of Wyoming to direct the Living Lakes Project, an eastern U.S. lake limning program.

When acid deposition was emerging as an issue in 1978, Dr. Brocksen was Senior Program Manager for Ecological Studies at the Electric Power Research Institute in Palo Alto, California. In that position, he was responsible for developing research programs relating to the problem of acid deposition in various parts of the U.S.

Dr. Brocksen's authoritative research on the effects of water quality on fish and other organisms dates from his post as Assistant Professor at the University of California at Davis in 1968. Later, he served as Adjunct Associate Professor at the University of Tennessee and was also Aquatic Ecology Section Head of the Environmental Sciences Division at Oak Ridge National Laboratory in Tennessee.

His doctorate in fisheries physiology and limnology, an M.S. in fisheries toxicology and B.S. in fisheries are from Oregon State University.

Albert L. Page, Ph.D., served as the panel's expert on soils and crops. At the University of California in Riverside for 25 years, he holds three titles in the Department of Soils and Environmental Sciences: Director of the Program of Excellence in Energy Research, Professor of Soil Science and Chemist. For the past five years, he has been Director of the Program of Excellence in Energy Research—involving studies on acid deposition, soil physics, soil chemistry and soil microbiology.

Having worked on a number of projects for the Environmental Protection Agency, Dr. Page became familiar with acid rain in the northeastern U.S. early in his career. In 1965, he was involved in a one-year study of 170 lakes in the Sierra Nevada region of the West. Since 1980, he has been responsible for a follow-up study of these same lakes.

Dr. Page holds a doctorate in soil science from the University of California at Davis and a B.A. in chemistry from the University of California at Riverside.

Mohammed M. El-Amamy, Ph.D., was the panel's advisors on soils and vegetation. He is a Postdoctoral Soil Scientist at the University of California at Riverside in the Department of Soils and Environmental Sciences.

Since 1980, he has been investigating the effects of acid deposition on surface and ground water. This research began at the Stanford Research Institute in Menlo Park, California, where he studied the degradation effect of pesticides and their interaction with soils and ground water.

Dr. El-Amamy's doctorate in soil chemistry and M.A. in soil survey and classification are from the University of California at Riverside. His B.A. in soil and water sciences is from Alfatah University in Libya.

As you can see these six Ph.D.'s are all from the West and collectively possess a broad range of expertise: Dr. George Hidy has specialized in atmospheric sciences for 28 years; Dr. James Young has been involved in review and analysis of precipitation chemistry data and in long-range transport and acid deposition model development since 1981. Dr. David Cole, who is associate dean and professor of forest soils at the College of Forest Resources at the University of Washington in Seattle, served as the panel's expert on forest and forest soils. Dr. Robert Brocksen, the director of the Wyoming Water Center and professor of zoology at the University of Wyoming at Laramie, provided expertise on aquatic ecosystems for the study. Dr. Albert Page, professor of soil scientist and chemist at the University of California in Riverside, served as the panel's expert on soils and crops. Dr. Mohammed M. El-Amamy, a postdoctoral soil scientist at the University of California at Riverside, was the panel's advisor on soils and vegetation.

Thus the panel contains the expertise to analyze both atmospheric processes and long-range transport questions as well as the effects of any deposition on forests, forest soils, aquatic ecosystems, soils, and crops. Each of the panel members possesses impeccable qualifications in his field of expertise.

Next, let me turn to the panel's conclusions summarized in a layman's version of the study:

CONCLUSIONS

This study considers the scientific knowledge about acid deposition in the West and its environmental consequences. Based on available information, there is no credible scientific evidence of adverse regional-scale ecosystem effects associated with acid deposition in the West. Without such evidence, incremental increases in emission controls are not scientifically supported.

This study uses specific terminology for the processes and effects of acid deposition, rather than the general term acid rain. When used precisely, acid rain refers to the removal of acidic chemicals, such as oxides of sulfur and nitrogen, from the atmosphere only by precipitation. Acid deposition, on the other hand, refers to the removal of chemicals from the atmosphere by all possible processes. Acid deposition includes both wet and dry deposition. Wet deposition results from precipitation, such as rain, snow and hail. Dry deposition results from the absorption of acidic gases and the collection of acidic particles on surfaces. Deposition also may result from moisture collection on surfaces in the form of dew, fog and clouds. Acidity is a general term that refers to hydrogen ion concentration in any system and is expressed as pH.

This scientific inquiry focuses on the West's pristine mountain regions because of their valuable recreational, lumber and fishery resources, but does not ignore the deserts. To address public concern about widespread geographical effects of acid deposition, and regional scale was chosen for this study. Regional refers to those effects and processes of acid deposition covering distances greater than 60 miles from sources of emissions or larger than 400 square miles in potentially affected area.

Conclusions of the study are divided into four groups: major findings plus supporting conclusions related to atmospheric deposition, terrestrial ecosystems and aquatic ecosystems.

A. MAJOR CONCLUSIONS

1. Evidence indicates that region-wide effects of acid deposition do not exist in the West, and none are expected at current levels of exposure.

2. There are no comparative studies to indicate that western ecosystems are more susceptible to damage from acid deposition than those elsewhere. In western ecosystems, natural ecological processes are the prime cause of acidity and acid neutralizing capacity.

3. Sulfur is an inadequate tracer for indicating acidity in the West. Other manmade and natural chemicals, particularly nitrate, calcium and ammonia, must also be considered.

4. Dry deposition, often mentioned as uniquely large when compared to wet deposition in the West, is not necessarily large in susceptible high elevation alpine areas.

5. Acidity is commonly identified with sulfur dioxide gas (SO_2) and oxides of nitrogen gases (NO_x). Man-made emissions of SO_2 in the West have decreased sharply for the last 15 years and no significant increases are expected in the future. NO_x emissions are expected to increase only 20 percent through the year 2000.

ATMOSPHERIC DEPOSITION

1. The western bioclimate is more diverse and can be extremely variable over relatively short distances. Unlike the East, the West has strong precipitation gradients; widespread wet and arid regions; variable annual precipitation; dominant winter-spring snow in alpine areas; cloud-fog exposure in the coastal mountains; extremes in temperature and humidity gradients and sunlight; as well as diverse terrestrial vegetation within subregions. Current analyses treat the west uniformly, but the West's non-uniformity may be important in clarifying potential acid deposition effects.

2. Precipitation acidity in the West is generally within the range of natural variability. Acidity in precipitation, on the average, is 10 percent to 20 percent of that in the East.

3. Concentrations of sulfate and nitrate in western precipitation are only 20 percent to 50 percent of those measured in the northeastern U.S.

In the West, sulfate concentrations in precipitation more closely correlate with the presence of calcium—rather than hydrogen ions (acidity).

Calcium containing minerals, such as calcium sulfate (gypsum), in wind-blown soil dust often contribute to sulfate concentrations in precipitation. Calcium carbonate (limestone) dust often reduces acidity by neutralization.

Acidity and concentrations of sulfate, nitrate and ammonium ions are variable throughout the entire West. Concentrations of hydrogen ions (acidity) are 50 percent higher during spring and summer and approximately 10 percent lower than average values during the fall and winter. These factors must be considered in assessing atmospheric deposition data.

Regional wet and dry deposition of sulfur in the West is below levels expected to cause adverse ecological effects. Even with 50 to 100 percent higher man-made sulfur dioxide emissions 15 to 30 years ago, there have been no observed acid deposition effects.

Wet sulfate and nitrate deposition is generally 10% to 20% of that in regions of the eastern United States. Hydrogen ion deposition in the West is 3 to 20 percent of that measured in the East.

6. Region wide emission of SO_2 NO_x and hydrocarbons are substantially lower in the West than the East-except in cities. Western SO_2 emissions have decreased by a factor of two since 1970. During the same period, NOX emissions have increased by 50 percent primarily as a result of increased transportation and urban activities. By the year 2000, SO_2 emissions will increase only slightly, and NO_x is projected to increase by only 20 percent.

7. Source-receptor relationships are not well-defined in the West, largely resulting from poor characterization of transport winds in mountainous terrain and the lack of geographically representative data. For example, evidence of a hypothesized relationship between southwestern smelter SO_2 emissions and wet sulfate deposition over the intermountain region is circumstantial and not verified. There is no accepted link between long-range transport of emission and wet sulfate deposition in the West.

8. Sulfur-to-nitrogen (S/N) emission ratios are less than deposition ratios. Three possibilities may explain the mechanism that increases sulfur or decreases nitrogen in precipitation compared to man-made emissions: Sulfur in soil dust may be an unaccounted for national source of sulfate in precipitation; nitrogen loss by dry deposition may be more rapid than sulfur loss; sulfur may be more effectively scavenged in clouds and precipitation than nitrogen. In addition, S/N emission ratios are more variable than precipitation ratios. These observations imply that there is no direct relationship between man-made emissions and deposition rates which is consistent throughout the western region.

9. Dry deposition is not necessarily more predominant than wet deposition in susceptible western areas. It is highly variable with the heaviest influence near emission sources or in arid areas.

10. Nitrate is not generally found in greater proportion to sulfate in the West as has been previously believed.

C. TERRESTRIAL ECOSYSTEMS

1. In the West, approximately 88 percent of surveyed soils are well buffered and, therefore, not susceptible to changes due to current or projected levels of acid deposition. There is no evidence that surveyed soils, forests or crops in the West have been affected by acid deposition. The potential for adverse effects on western soils is small due to low levels of acid deposition and the natural chemical processes in soils.

2. Acid production from natural processes in western soils are generally more important and significantly greater than acidity from atmospheric sources.

3. Western forest soils are relatively insensitive to acid deposition. Although extensive acidification occurs naturally in western forest soils, most of the acidity from all sources is neutralized by natural buffering mechanisms.

4. Nitrogen and sulfur deposited in precipitation may help to fertilize native vegetation and, to a lesser extent, commercial crops.

5. From the 1950's to the present, there is no evidence that acid pecipitation has damaged crops or reduced their yields. In fact, crop yields have increased every decade from the 1950's to the present.

6. The amount of acidity deposited onto cropland from precipitation is small compared to amounts of acidity generated by ammonia fertilizers and natural processes in soil. This acidification of cropland resulting from natural processes is routinely and easily neutralized by liming.

7. Atmospheric gases and particles can influence vegetation by direct exposure, but only at ambient air concentrations much higher than those found regionally in remote western areas.

8. There is no evidence of any regional forest damage due to acid deposition in the West. Some forest vegetation, especially ponderosa pine in southern California, shows injury from prevailing atmospheric ozone levels.

D. AQUATIC ECOSYSTEMS

1. No credible scientific information—either regionally or from specific sites—suggests that present levels of deposition are acidifying any sensitive high elevation water bodies in the West.

2. The level of acidity and chemical composition of western surface waters depends largely on interacting man-made as well as natural factors, such as bedrock geology, soil characteristics, lake sediment interactions, precipitation, deposition and land use.

As indicated from the above excerpt, the panel concludes that "there is no credible scientific evidence of adverse regional-scale ecosystem effects associated with acid deposition in the West." Furthermore, "made-made emissions of SO_2 in the West have decreased sharply for the last 15 years and no significant increases are expected in the future. NO_x emissions are expected to increase only 20 percent through the year 2000." The study then proceeds with more specific conclusions on atmospheric deposition, terrestrial ecosystems, and aquatic ecosystems.

Mr. President, this study should be of great value to the Congress and the administration when and if the acid deposition matter is reopened. These scientists have demonstrated that there are basic scientific differences between the East and the West. Regardless of what President Reagan and Prime Minister Mulroney may discuss concerning the Northeast boundary line, there is no problem in the West which requires Federal interference. The West burns coal with a lower SO_2 content; it has installed more scrubbers proportionately; and it has much cleaner air. I for one want to keep clean air in the West, but I am more convinced than ever by this study that any emission control program to retrofit existing stationary sources in the West would not be scientifically sound or economically justified.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I hope that both the EPA and the administration as well as the interested congressional committees will carefully analyze and absorb this new study of "Acid Deposition in the West—A Scientific Assessment."● member, the Chairman of the Committee or subcommittee shall call an executive session to discuss such investigative activity or the issuance of any subpoena in connection therewith.

(d) Any witness summoned to testify at a hearing, or any witness giving sworn testimony, may be accompanied by counsel of his own choosing who shall be permitted, while the witness is testifying, to advise him of his legal rights.

(3) No confidential testimony taken or confidential material presented in an executive hearing, or any report of the proceedings of such an executive hearing, shall be made public, either in whole or in part or by way of summary, unless authorized by a majority of the members of the Committee or subcommittee.

Rule 18.—Presidential nominees shall submit a statement of their background and financial interests, including the financial interests of their spouse and children living in their household, on a form approved by the Committee which shall be sworn to as to its completeness and accuracy. The Committee form shall be in two parts—

(I) information relating to employment, education and background of the nominee relating to the position to which the individual is nominated, and which is to be made public; and,

(II) information relating to financial and other background of the nominee, to be made public when the Committee determines that such information bears directly on the nominee's qualifications to hold the position to which the individual is nominated.

Information relating to background and financial interests (Part I and II) shall not be required of (a) candidates for appointment and promotion in the Public Health Service Corps; and (b) nominees for less than full-time appointments to councils, commissions or boards when the Committee determines that some or all of the information is not relevant to the nature of the position. Information relating to other background and financial interests (Part II) shall not be required of any nominee when the Committee determines that it is not relevant to the nature of the position.

Committee action on a nomination, including hearings or meetings to consider a motion to recommend confirmation, shall not be initiated until at least five days after the nominee submits the form required by this rule unless the Chairman, with the concurrence of the ranking minority member, waives this waiting period.

Rule 19.—Subject to statutory requirements imposed on the Committee with respect to procedure, the rules of the Committee may be changed, modified, amended or suspended at any time; provided, not less than a majority of the entire membership so determine at a regular meeting with due notice, or at a meeting specifically called for that purpose.

Rule 20.—In addition to the foregoing, the proceedings of the Committee shall be governed by the Standing Rules of the Senate and the provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

● Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, here we are on March 20, 1986—it is National Agriculture Day. Unfortunately, I find it difficult to commemorate or celebrate this day in light of the very serious problems in the farming community.

The huge surpluses of commodities that overhang agricultural markets have caused nearly all crop prices to drop during 1985. At the end of the 1985-86 marketing year, carryover stocks as a percent of current annual use are about 43 percent for corn and 80 percent for wheat.

Growing stockpiles combined with declining exports make prospects for the future less than bright. A recent issue of "Outlook for U.S. Agriculture Exports," published by USDA, estimates the value of U.S. agricultural exports at $28 billion, which is 10 percent below the 1985 value and $1 billion less than the December estimate. U.S. exports of all major grains are running 29 percent behind exports a year ago.

Because the dollar has declined by at least 30 percent from its high point in early 1985, it is difficult to blame the strong dollar for declining U.S. exports. We need to evaluate other factors that are contributing to the deterioration of the farm economy.

The 1985 farm bill is intended to make U.S. farmers competitive in the international marketplace. The farm bill lowers loan rates and provides export incentives. However, thus far we continue to see reductions in net farm income and increasing farm foreclosures.

Farmers, of course, are not the only ones that are suffering from a weak agricultural economy. In my home State of Nebraska, 15 banks have been closed in the last 15 months. Because land values are expected to decline further, these banks' security interest will continue to erode. Credit availability remains a problem—farmers are now having tremendous difficulties obtaining loans for spring planting.

I do not see anything that is going to turn things around unless the administration makes use of the mechanism contained in the farm bill in accordance with the intent of Congress. The Department of Agriculture can use the export bonus program to give away surplus stocks. USDA can also make use of surplus commodities for production of ethanol. There are many tools contained in the farm bill that USDA can use to benefit our farmers. The administration must wake up before it is too late. We no longer have a farm crisis that affects a few States in the Midwest. The problem goes to the very fabric of this country.

Mr. President, I encourage the administration to use all the tools at its disposal to give farmers a chance to survive these stressful times.●

REDUCING THE SOVIET MISSION TO THE UNITED NATIONS

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to note that by ordering a reduction in the size of the Soviet Mission to the United Nations, the administration has done something fully warranted and long overdue. But the administration could have been far more explicit in highlighting the need for this order.

Since the Rockefeller Commission report of 1975, it has been public knowledge that personnel at the Soviet Mission have invaded our telephone system. Together with the other espionage activities these personnel conduct on a massive scale, in direct violation of their obligations under the U.N. Charter, such violations make it both proper and essential to reduce the size of the Soviet Mission.

Soviet officials claim otherwise. On ABC News' "This Week With David Brinkley" of March 16, 1986, Ambassador Vassiliy Safronchuk—acting permanent representative of the Soviet Union to the United Nations—dismissed concerns over such espionage as "utter nonsense." He also argued that we have no right to order a reduction of the Soviet Mission under the terms of the Charter and the 1947 U.N. Headquarters Agreement.

The time has come to be explicit about why these Soviet claims are false. On the Brinkley telecast, where Senator COHEN and I also appeared, we noted that the evidence of electronic eavesdropping and other espionage activities by Soviet mission personnel is incontrovertible. We also pointed out that the United States is fully within its rights to order a reduction in such personnel. I noted that "the Headquarters Agreement specifically states that behavior outside of official duties is governed by American law, and tapping telephones is a violation of our law." Senator COHEN added the following:

There is a provision in Public Law 357 and Article VI which says that nothing contained in the agreement dealing with the United States serving as host nation shall in any way abridge the right of the United States to protect its own national security.

Yesterday the New York Times published letters written by Senator LEAHY, Senator COHEN, and me that further describe the improper activities of Soviet Mission personnel, and the legal justifications for the administration's order. Mr. President, I ask that these letters be entered into the RECORD.

The letters follow:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 19, 1986]

U.S. HAS THE RIGHT TO LIMIT SOVIET U.N. MISSION

To the Editor:

As the authors of a bill, S.1773, to limit the size of the Soviet Mission to the United Nations, we would like to comment on the March 11 news article "U.N. Experts Debate U.S. Order to Moscow." The article dealt with legal issues relating to the State Department announcement on March 7 that the Soviets would have to cut their U.N. Mission personnel from 275 down to 170.

The F.B.I. has stated publicly that the Soviets employ a large percentage of their Mission for espionage purposes. Actions by the Administration and Congress to limit the official representation in the U.S. from countries that engage in such hostile intelligence activities represent a determination to counter espionage operations run under diplomatic and other official cover.

We believe that limiting the size of the Soviet Mission to the United Nations is both consistent with international agreements and a valid exercise of our country's right to protect its national interests while playing host to the U.N. When we introduced S.1773 last Oct. 18, we submitted a detailed analysis of the legal issues. This included extensive citations from U.S. Government and U.N. sources on the application of the U.N. Headquarters Agreement of 1947.

Neither the Headquarters Agreement nor the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the U.N. (signed in 1946 but consented to by the Senate in 1970) refers specifically to the power of the host government to limit the size of national missions to the U.N.

The U.S. Government, however, expressed a reservation to the convention which made it clear that U.S. immigration laws take precedence over the convention in the case of any person "who abused his privileges of residence by activities outside his official capacity." The U.S. also stated with reference to the Headquarters Agreement that, "Nothing . . . shall be construed as in any way diminishing, abridging, or weakening the right of the United States to safeguard its own security" or to control the movement of foreign personnel outside the vicinity of U.N. Headquarters. The U.S. Government has consistently interpreted the clause concerning security as providing independent authority to limit the admission, and not merely restrict the movement, of the staff of national missions.

The claim has been advanced that the U.S. may act against the admission of particular persons but not with respect to the overall size of missions. In fact, as host country, the U.S. has the inherent power to regulate such missions when their size and the conduct of their personnel raise legitimate national security concerns.

As your editorial topic "U.N. Countdown" (March 12) indicates, the obvious touchstone here is reasonableness. We agree that the size of the Soviet Mission to the U.N. greatly exceeds what is reasonably required for its legitimate functions at the U.N., especially when viewed against the sizes of other national missions.—Senator PATRICK LEAHY, WILLIAM S. COHEN, Washington, March 12, 1986.

To the Editor:

The State Department could have made a much stronger case for reducing Soviet personnel at the United Nations. The department noted that such personnel "engage in activities unrelated to U.N. business, including espionage." But we should have been far more explicit: they invade our telephone system on a massive scale, violating both our laws and our rights.

This illegal activity has been public knowledge since the Rockefeller report of 1975. Arkady Shevchenko (former Under Secretary General of the U.N.) writes that by 1973, the Soviet Mission already "bristled with antennas for listening to American conversations," and that this technological espionage "mushroomed."

Questions are arising as to the appropriateness of the Administration's cutback order. They need not. The facts of the case would be clear, if only the Department of State would simply set them forth.—DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN, Senator from New York, Washington, March 11, 1986.●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that today is National Agriculture Day. Recently, we completed action on the technical corrections to the 1985 farm bill, and soon we will complete action on the CCC supplemental appropriation measure. I believe we are nearing agreement with the House over this matter, and I look forward to enabling our Nation's farmers to start planting their crops with the full knowledge of what Federal farm policy will be this year—and for the next several years.

It is fitting that we use today to elevate public awarness of the need to maintain a strong and prosperous agricultural industry, something we in Congress have been trying to accomplish. I believe we have. Last year, we passed the most expansive farm bill in this Nation's history. It is designed to provide the support and tools necessary to recapture those agricultural export markets which we have lost and to prevent the further erosion of our agricultural export trade.

Ours is the most productive and advanced agricultural industry in the world, and this is something of which we can be proud. It is important that we, as a nation, continue to work together to overcome the pitfalls that have beset our farm policies in the past. In recent years, we have made tremendous strides in this direction, but I believe that although we have worked hard these last few months to craft a practicable farm bill for 1986, we have much more ground to break.

In the years ahead we must work hard to restore the confidence of the American farmer in the Federal Government. I believe we can. I am happy to say that New York State producers have maintained impressive figures in several areas of farming. New York is ranked first in the Nation in the production of creamed cottage cheese and cabbage for kraut; second in the production of apples, corn for silage, fresh market sweet corn, Italian cheeses, low-fat cottage cheese, maple syrup, tart cherries, and many other products; third in the production of all cheeses, milk, cabbage for market; and fourth in pears, celery, onions, ice cream, and more.

The bounties from New York are to be shared. This fact has been made very clear here on Capitol Hill, when, for the last 4 years, I have sponsored the annual Farm Harvest Day. This event attracts greater participation each year from New York producers, as well as from my colleagues in the Senate, Congressmen, Capitol Hill staffers, and many others. Tables are lined up end on end, each filled with New York produce—from baskets of milk, cheese, apples, pork, to maple syrup, wine, ice cream, Long Island duckling, and countless other products which are donated by more than 100 New York producers. Everyone who attends, and there were in excess of 800 this year, returns home with as much food as they can physically carry.

Today is a day to be thankful for bountiful crops. It is an occasion to elevate public awareness of the importance of our agricultural industry, of the importance of the American farmer, and of the need to keep them and the industry strong, healthy, and prosperous.●

BENIAMIN AND TANIA BOGOLMOLNY: A CRITICAL REFUSENIK CASE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I have heard from a number of friends about a refusenik family in the Soviet Union, Beniamin and Tania Bogolmolny, whose situation is crucial. Cases of Soviet violations of human rights are always poignant, but cases in which a refusenik is critically ill are especially dire.

Beniamin Bogolmolny has the dubious distinction of being the world's "most patient refusenik" as he was called by the Guiness Book of World's Records. Beniamin first applied to emigrate with his parents in 1966. His parents and his sisters were allowed to emigrate to Israel in 1970 while Beniamin was in the army. He then applied on his own in 1972. Beniamin has waited for 20 years to emigrate to Israel.

In 1979, Beniamin married Tania. In December of 1985, Tania underwent a mastectomy operation for breast cancer. The most recent diagnosis revealed that the cancer had spread to Tania's lymph system. Tania's situation is worsening. Allowing Tania and Beniamin to join Beniamin's family in Israel is consistent with the Soviet policy of family reunification.

I strongly urge the Soviet authorities to grant permission to the Bogolmolny family in keeping with General Secretary Gorbachev's statement in which he declared that humanitarian cases will be resolved in the "spirit of cooperation."●

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF POINT PLEASANT BEACH

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to offer my congratulations to the Borough of Point Pleasant Beach as it celebrates its 100th anniversary.

Since its incorporation on June 12, 1886, by the New Jersey State Legislature, Point Pleasant Beach has become one of New Jersey's loveliest resort areas, home of many fine restaurants and seafood specialty markets, a principal center in the State for the sale of pleasure and commercial boats, and an area offering some of the best fishing, boating, and swimming along the entire shore.

Point Pleasant Beach has much to offer to its year-round residents as well as to the thousands of visitors who return summer after summer. I salute Point Pleasant Beach as it celebrates 100 years of progress and I extend my best wishes for continued success in the future.●

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILL HELD AT THE DESK—S. 2216

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after conferring with the Democratic leader, I ask unanimous consent that the bill introduced by Senator STEVENS today, to designate September 17, 1987, as "Constitution Day," be held at the desk until close of business on Monday, March 24, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SEQUENTIAL REFERRAL OF H.R. 3773

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that once H.R. 3773, the Federal Technology Transfer Act of 1985 is reported by the Commerce Committee, and placed on the calendar, it be sequentially referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for a period not to extend beyond 30 calendar days, for the purpose of considering sections 4, 5, 6, and 7; and that if H.R. 3773 is not reported at such time, the Judiciary Committee shall be immediately discharged of further consideration thereof, and the bill be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR FRIDAY

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after conferring with the Democratic leader, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. on Friday, March 21, 1986.

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Following recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, I ask unanimous consent that the following Senators be recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes each for special orders: Senators HAWKINS, PROXMIRE, BAUCUS, and SARBANES.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS UNTIL 10:30 A.M.

Following the special orders just identified, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. SIMPSON. Then, Mr. President, following morning business, the Senate will resume the motion to proceed to S. 1017, the regional airport bill.

Under the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, at 11 a.m., a live quorum will begin. Following the quorum, a cloture vote will occur on the motion to proceed to S. 1017, the regional airport bill. If cloture is invoked, the Senate will remain on the motion for the remainder of the day. Therefore, rollcall votes could occur.

Also, the Senate could be asked to turn to any other legislative or executive items cleared for action.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, as I understand the distinguished assistant Republican leader, the rollcall vote on the motion to invoke cloture would occur at about 11:25 or 11:30?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I think that would be a correct range for that vote.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I advise our colleagues on both sides of the aisle that we are attempting at this time to clear a 60-day extension of the Superfund Program which otherwise will expire on April 1. Since the House has now made the decision, apparently, that they are going to be in session only in pro forma fashion after tonight until after the Easter recess, we think we are faced with a situation where we must extend Superfund or else it will run out of funds on April 1 and no further site cleanups will be done and the contracting out will be terminated, which I think is a result that none of us wish to see.

The House, at the present moment, is voting on the reconciliation issue and we will see the outcome of that very shortly. But, indeed, they will be going out, so we will remain in morning business while we try to clear the extension.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the assistant leader yield for a question?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. As I understand it, we will conclude morning business at 10:30 a.m. tomorrow?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, that is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. And a quorum will begin at 11?

Mr. SIMPSON. A live quorum will begin, under rule XXII, at 11 a.m.

Mr. SARBANES. Is it the assistant leader's assumption that the half-hour would be available to talk about the motion to proceed if one wished to do so; is that correct?

Mr. SIMPSON. That would be correct.

Mr. SARBANES. Could the assistant leader assure me of 10 minutes during that period?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period of a half an hour, equally divided.

Mr. SARBANES. That is fine. I do not want to force anyone to use time if they do not want to use time. I just wanted to be certain that, if I wanted to, I had some time, that is all.

Mr. SIMPSON. It certainly would be appropriate and, I believe, under that unanimous-consent arrangement, that would be assured.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the Democratic leader have any further business?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not have. It is agreeable with me if the distinguished assistant leader wishes to put the Senate into morning business until such time as the matters to which he has already alluded are back before the Senate. I would take it, then, that the Senate would not be on the airport bill anymore today, am I correct?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, that would be correct.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

EXTENDING ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS UNTIL 7:30 P.M.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that morning business be extended until the hour of 7:30 this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is ordered.

SUPERFUND

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the House has now passed an extension of Superfund which we believe is the same as the legislation presented by Senator LAUTENBERG, which we cleared previously in this Chamber. It will consist of a 60-day extension until June 1 of this year, with a repayable advance of funds which will be paid back to the Treasury when Superfund itself is reauthorized.

Senator LAUTENBERG and I are both on the conference committee. We will resolve our issues with Superfund and a permanent reauthorization.

It will be our intention then to move the House bill at a very early opportunity on Friday, and I pledge to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. LAUTENBERG] that that will be done.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I thank the assistant majority leader for the cooperation and patience with which he dealt with this matter, and his commitment to see that we move judiciously tomorrow to pass the legislation that the House has just approved. It is the bill we originally started with.

I appreciate very much the effort of the minority leader and the assistant Republican leader tonight in getting that ready for swift and positive treatment tomorrow morning.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. He can be assured that we will do our best tomorrow morning.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I, too, appreciate the assistance of the Democratic leader in this process.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, there being no further business, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in recess until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to, and at 8:12 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Friday, March 21, 1986, at 10 a.m.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

□ 1129

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 540, with Mr. WHITLEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Wednesday, March 19, 1986, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] had 1 hour of debate remaining and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN] had 1 hour of debate remaining.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD].

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield my 1 hour of time to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], and I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to yield time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, opponents of the President's request for assistance to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua have argued we need to give negotiations a chance. Well, the President has now offered a compromise to respond specifically to the concerns of a number of Members of Congress to demonstrate his continued commitment to negotiations.

The President, with this offer of compromise, has taken a significant step to show his good faith in responding to the calls for a bipartisan approach to the crisis in Central America. It is now up to us in the Congress to meet the President halfway and accept his compromise and support his efforts to find a negotiated settlement in the region.

The President is responsible for the conduct of American foreign policy. We must give him the opportunity and the resources he believes necessary to carry out his duties.

As we conclude debate today on this most important national security issue, it is essential that we maintain the incentives for the Nicaraguan Communist leadership to negotiate. We must apply the carrot-and-the-stick approach. The President's compromise represents that approach.

The Nicaraguan Communists could have negotiated with their internal, unarmed opposition to participate in elections in 1984. Instead, they have continued to reject negotiations.

Now, the President's compromise proposal gives the Communists yet another chance to show they are sincere about negotiating.

The opponents of the administration say they do not want a military solution in Nicaragua. Yet, if they defeat aid to the Contras, they will ensure the military defeat of the Contras by the Communists, and after that, the military defeat of all remaining internal opposition.

The burden of proof also rests on the critics of the administration to demonstrate they want to give negotiations a chance and are not simply looking for a partisan, political victory over the President. The President's compromise is a sincere offer to seek the negotiations everyone says he wants. Now, let us set politics aside and support the President on this national security issue.

A defeat on this issue today will send a clear message to the democracies of Latin America that they cannot count on the U.S. Congress to stand with them in defense of freedom.

I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of the President's compromise proposal.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES].

Mr. BARNES. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, every now and then issues come before the Congress that really are momentous and historic; this is one of those. Today, we will decide whether the United States wants to support increased military action in Central America. Whether the United States wants to involve U.S. forces in the training and advising of guerrillas who are engaged in an effort to overthrow the government of another country with which the United States has normal diplomatic relations.

□ 1135

We will decide whether or not we want to give the President of the United States total discretion once again to involve the Central Intelligence Agency and all of the defense agencies of the United States in the running of this war in Central America.

This is indeed one of the moments when we have a very difficult decision to make.

Over the last 2 or 3 years the Congress has provided really when you think about it, it has in many respects been the Congress that has provided excellent leadership in the field of foreign affairs, not only in Central America, but elsewhere.

Let me just cite a couple of examples of where the Congress has stood up to the administration's foreign policy and has achieved some objectives that I thank all of us, Republicans and Democrats, are fairly proud of today.

In Central America, for example, the Reagan administration for its first days in office wanted to provide military assistance to Guatemala, wanted to provide unrestricted military assistance to El Salvador, wanted to have a close military to military relationship with the military dictatorships in those countries.

The Congress said no. The Congress said no military aid to that vicious, brutal dictatorship in Guatemala, and it said yes to military aid to El Salvador, but only under restrictions that require free elections, that require that the death squads be brought under control.

The Congress fought with the administration over those policies. As you will recall, many advocates of the administration's position came to this floor and said no restrictions on aid, let us give military aid to Guatemala, let us give military aid to El Salvador without restrictions; but the majority in the Congress, Republicans and Democrats alike, prevailed and today the administration points with pride to a newly elected democratic President in Guatemala who says it never would have happened if this Congress had gone along with the President's position.

The administration points with pride to the cutbacks in actions by the terrorist death squads in El Salvador, to the democratic elections in that country, that President Duarte himself has said never would have happend if this Congress had not put strict conditions on the aid that we provided to El Salvador.

Let us look at a more recent example of congressional leadership on foreign policy. To the very last minute, the Reagan administration wanted to stand with the Marcos dictatorship in the Philippines. At the very last minute, while the entire international community was saying that Marcos was stealing that election, was saying that he had to go, President Reagan was saying, "Well, there is fraud on both sides. You know, occasionally we have problems with our elections in this country. It's not all that bad and, after all, we have bases there."

It was not until this House passed a resolution saying we ought to terminate our aid, it was not until Senator LUGAR, a Republican, the gentleman from New York, STEVE SOLARZ, a Democrat, this bipartisan leadership, stood up to the administration and said, "No, your policy in the Philippines is wrong. We ought to cut that tie to Marcos."

And finally, the administration got on board the congressional policy with respect to the Philippines.

This Congress is capable of providing leadership and we have the opportunity again today, just as in the Philippines, where the United States was isolated in the international community, where no other country, except the Soviet Union, was standing with Marcos.

We are isolated again today. A policy that the administration says is designed to isolate Ortega, designed to isolate the Nicaraguans, has tragically isolated the United States from our best friends, from our best friends in Europe, from our best friends in Latin America.

We ought to have a positive policy that we can be proud of. We ought to be supporting our democratic allies and friends around the world and the Congress should loud and clear say today that there is an alternative, a better alternative to war in Central America and that is what we are being urged to do by all of our democratic friends all over the world.

The Congress can provide leadership again.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I want to quote from one of the great authorities on Latin America. His name is MICHAEL BARNES. I will tell you when he said it and where you can find it in the RECORD after I give you his message, and I quote:

> Nicaragua must now, unequivocally, choose the path of freedom, democracy, nonalinement, and respect of basic freedom for its people. Most recently, on September 29 I joined six other Members of the House in addressing a private letter stating these concerns to the Nicaraguan junta and directorate. That letter has not been answered.
> Mr. Speaker, I must now say to the leaders of Nicaragua: What do we have to show for our efforts? What do we have to show for our forbearance? How much longer do you expect us to remain silent in the face of what seems to be the slow but inexorable destruction of the ideals of your revolution?

Now, you can find that on page 33445 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 21, 1982.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEHMAN].

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Chairman, today, this House is being asked to support the President's request to provide aid to Contras who are in their fifth year of fighting the Sandinista government. We are once again faced with a decision to help the Contras and, in the President's own words, "deny the Soviet Union a beachhead in North America."

I agree with the President that the presence of Soviet and Cuban advisers in Nicaragua is a cause for national concern. The fact that human rights abuses are committed by both sides against innocent civilians concerns me a great deal and is something that we should seek to end. However, giving the Contras in Nicaragua $70 million in military aid contradicts the administration's stated objectives for resolving the problems in Central America.

According to the administration, the U.S. objectives in Central America center around "support for a political solution to the conflicts in Central America, via peaceful dialog within and among the countries of the region, and renewal of economic development and growth to address the root cause of turmoil and conflict." It seems to me that if the United States is serious about resolving the civil unrest in Central America, then the United States ought to commit its resources and energy toward the goals of "peaceful dialog" with the Contadora nations.

Then, on Sunday, the President appeared on national television to sell his aid request to the American people and to Congress. He tried to convey to the American people the need to act now before the "malignancy" in Nicaragua spreads to our "southern frontier." Well, Mr. President, your plea worked. As a result of over 300 phone calls and telegrams I received in response to your speech, I will vote against the request for aid to the Contras. Over 62 percent of my constituents who contacted me since Sunday have told me they are strongly against any aid to the Contras.

They told me that they want to see this country push for peace negotiations. They have said they are scared that we are repeating the course of history they and their children experienced in Vietnam. Moreover, they have asked me why we are giving the Contras $100 million when this Nation faces a bloated deficit and when domestic programs they need are being eliminated. I share their concerns and I will vote accordingly.

Finally, I have read with outrage several articles dealing with this issue which label those of us who are representing their constituents and voting against the President's request as supporting the spread of Marxism. Since when does voting in accordance with the views of the majority of my district mean that my patriotism and support for the country I love should be called into question? It is regrettable that debate on this issue has been lowered to this level. These attacks have only served to confirm my long-held views on this subject.

In July 1983, when this body voted to end all covert aid to the Contras, I addressed the House and said, "The only way the United States can truly achieve the President's objective of fostering democracy for the people of Central America is to help them establish the basis for a positive future." I believe now, as I did then, that this can best be accomplished by helping the countries of Central America resolve their differences peacefully, and formulating a realistic long-term policy which promotes economic development and eradicates widespread poverty and illiteracy.

I urge my colleagues and this administration to put our support behind the eight Latin American countries who have strongly advised this Nation against a self-defeating policy of blindly sending money to groups we cannot identify or hold accountable.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VALENTINE].

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman that I appreciate the fact that he made available to me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my opposition to the President's request for $100 million in U.S. assistance for the Contras in Central America.

Let me say at the outset that I take a back seat to no Member of Congress in my support for a strong national defense or in my opposition to Communist aggression anywhere in the world. I believe that my record clearly reflects my unwavering commitment to providing the military capabilities necessary to protect our vital interests.

Moreover, I have consistently sought opportunities to support the President on matters of national security. America's foreign policy is not a matter for partisanship.

I am concerned about the current aid request and disturbed about the terms in which this debate has been framed by some of the participants.

This is not a dispute over the patriotism or anticommunism of House Members—I know of no House Member who is not firmly opposed to Communist aggression.

This is not a dispute over support for the Sandinista government—I know of no House Member who supports the suppression of human rights in Nicaragua, Sandinista backing for insurgencies and terrorist activities that threaten the stability of other nations in the region, or the growth of Soviet and Cuban influence in Nicaragua.

This dispute is about the best way to protect American interests in a region that is of critical importance to us. I believe that the President has chosen the wrong approach.

The administration, in my opinion, has not presented arguments that justify the major step of providing aid to insurgents fighting to overthrow a government we recognize and with which we have diplomatic relations. If the threat from Nicaragua is as great as the President says, we should at least sever diplomatic relations with that nation before launching a major effort to bring down its government.

I also believe that we deserve a much better accounting of the assistance that we have already provided for the Contras. Recent reports that the General Accounting Office is unable to trace a substantial percentage of the aid authorized last year are disturbing, to say the least. If we do not know what happened to that aid, how can we even contemplate a fourfold increase?

Reports of widespread Contra atrocities and human rights violations also cannot be ignored. Do we want to pin our hopes for the region on a group that has compiled the record of the Contras? Do we want to send American tax dollars to an organization that includes many individuals formerly in the employ of the Somoza security force, the group most responsible for the conditions that promoted the Sandinista revolution?

Mr. Chairman, we face a difficult set of choices. We must fashion a policy in Central America that serves as a foundation for long-term stability in the region. In my view, only if we have the support, and indeed the active participation, of the nations with the greatest stake in the area can we hope to succeed.

For that reason, our policy must include the democracies of Central and South America. We have been told that those nations privately support American assistance to the Contras but cannot take that position publicly for fear of Communist retaliation. I understand that argument, but I do not find it to be sensible from the point of view of these nations.

Do these governments believe that they will be spared Sandinista aggression if they refrain from publicly acknowledging their own national interests? Do they believe that they are threatened by Nicaragua but that the Sandinista menace will melt away if they do not express support for the Contras? If those governments do fear the Sandinistas, I believe that it would be in their long-term interest to give public support to efforts to address that threat.

Mr. Chairman, I do not take this position in opposition to the President's request lightly. But I do believe that it is the wrong policy at the wrong time and that it will produce the wrong results. I hope that the administration and the Congress will be able to agree on a bipartisan policy that protects our interests and can command the support of the American people as well as of the nations with greatest stake in Central America.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Sensenbrenner].

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Chairman, until yesterday I was one of those undecided votes. My concern about this aid request fell into two categories.

First, there were not appropriate safeguards to insure that the aid went to those that this country intended the aid to go to and was not sold on the open market or the black market in Central America.

Second, I was concerned about the very legitimate allegations of human rights violations on the part of the Contras.

I brought these matters to the attention of both the Vice President and Mr. Abrams and have received a letter, which I will ask to insert in the RECORD, that hits both of these points. Basically this letter says that there will be some postaudit accountability to make sure that the aid falls into those hands that this country and the administration intend it to, and furthermore, that the aid is conditioned upon any group receiving the aid having an enforceable code of military justice.

I urge the membership to support the President's request for freedom in Central America.

Mr. Chairman, I include the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, DC, March 20, 1986.

Hon. JAMES SENSENBRENNER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SENSENBRENNER: This letter responds to your concerns about accountability of funds to be provided to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance under the President's request and the dedication of the resistance to the protection of human rights.

First, let me address the accountability issue. We agree completely that proper procedures must be maintained to ensure that all funds are used for their intended purposes. As you know, the administration of the humanitarian assistance program as authorized by the Congress has operated under the difficulties inherent in a partially overt, partially covert program. Our ability, under the proposed legislation, to use those agencies best equipped to monitor program implementation will ensure improved monitoring and control. Control over funds will be provided through a system of policy oversight, audits, and periodic reports to the Congress.

Policy oversight of the humanitarian assistance program is currently provided by the Secretary with the assistance of an inter-agency group chaired by Under-Secretary Armacost. We would envision a similar arrangement following enactment of the proposed legislation.

Audits will be conducted as appropriate, to ensure funds are used for the purpose intended. In addition, the Inspectors General of the relevant agencies will review their agencies' activities under the program. The President's proposal provides for releasing funds in tranches of 15% every 90 days conditioned upon submission of a report to the Congress. These reports would include details of efforts to reach a negotiated settlement, a detailed accounting of disbursements, and a discussion of the human rights practices of the resistance and the Sandinistas. Details of the covert portions of the program would be provided to the appropriate Congressional committees. This system of audits and reports will ensure that both the Executive and the Congress are fully informed about the administration of the program. Such a system is vital if we are to achieve our goals with the proposed legislation.

With respect to the human rights situation of the resistance, the key point is that the resistance's record, while not perfect, is reasonable and is improving, while the Sandinistas have adopted a policy of increasing repression and abuse. The Nicaraguan resistance has been tarred with a poor human rights image by the international human rights network. This undeserved image reflects both an active Sandinista effort to discredit the resistance and a pro-Sandinista bias among certain human rights groups. A recent New Republic article (attached) outlined this bias, which arises from home that the revolution will succeed and varies from soft-peddling Sandinista atrocities to ignoring favorable information about the resistance. The resistance's record on human rights has been good. Nevertheless, we need to do more to ensure that the human rights performance of all the groups we support continues to improve. In that regard, $3 million of the President's request will go to support continuing and strengthening human rights programs conducted by the democratic resistance.

The resistance has taken measures to ensure proper conduct by its members. Commanders have stressed the importance of lawful conduct, and UNO/FDN is training human rights officers for each regional command and task force. Troops in training receive instruction on the laws of war, and receive material to carry with them to remind them of their responsibilities in this area. Several members, including a commander, charged with improper conduct, have been tried and, when found guilty, punished. These kinds of actions are essential to maintaining a high standard of human rights and must be continued.

In 1985, UNO established a human rights commission (CDH) to monitor the human rights performance of the resistance. CDH is headed by Ismael Reyes, former head of the Nicaraguan Red Cross, and its executive director is Roberto Ferrey, who was exiled by Somoza from 1976-79. He later served as legal adviser to the Minister of Justice in the first revolutionary government, but left when he became disillusioned with Sandinista policy.

UNO has attempted to open contacts with international human rights groups. It has provided the ICRC with information on Sandinista prisoners and casualties and attempted to arrange prisoner exchanges with the Sandinistas through the ICRC. To date, the Sandinistas have refused all such proposals.

We fully support these efforts and will continue to do so. President Reagan has made plain in his letter to Congress that we will provide no assistance to any group that retains in its ranks any known violator of human rights. The Secretary in his February 7 meeting with the leaders of the democratic resistance stressed that we would not be associated with any group or individuals involved in human rights abuses or criminality of any kind.

Finally, in any discussion of human rights it must be remembered that the resistance depends on popular support for its existence. It has earned this support. It deserves ours as well.

I hope this responds to your concerns, and that you will be able to support the President's request.

Sincerely,

ELLIOTT ABRAMS,
Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COLEMAN].

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the administration's request for funds to pursue a military solution to the Nicaraguan dilemma.

For some 10 hours now, this Chamber has heard a variety of sincerely held opinions about the proper course of United States policy in Nicaragua. While I certainly will not use this time to go back over previous arguments, I would like to share with my colleagues the unique perspective on this issue that comes from representing a district directly on the United States-Mexico border.

Some of the rhetoric we have heard attempts to reduce this complex issue to one of simplistic labels and slogans. But the vote today is not as clear cut as some would portray it—the choice before us today is not between aid to the Contras or the spread of communism.

There is no doubt but that there are broad areas of agreement between all Members of Congress and the President regarding Central America. No one here today would hesitate to take whatever action is necessary to prevent the establishment of Soviet military bases that would jeopardize the security of either the United States or of this hemisphere. Clearly, all Americans embrace the goals of promoting democracy, ensuring the attainment of human rights worldwide, and curbing the spread of communism.

No, Mr. Chairman, the vote today is not about this Congress' dedication to these foreign policy objectives. Rather, today's vote is about selecting a course of action that can reach these objectives. The President has pursued a confusing strategy that pays lip service to a diplomatic solution to the Nicaraguan problem while at the same time he talks of forcing the Sandinistas to "say Uncle." Unfortunately, foreign policy cannot be formulated on imprecise and frequently contradictory statements, and this is why the course of action followed by this administration has resulted in the entrenchment of the Sandinista regime in Managua.

I represent an area of west Texas directly adjacent to Mexico, a region of this country isolated from virtually every major city in the United States. This is a region comprised primarily of Americans of Latin American descent who feel a very close kinship to our neighbors to the south, Americans who do business daily with Latin America, and Americans who serve or have already served our country in its Armed Forces. And I think we west Texans have a far clearer idea of the threat posed by a politically unstable Central America. To prosper and grow in this region has caused us to appreciate the wisdom of bilateral communications to prevent conflict, and the strength to fight when all peaceful options have been exhausted. Colleagues, this country has not even begun to honestly explore nonmilitary alternatives in Central America.

Ensuring that Nicaragua not fall permanently into the Communist camp, and that the progress toward democracy attained by a host of other Central American nations will not be impeded, cannot be realized by the pursuit of a unilateral policy based solely on military strength as a threat. Indeed, the stability of democratic nations throughout Central America, especially Mexico, needs to become the focal point of a comprehensive United States policy based not on guns and bullets, but rather on the principles of mutual respect, on economic development and the improvement of the way of life for all Latin Americans, and on the realization of the sovereignty of each nation in our Southern Hemisphere.

Those who claim that the failure of the House to support the proposed package of military assistance will cause the failure of United States policy in Nicaragua miss the point—this nonpolicy has already failed. And there is little argument coming from either the military or intelligence communities that this $100 million will accomplish anything in the way of even a military solution.

So, Mr. Chairman, what is this debate really about? It is about choices. Either we pursue a unilateral, military-oriented policy that promises to fail, or we can put away our gun money and strive to achieve a more lasting peace based on a commonality of interests and goals. Today, this House can begin a journey which strongly resembles a path embarked on over 20 years ago in Southeast Asia, or it can set an example for all of the world to respect.

I ask all of my colleagues, as freedom-loving Americans who care about human life, to vote against the President's proposal.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. JOHNSON].

Mrs. JOHNSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 540 and applaud the President's acceptance of congressional effects to structure a clear, opportunity for negotiations to achieve agreements that will address the problems in Central America before military aid is released.

A year ago I stood on this House floor and fought hard against military aid and in support of humanitarian aid. The goal was to deescalate conflict, to create an opportunity for negotiations to succeed. If we examine the consequences of our policy adopted a year ago, we will have to acknowledge that the policy failed, the results have been abysmal.

Nicaragua has adopted more oppressive policies internally than at any other time in her history and has renewed the flow of resources to destabilize governments that share her borders.

Let us look back further, to 3 years ago when Nicaragua was refusing to join the regional peace process, the Contadora process. At that time, she insisted on negotiating one on one, face to face, with the nations of the region, which gave her the upper hand at the negotiation table. In the face of Nicaragua's continued refusal to join the regional peace process, we mobilized with our allies a combination of military and diplomatic pressures that influenced her to change her position. She began to participate in the regional peace process as a result of these pressures. In other words, diplomatic and military pressures worked. They did bring Nicaragua to the bargaining table. They did foster negotiations that were fruitful, if incomplete.

Stepping back to relieve pressure, as we did a year ago, did not work, and today we must have the courage to once again mobilize the constellation of pressures, diplomatic and military, that will enable a negotiated settlement to address the difficult problems we face in Central America and to bring peace and stability to that region.

Let me say once again, that if Senator SASSER's description of why some could not support the President is an honest one, and if what he really wanted and what Democrats really wanted was to assure that there would be a last opportunity to negotiate plan, then I say Democrats can vote "yes" today. This is a strong proposal. Negotiations will precede any flow of military aid, and we can fulfill our responsibility to bring peace to this region, which is so important to us, but in addition, to preserve fragile democracies and the opportunity that democracy offers people that Marxism does not offer people—ask any of my Polish constituents—for a life that is filled with freedom and prosperity and hope.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to giving $100 million of our taxpayers' money to the Contra forces in Nicaragua and urge defeat of this resolution.

The administration's conclusion in Nicaragua is that the only response is to promote a war. This is objectionable, and indeed alarming, to a majority of Americans. Most Americans look upon war the way most Americans view taxes—something to be applied as a last resort only, not the first thing we do.

The administration's option is to look for military solutions first.

Mr. Chairman, eight foreign ministers, our allies, recently visited the United States and asked the President to please engage in diplomacy. The Contadora countries have placed three proposals for dialog on the table. Our country has not even responded. Since 1982, when it was first revealed that the CIA had provided nearly $20 million in covert, illegal aid to a Contra force in Nicaragua, the administration has promoted an undeclared war, sinking fishing boats, mining harbors, counseling assassinations, and imposing economic sanctions.

The rationale for this policy has been characterized by half-truths, even outright falsification. They have told us the Pope supports an armed struggle. Mysterious crates contained Soviet Mig fighters. The Contras are the moral equivalent of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. Now Democrats opposed to the administration's policy, they told us, are supporters of Havana, Moscow, and worldwide Communist revolution.

None of these and countless other administration assertions are true. Indeed, they are absurd and demean the issue. If history teaches us anything, it is that a policy based on misconceptions and fabrications is fundamentally flawed, and I hope we reject this reckless policy.

When it involves tens of millions of dollars in military equipment and arms, the commitment of American troop advisers and our country's good name, the policy becomes reckless and it is the responsibility of Congress to reject it, and reject it soundly.

Nicaragua is a tiny country of 2.8 million people, the population of northeast Ohio's five-county region. To suggest that this mite of a country can threaten America's southern borders is absurd. The notion that our only option in addressing Managua's ideological orientation is war, betrays a lack of imagination and an absence of confidence in our country's moral, economic, political, and cultural strength.

The administration's present course with respect to Nicaragua is driving the vast majority of Nicaraguans to rally behind the government against the outside invader, the Contras who are largely led by the hated Somocistas and, if the administration continues to have its way, by United States military and CIA advisers. This course of pursuing a military approach to the problems of Central America unwisely narrows our options to either war in the region or forfeiture of the hemisphere to Soviet hegemony. Recent experience with the administration's military approach to the problems of the Middle East led to the tragic debacle in Beirut where we lost hundreds of marines and diplomatic personnel. The examples of Haiti and the Philippines, where we kept our options open, demonstrated how the skillful use of the full range of American resources can lead to resolutions that serve our national interests and the interests of the people in the countries in question.

In the case of Nicaragua, the administration characteristically overstates its case. The Sandinistas have indeed announced a Communist orientation. Two-thirds of the Nicaraguan economy, however, is in the private sector. We should be working to strengthen that sector, instead of trying to undermine it. The Catholic Church in Nicaragua is vibrant and outspoken, often scolding the Sandinista government. We should be working on the basis of the many contacts between church and other private groups in our country with their counterparts in Nicaragua. In fact, during the last 5 years, more than 100,000 Americans have visited Nicaragua. This provides a firm basis to influence events in that tiny country. There is even an active political opposition in Nicaragua. It did not win the most recent election there, but it had a chance to compete in a process that was no more corrupt than the recent election in the Philippines. I did not support the corruption in the latter country, but I also did not see corruption as grounds for war. Neither did President Reagan.

Our country has vast resources that can be applied to the problems that confront us in Central America. President Kennedy demonstrated that we can keep the hemisphere free of Soviet nuclear arms. We should take the same resolute stance should we ever be confronted with a similar situation in the future. We are not confronted with that situation today. Let us keep our political, diplomatic, economic, cultural and military options open by rejecting the President's $100 million request. War should be a last resort, not the first thing you try.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN].

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, as the world watches today, I hope the American people consider two alternatives and two scenarios to prevent a Soviet military surrogate in Nicaragua.

In the first scenario, the United States cuts off all aid to the democratic opposition fighting in Nicaragua. Nicaraguan leader Daniel Ortega forgives them all, and seeks national reconciliation. He sends his Soviet and Cuban advisers home, reduces the size of his armed forces, and restores individual, press, and religious freedoms. He also ceases to foment revolution in his Central American neighbors. We all live happily ever after.

In the second scenario, the United States also cuts off all aid to the democratic opposition. Nicaraguan leader Daniel Ortega consolidates his power and members of the opposition become refugees. Soviet and Cuban influence strengthens. Ortega becomes more aggressive in fomenting unrest among his Central American neighbors. There is no domestic opposition left; our only remaining option is military force.

Which scenario seems more likely?

The first scenario is possible only if you believe Nicaraguan strong man Daniel Ortega is not fully committed to Havana and Moscow.

Which scenario would young Americans prefer? Letting Nicaraguans solve their problems with our help to counterbalance the Soviets or, ultimately, resolving this situation through intervention that could result in American lives?

If we are to prevent a Soviet military surrogate in Nicaragua it is best done by Nicaraguans who espouse the cause of freedom and who have our assistance. The administration has said, time and again, that no Americans will be involved in Nicaragua. No American pilots. No American advisers. No American CIA agents. No Americans in Nicaragua, period.

In the Democratic response to the President's address of March 16 on Nicaragua, it was agreed that "Nicaragua must never become a base for Soviet military adventurism." It called for a negotiated settlement.

That sounds nice. The problem is, however, that it defies credulity to believe Daniel Ortega will voluntarily give up his Soviet and Cuban roots.

We support the Contadora process. We want a negotiated settlement. It is in fact the Sandinistas who most recently rejected Contadora proposals and who chose in December 1985 to postpone further talks.

And the President's most recent action, which withholds the most significant amount of this aid in an effort to promote another diplomatic attempt to resolve this crisis, further demonstrates the U.S. commitment to negotiate.

Much has been said about atrocities in Nicaragua. Much is regrettably true. But the atrocities are not limited to one side. A recent America Watch report documents atrocities on both sides. And former Sandinista Alvaro Baldizon, who worked in the Nicaraguan Ministry of the Interior until his defection last year, has detailed murders by the Sandinistas and government assassination squads disguised as Contras fighters.

Neither President Reagan, nor this administration, nor for that matter any previous administration, condones or has condoned any such atrocities. We have always abided by the Geneva Conventions. We are not a ruthless people; it is not in our nature.

In fact, the United Nicaraguan Opposition, with our support, has taken positive steps to deter such acts by the establishment of the Human Rights Commission [UNO-CDH], headed by Ismael Reyes, former president of the Nicaraguan Red Cross.

I will vehemently oppose any use of the funds in this package for wanton acts against civilians, repugnant CIA pamphlets, mining of harbors, and other terrorist acts.

Concerns have also been raised that our allies in Latin America and elsewhere have not been overt in their support for current American proposals. As they read the U.S. political debate, Latin leaders may have some right to concern about the constancy of U.S. policy.

Latin American concern about Soviet imperialism, moreover, is at least as overt as is their concern about "Yankee" intervention. And they know that only the United States can counterbalance the Soviets.

The future of Central America belongs to bold leaders both there and in the United States. In the words of former President John F. Kennedy: "If not us, who; if not now, when?"

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the President's proposal.

Central America, and Nicaragua in particular, pose serious and difficult challenges for America. Unfortunately, just as the need is greatest for us to work together toward a solution, the issue of funding the Contras has sharply divided the Congress and the American people.

Many of us in the Democratic Party have supported the President in his major foreign policy initiatives with consistency and resolve. The shrill and exaggerated partisan rhetoric of the White House during the past few weeks has only weakened the administration's case—not strengthened it. The White House has played politics with this debate and that has cost them votes. No Democrat is going to be intimidated into being bipartisan.

On questions of this magnitude, previous Presidents have wisely put policy ahead of politics. During Woodrow Wilson's administration, the advice of his able White House aide, Colonel House was clear: "The best politics is to do the right thing." That advice is still true today. The partisanship and politics that have clouded this issue are the reasons we face today two equally dangerous extremes.

On one side are those who argue that the Sandinistas are not hostile to freedom, that they are neither a threat to America nor their neighbors, that they do not commit the atrocities of which they are accused, and that their domestic policies are a result of American intervention.

The other side, led by the exaggerated rhetoric of the White House, tells us that the Contras are the moral equivalent of the Founding Fathers, and that without $100 million in U.S. aid today the Contras will fail and communism will win in our hemisphere.

Proponents of both of these positions base their arguments on half truths. The Sandinista government has betrayed its revolution. This Communist-inspired totalitarian government is supporting the guerrillas in El Salvador and subversion throughout our hemisphere. The people of Nicaragua have been subjected to civil rights abuses of the worst order. In Nicaragua today, there is no real freedom of the press, of religion, or of assembly. Their idea of a criminal justice system includes neither the right to habeas corpus nor the right to trial.

While I was in Managua last year, Minister of the Interior Thomas Borge, on a whim, entertained me by releasing from prison a man who had been incarcerated there for many months without a hearing. The commandante wanted to show me the justice of his system; in reality, of course, he proved just the opposite.

Nor do the Contras have clean hands. In fact, the Contras have little internal discipline and as a result, gross atrocities have been committed against the Nicaraguan people. Many of the Contra leaders are former Somoza henchmen. They have had very little success on the battlefield, and many of our military leaders tell us they cannot win.

More importantly, they have not shown to the Nicaraguan people or to the world the kind of government they would be should they be successful.

While in Nicaragua, I met several conscripted Contra soldiers who were only 13 years old. I talked to one poor woman who said the Contras had come through her village and destroyed their small hospital. Such tactics fail to gain the support of the Nicaraguan people. Without major reform, their chances of real success are grim.

Between the proponents of these two competing views, only one thing is held in common: the belief that our choice today is all or nothing. Both would convince us that there can be no compromise, no bipartisan policy that can bring about a peaceful restoration of democracy in Nicaragua. Both extremes are wrong and both are self-defeating. There is a better choice.

One hundred and sixty-four years ago this month, the United States first urged the recognition of the emerging Latin American republics. Simon Bolivar spoke then of his plans to make the Americas the greatest region in the world. "Greatest," he said, "not so much by virtue of her area and her wealth, as by her freedom * * *."

Bolivar's vision has never been in greater peril.

We must begin today to craft a policy that makes sense for the United States and for the Nicaraguan people; such a policy is both urgently needed and eminently possible. There is a growing concensus in this body that rejects both of the polarized positions represented by this vote. We will not hear a great deal in defense of the Sandinista government in this Chamber today; that is no longer the issue. The issue before us is more difficult: What should we do about the Sandinistas? What kind of long range policy will give stability to Central America and help democracy to flourish?

Congress and the administration are capable of constructing such a policy. What is most needed is a plan that promises real progress in Nicaragua. Such a policy should include the following points:

First, we should provide immediate financial support to the Contadora group and give them more than hollow assurances of our support.

Second, a bipartisan observer team should be appointed by the leadership of the House and Senate. The group would report regularly on the progress of the negotiations and the status of civil rights in Nicaragua.

Third, we need to commit ourselves to a long-range partnership with the fragile democratic governments of Central America. The Kissinger commission report, all but forgotten by this administration, should be revived and implemented. We need a mini-Marshall plan for the economic development of Central America. Not since the Alliance for Progress in the early 1960's has any administration set clearly defined social and economic goals for the region and then aggressively worked to achieve those goals. A revitalized Peace Corps, an expanded program of surplus food distribution, attention to the needs of Central America in health and education, perhaps a restructuring of Latin American debt, all should be considered if we truly want democracy to prosper.

Fourth, we should provide an immediate $30 million in nonmilitary aid to the democratic resistance that would be primarily designated for training and reform. The funds would go not only to the Contras, but rather would be dispersed to all of the major resistance forces within Nicaragua.

Fifth, an additional $70 million in military aid should be put in escrow for 90 days. If after that time the President and the bipartisan observer team agree that peace negotiations have failed and that no genuine domestic reforms are being carried out by the Sandinistas, the funds would become available unless Congress stops the funding within 5 legislative days.

All U.S. aid would be discontinued if the Sandinista government agrees to a cease fire, earnestly begins talks with the opposition, and removes sanctions against freedom of press, assembly and religion.

Sixth, the United States must more clearly define to Cuba and the Soviet Union our vital security limits in Central America. We must be prepared to enforce those limits with American strength. Our responses must be specific and unequivocal—not undefined strategies such as the random mining of Nicaraguan harbors.

Finally, our efforts must all drive toward a single aim: to give political support and visibility to the legitimate opposition to the Sandinista government within Nicaragua. The new political leaders who will fulfill the dreams of democracy for the people of Nicaragua will emerge in Managua—not Miami.

Will this compromise proposal work? There are no guarantees. But surely the two alternatives before us today: to do nothing or to rely solely on a military solution, are self-defeating and fraught with peril.

There are great opportunities for democracy to flourish in Central America. In Honduras, in Guatemala, in El Salvador, fragile democracies are trying to grow. Let us seize this opportunity to create a larger policy for our hemisphere.

As President Kennedy said 25 years ago:

> Our continents are bound together by common history, the endless exploration of new frontiers. Our nations are the product of a common struggle * * * and our people share a common heritage, the quest for the dignity and the freedom of man.

Only by defeating this proposal today can we move toward a compromise that will not only strenghten America's role, but also give strength and direction to those striving for democracy in Central America.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, could you tell us the time remaining on both sides?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has 50 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has 44 minutes remaining.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconisn [Mr. GUNDERSON].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I have thought long and hard on this issue and have sought out information from those in and out of the Congress close to this issue. I sense this year a significant change in the debate. The realities of the Sandinistas are now universally recognized.

To reduce the debate, as I understand it, its essential is how to achieve a Contadora negotiated settlement and containment of Sandinista adventurism. On the one hand, we are told that the neighboring countries in Central America will achieve it on their own. I believe this is unrealistic and that we will need the military pressure to back up our diplomatic and political efforts to achieve our objectives.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have never supported military assistance to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua. It has always been my position that each country in Central America ought to have the right to chart its own destiny, whether we like their chosen destiny or not.

Yet, after careful and intense review of intelligence material I am convinced beyond any doubt that the Sandinistas of Nicaragua are exporting revolution throughout the region.

Such a conclusion caused me to carefully study the two options before us today. And I found them both unacceptable. To vote this package down and do nothing is to guarantee the destabilization of the entire region. Yet, to persue a military solution seems both premature and a far greater commitment than can be achieved by this proposal.

It is for this reason many of us sought a bipartisan concensus that could produce a defensible long-term policy for the region. And this compromise for which the President announced his support last night provides us this opportunity. It is based on a preference for negotiations. It contains no new appropriations, rather a reprograming of previously appropriated defense dollars. And it uses military assistance only as a leverage to pressure all sides into serious negotiations. I want to assure those concerned that intelligence sources suggest the Contras would need many times more this amount of military assistance to have any hope of a military victory.

The compromise included in the President's legislative proposal now before us, the President's message to Congress of yesterday, and the draft executive order the President will sign upon passage of such legislation continue the humanitarian assistance at $25 million. It also provides an additional $2 million in support of the Contadora process. And it delays the $70 million in direct military assistance for 90 days during which negotiations should occur on an internal, a regional, and bilateral basis.

At the end of 75 days, the President must report to Congress on the status of negotiations and the hope for future progress. Congress then has 15 days to deauthorize the military funding if it so chooses.

However, most important, the status of the military funding is actually in the hands of the present Nicaraguan Government. For they can prevent the military funds from ever being released. And if the funds are released they can stop further distribution by three simple and positive measures. First, declaring a cease-fire; second, conducting internal negotiations with the various opposition parties; and third, lifting the "emergency rule" which restricts religious, political, and free speech restrictions. Never has such an incentive for positive negotiations been presented to any country in the world. They alone can choose between military confrontation with the Contras or negotiations for peace.

In addition to these efforts at negotiations, the compromise also directs a new commitment toward economic aid based upon the recommendations of the bipartisan Commission on Central America. Finally, this package also includes continued review of human rights abuses by both the Sandinista and the freedom fighters.

Mr. Chairman, I and many of my colleagues would have preferred to accomplish this compromise through legislative action. Yet, the decision of the Democratic leadership to force a simple up or down vote on the President's proposal has denied us that direct opportunity. Yet, the President has promised to implement these conditions through an Executive order which has the force of law. And, most important, he has agreed to name a bipartisan congressional commission to monitor the negotiations and report back to the Congress and the administration on their progress, their potential for resolution, and an honest assessment of who is seriously committed to this process and who isn't. It is important for the public to know that this five-member commission will be based upon one nomination each from the Speaker and minority leader of the House, and the majority and minority leaders in the Senate. The four will then choose the fifth person. Through this commission, the President agrees to monitoring and review of all administration decisions on negotiations and the release or nonrelease of military aid to the Contras.

If there ever was any doubt of the President's commitment to negotiations over military action, I believe this compromise dispells such myths. If there ever was a program based on negotiations, with military assistance as only pressure to make the negotiations work and used in a last resort, this compromise is it.

I believe this compromise presents the best opportunity we have ever had for a bipartisan long-term policy in Central America. Thus, I encourage my colleagues to support the proposal before us.

Mr. Chairman, during the weeks of discussion on aid to the Contras it has become apparent that neither of the options now facing Congress is acceptable.

This is not a clear-cut issue that can be settled by a yes or no decision. The problem with the legislation presented to us by President Reagan is that our choices are extreme.

To reject the aid and do nothing is wrong. It will send the wrong signal to Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega and our other Central American neighbors. Walking away from the issue will not bring an end to Nicaraguan support and sponsorship of terrorism and revolution throughout the region.

But to authorize $70 million in military aid—with no strings attached—is just as wrong. It is clear to me that the approach of diplomatic negotiations has not been exhausted. And if our policy is now one of a military solution, the $70 million is totally inadquate.

If America is to play a positive role in resolving the conflict now plaguing the region, it must be willing to develop a policy that goes beyond the black and white alternatives Congress will consider today. That is why I joined a number of my colleagues in the House, both Democrats and Republicans, in urging a different proposal.

This alternative addresses the problems in Nicaragua from several angles. It places negotiations above fighting. It emphasizes respect for human rights. It provides the funds needed for advancing the Contadora process. It stresses the economic development of the region. And it increases the pressure needed to bring about a negotiated settlement.

The key difference between our plan and the President's plan is that under our proposal, military aid is a last resort. It will only occur if the Sandinistas leave America no alternative.

We in this country work best when we work together. Most predictions say that the vote on the President's package will come down to a handful of votes. We send no meaningful signal to the region when we decide to take a step of such major importance by the narrowest of margins. I believe that the alternative proposal can receive broad bipartisan support—support necessary if America is to promote an effective and successful policy in Central America.

Before discussing the specifics of our proposal, it is important to identify the problem we are attempting to address. After hours of classified briefings, pages of intelligence reports, and countless discussions with individuals representing the full range of opinion on the issue, it has become clear to me that the Sandinistas' threat to the region is real.

The $500 million in weaponry provided by the Soviet Union is not the result the administration's overactive imagination. The assassination of Supreme Court Justices in Columbia with weapons later linked to Nicaragua is fact, not fancy. The 10,000-foot runway at Punta Huete, which is the longest runway in Central America and is capable of accommodating any aircraft in the Soviet inventory, will not go away just because we wish it would. The photo of Sandinista Commander Daniel Ortega proudly raising the hand of Libyan terrorist Múammar Qadhafi could not convey a clearer message.

There is no law, nor should there be, requiring that all nations must think, act, and behave the same as America. But that does not mean that America should stand idly by and watch as a nation uses murder and coercion to bully their neighbors. America is acting in response to Nicaraguan abuses, not the other way around. Nicaragua smuggled arms to rebels in El Salvador long before Contra forces were funded by the United States. Today, Nicaragua is assisting revolutionary efforts in almost every country in the region.

Yes; the threat is real and we must act to bring an end to that threat. But we must explore other options before we provide the Contra rebels with unrestricted military aid.

We must first put more emphasis on a negotiated solution. I do not believe that the Nicaraguans or the United States have adequately pursued the negotiation process on an internal, bilateral, or regional basis. The alternative we proposed places negotiations above all other considerations.

With $2 miilion in aid to the Contadora group, our proposed compromise makes clear America's commitment to meet the financial needs required in pursuing a regionally negotiated settlement. If we hope to achieve a regional settlement it is important that we not give up on those Latin American nations that are working so hard to bring about peace.

We create a five-member bipartisan commission, comprised of distinguished and respected experts, to monitor all negotiations and report back to Congress. Through this commission, we can achieve the unbiased and objective perspective that has all too often been absent from debate on this issue. The establishment of this commission will unequivocally demonstrate the determination of Congress to pressure both the Sandinistas and the Reagan administration into undertaking serious and responsible negotiations.

Our plan calls for $30 million in humanitarian assistance and possibly $70 million in military aid to the Contras.

But we would not allow any money to be spent on military aid until 3 months have passed and these conditions are met:

The governments of the Central American nations involved in the Contadora negotiations have not reported an agreement.

A declared cease-fire is not in effect in Nicaragua and new elections are not taking place there.

Trade and economic measures have failed to resolve the conflict.

No other avenues exist for a negotiated settlement.

If the President certifies these conditions exist and provides notification that military aid will be appropriated, Congress will retain the power to pass a joint resolution blocking the aid. The bipartisan commission would serve as an objective and outside source of information for Congress as it considers the aid request.

Let there be no doubt, military assistance to the Contras would be a last resort. I pray that it is an option we need never choose. But, it is up to the Sandinistas. If they continue to subvert their neighbors. If they choose to sleep with the Qadhafis and Arafats of the world. If they refuse to ignore domestic, United States, and Latin American demands to join in serious and meaningful negotiations on an internal, regional, and bilateral basis, then the United States will be left no alternative but to run up the pressure and grant military aid to the rebels.

Military aid could be suspended at any time if the Nicaraguan Government implements a cease-fire, begins direct negotiations with the opposition, and lifts restrictions on freedom of the press, assembly, and religion.

Economic development is critical to a lasting peace in Central America. The proposal we have offered makes economic development an integral part of United States efforts, providing economic aid for Guatemala, Honduras, Costa Rica, and El Salvador.

America must loudly and repeatedly communicate its abhorrence with human rights violations committed by either party to the Nicaraguan conflict. Provisions in the compromise package would allow for the suspension of Contra aid if abuses take place and those who are responsible are not punished. If any member of a resistance group engages in drug smuggling or the diversion and misuse of funds, and if that person is not dismissed, the group shall be ineligible to receive U.S. assistance.

This plan provides a much better long-term policy for both Nicaragua and all of Central America.

There are no simple yes-or-no answers to the quagmire of problems facing Nicaragua. The facts demand that we not take a walk and simply trust the Sandinistas to respect the rights and interests of its neighbors; something it has so far failed to do. But we should not look to a military solution, if there is any hope that negotiation remains a viable alternative. In offering a proposal that fences in military assistance, using it as an incentive to negotiations, it is my hope that we can break the current impasse and help bring about a lasting and real peace for the region.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LEACH].

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like briefly to address the issue of compromise. That proposed by the President would appear to be of a tactical variety: consequential perhaps in dealing with Congress but of limited significance to constraining the administration's intended policies.

The only kind of compromise this Member would consider credible would be one precluding the provision of militarily related assistance to armed intervenors in the region and one requiring administration reacceptance of the jurisdiction of the World Court in issues of this nature.

After all, what is at stake in these deliberations relates less to the irrational decisions of a leftward lurching government in a small area of Central America and more to the constitutional process of decisionmaking here at home and to the rule of law in our policy abroad.

Given the preemptive executive decision to commence without congressional sanction a civil war in Nicaragua, the Congress is placed in the difficult position of having to determine which is a greater misdeed: pulling the rug from armed mercenaries who were trained and equipped in violation of United States law and who are currently marauding a countryside in violation of international law; or pulling the rug from the values we cherish as profoundly American: the sanctity of law, the rights of others to determine their own destiny in their own way; a decent respect for the opinions of mankind.

It is worthy of note that the vast majority of our allies in Europe and of our friends in Latin America have called on us to reverse gears and end assistance to the Contras. It is worthy of note that Brooklyn Rivera, the leader of the Miskito Indian resistance, told this Member just last week that we've backed the wrong horse. Whatever statistics are trotted out about what percentage of officers of the FDN are former Somocistas, the understandable view of virtually everyone in Nicaragua is that the United States wants a return to the past and wants to impose its will by force. Is there any wonder a policy of support for armed groups who destroy crops and execute social workers is counterproductive? Is there any wonder there is no one in or out of Nicaragua that's predicting success for these forces? The issue isn't arms; it's morality.

The Sandinistas have fallen victim to a kind of ideological corruption. But instead of allowing the weight of its own mismanagement to sink itself, we leaped precipitously into the fray and backed a force that can't win. We are responsible for escalating violence in a traditionally pacific country. Enough is enough.

Liberals may have erred by believing the Sandinistas wouldn't opt in the direction of police state controls; but our country nevertheless has an obligation to stand by the side of law, with the understanding that not only do procedural concerns matter but that adherence to proper rules in the long run are more likely to produce proper results. There is simply no evidence America is very good at running a civil war oriented foreign policy. There is evidence, as recent as last month in the Philippines and Haiti, that despots cannot stand for long when their policies don't serve the interest of their people.

The time has come to reconsider an ill-chosen path. It is better to cut bait now than troll into waters whose depths are unfathomable, whose currents are uncontrollable. Prudence dictates restraint.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KOLBE].

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOLBE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the resolution providing military and further humanitarian support for the Contra freedom fighters of Nicaragua.

Let me first state that I have disagreed with President Reagan on certain issues, most relating to agricultural policy. If I was convinced Nicaraguans live under lawful rule and that the present regime posed little threat to its democratic neighbors and eventually the United States, I would cast a "no" vote. But that simply is not the case and I support the President.

Reflecting on previous Contra aid debates I recall that several Members of the House, from both parties, would point to democratic overtones of the Sandinista regime. They used to explain to us that Comandante Ortega and his government did not assist Communist movements, that they allowed free elections, freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and, in general, a pluralistic society.

However, the truth about Nicaragua is now well known and those arguments are no longer faithfully made by my colleagues. In fact, the House appears united in the belief that the Sandinistas are revolutionary Marxist-

Leninists who are guilty of widespread repression and their policies must be changed. We must now decide how best to introduce democracy to this beleaguered nation.

I contend that passing this resolution and adequately assisting the Contras will present the greatest opportunity for democratic reform in Nicaragua. Negotiations between the Sandinistas and Contras are important, but we should not expect the Communists to relinquish power, share power, or institute democracy without significant military pressure from the opposition.

By helping the Contras, who are willing to fight for their freedom, we will also lessen the chance that America will be forced to directly intervene militarily. Use of United States fighting forces would be unpopular both in the United States and Latin America and probably would not further the ongoing movement toward democracy in the region.

Some think we should not worry about a small, poor nation even if they may be a Soviet client state. However, I feel the Soviet Union, Cuba, Bulgaria, Libya, the PLO, North Korea, Vietnam, Czechoslovakia, Iran, and East Germany are not pouring weapons and military and civilian personnel into Nicaragua for nothing. They have a great stake in the outcome of the civil war. As Col. Muammar Qadhafi said in a September 1, 1984, New York Times article, "Libyan fighters, arms, and backing to the Nicaraguan people have reached them because they fight with us. They fight America on its own ground."

I guess the questions we will soon answer are: Is it proper for free people who cherish liberty and all its benefits to sit idly by and overlook the totalitarian mistreatment of their fellow men? Or are they responsible to help those willing to risk everything to ultimately live in, or if necessary, die with dignity?

Let's do what's right and give freedom and democracy a chance in Nicaragua.

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Chairman, I rise today, near the close of this lengthy debate with full knowledge that almost everything has been said. This debate, while it has not always been enlightening or elevating, is what the democratic process is all about. It is good, not only for this body, but for our country, to have a full and vigorous discussion of an issue of this magnitude. There is room for legitimate disagreement in a democracy—and I would hope that none of us, on either side of this issue—would question the motives, the integrity, or the patriotism of our colleagues who may differ with us.

I stand here today in the hope that I might bring a slightly different perspective to this issue that we have been hearing in the main, for the last 24 hours. I was undecided on this question until the beginning of this week. I did oppose military aid that was requested last year.

Now, I have come to a different conclusion, in part because of a visit I made to the region over the weekend. But let me make one point very clearly: I don't believe one goes to Nicaragua for 24 hours—or even 24 days or 24 months—and comes back knowing everything or seeing everything in black and white. I went to Nicaragua on the razor edge of decision, and returned with a nudge to one side.

So what did I see and hear that caused me to decide that military assistance is the best alternative available?

Yes, I did see Soviet helicopter gunships, but no, I didn't see any Cuban pilots or Soviet technicians. I didn't expect them to show me their military buildup or have me interview Cuban military commanders.

But I did meet with Vice President Sergio Ramirez. In answer to my direct question he said there were virtually no circumstances short of surrender, that his government would ever negotiate with the opposition forces. Mr. Chairman, peace in this region requires negotiations, not just between the United States and Nicaragua, but also with the opposition within that country that remains bitterly opposed to the tyranny of a Communist government.

We met with Cardinal Obando y Bravo. He did not wave the American flag or sing our national anthem. But he did tell us in vivid terms how the Catholic church is being persecuted in his country and his fear that Nicaraguans will not be permitted to express their religious beliefs.

And yes, we met with members of the Permanent Commission on Human Rights, a group founded during the Somoza regime to monitor human rights violations. And no, they didn't tell us that the opposition forces—the Contras—are saints. But they did say that human rights violations by the Sandinista government are far more widespread, systematic and sinister.

We met with business and labor leaders. No, they didn't tell us that they want to replicate the U.S. economic model in Nicaragua. But they did say that they want free unions and the right to make choices in the marketplace.

I return from this visit with a couple of impressions that I want to share with my colleagues. One, there are no simple, no clear cut moral choices in Central America. The opposition forces in the field are not the ideal opposition. But it strikes me as paradoxical to suggest that we shouldn't train these forces because they are ill-disciplined and have committed acts outside the accepted rules of warfare.

If they had training they would be better led and better disciplined. And we should remember that they are only part of the opposition—the field force of an opposition that includes labor leaders and church leaders, human rights activists and newspaper publishers.

Two, the Sandinista government in Nicaragua is a hardcore, Marxist-Leninist regime. No amount of whitewash will cover that up. Even the slight bow to democracy with opposition political parties and the vestige of a free press is entirely consistent with that conclusion. They are a threat to stability in the region and the United States has every right to be concerned for our security and that of Central America.

Third, if we don't give aid, we will not have this debate next year. That conclusion is a stark one, but inevitable. Two years with no military assistance to speak of, pitted against literally hundreds of millions of dollars of arms and weapons that have flowed from Cuba and the Soviet Union, has left the opposition forces on the ropes. It is now—this year—or not at all.

Mr. Chairman, on our return to the United States, we stopped in El Salvador and met with President Jose Napoleon Duarte. What El Salvador and President Duarte proves is that revolutionary economic and social change can take place in the democratic context. President Duarte said to us that the Nicaraguan experience has accelerated the democratic process in Latin America, that the "domino theory of democracy" is sweeping this region of the world.

The question that we must ask ourselves is simply this: Will the domino of democracy fall across Nicaragua?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURPHY]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in opposition to the President's request for $100 million in aid to the Contra rebels.

No one doubts that the Sandinista government is a Communist supported regime. The departure from reality is made, however, when one assumes that this poses an inherent threat to the United States. The fact is: an impoverished, rural, and debt plagued country of less than 3 million people with a smaller armed forces than the police presence in the District of Columbia is no threat to U.S. security.

Political philosophy is not and should not be a precondition of relations. We have maintained close ties with many Communist regimes. China, Poland, Yugoslavia, Romania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, North Korea, East Germany, and the U.S.S.R. all have strong diplomatic ties to the United States and some have even been granted favored trade status. There are benefits in understanding the dynamics of international relations and striving for international cooperation.

Our experience in Vietnam should have taught us of the limitations in trying to topple any regime that is deemed to be politically unacceptable. But the administration seems determined to lead us down that horrid road again. The scenario is all too familiar: A request for aid to assist the rebels followed by a request for advisers to complement the aid and leading eventually to a request for troops to protect our advisers and our investment. We spent 50,000 lives and a trillion dollars in defense of democracy in Vietnam. Yet, when we left there was still no democracy and still no threat to our national interest.

At least in Vietnam there was early support for our involvement. But today, our polls, our letters and our phone calls related the same message: don't waste our tax dollars on an unwinnable war.

What is more, there is not even support for the aid from our friends in the region. Those who border on Nicaragua don't want us funding the Contras. The President cites a USIA poll taken last July that claimed 69 percent in Central America favored the aid. A poll taken last week by the Tico Times in Costa Rica, however, severely mitigates those outdated numbers. This most recent poll concludes that only 39 percent are now in favor of the aid.

There is another issue that concerns me, Mr. Chairman. At a time that we are being forced to cut vital domestic programs, such as revenue sharing, job training and education, it is preposterous to even think of handing over this sum to a group of ragtag guerrillas without the slightest hope of furthering U.S. interests or democracy in Central America.

The United States has already poured over $250 million to the Contra cause and gotten no results. It is time we reevaluate our priorities and invest in programs that help our people at home.

This Nation is faced with a $2 trillion national debt. We are paying $150 billion a year on interest for that debt. But, for the first time in the Reagan Presidency we are seriously considering deficit reduction measures. Are these initiatives to be forgotten in light of an imagined Communist threat in Nicaragua?

Economic reality dictates that in order to provide an additional $100 million in aid to the Contras: We will be forced to borrow more money, add to the national debt, pay a great percentage of the budget toward interest payments and pass the entire fiasco on to our children. Future generations of Americans should not be forced to finance the military ventures of today.

The administration claims that no new moneys will be required. All that will be needed, they claim, is a transfer of funds already appropriated. Well, if there is an extra $100 million laying around the Pentagon someplace, I can think of a hundred better ways to spend it.

That $100 million would restore the housing subsistence for 100,000 Americans. It would fund general revenue sharing in my district for 12 years. It would restore half of the Reagan cut in low-income weatherization. It would restore funding for rural waste water disposal grants.

My district has three times as many unemployed workers than there are Contra rebels, $100 million would go a long way toward helping these Americans get back on their feet. For example, that money could be used to fund trade adjustment assistance for 2 years. It would restore the Reagan cut in the Vocational Rehabilitation Program or half of the proposed cut in higher education categorical programs.

There are countless other important domestic programs that have been subjected to severe cutbacks in light of our commitment to deficit reduction. UDAG, EDA, Amtrak, library assistance, juvenile justice grants and many more have seen the administration's knife. Given the financial realities that face us today, can aid to the Contra rebels be truly justified?

Mr. Chairman, conscience dictates that we apply these tax dollars where they can really make a difference—back at home.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, my time is very limited so I want to quickly preface my remarks by thanking all of my constituents back home that have been so sincere in sharing their viewpoints over the past several weeks. I also want to thank my colleagues on both sides for being sincere throughout this debate.

Notwithstanding the sincerity of this great body, however, some today want to cast their vote to make Daniel Ortega cry uncle, while others want to cast their vote to make the President of the United States cry uncle by making him come back in April for another vote. Well, today I want to associate my remarks with a different type of uncle. I want to talk about Uncle Sam and what this vote means for our country.

The whole world is watching us today to see whether or not, once again, we will in a very weak-kneed way, back off and not do what we know in our hearts is right. I have a 17-year-old son, and on this day in 1896, the marines landed in Nicaragua.

On this day in 1986, I am going to vote "yes" to keep my son out of Nicaragua.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Tennessee [Mrs. LLOYD].

□ 1215

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote against House Joint Resolution 540 today so that we can allow consideration of an alternative policy that we can debate and legislatively bound on this issue.

More than 160 years ago, John Quincy Adams, then Secretary of State, drafted a document which is the heart of our discussion today. This document was the Monroe Doctrine. It was a simple message and it was a simple warning: That was that the United States of America would take an active interest in the American Hemisphere.

This warning is really what we are debating today; that we will not tolerate the intervention of foreign powers in our own backyard. If we are going to assist in bringing to an end the conflict in Central America, if we are going to end the threat of communism, then what steps are best, what steps are necessary?

I think that is a real issue; what is best for America, not whether we are against or for the President. I think it is in the best interests of America to work out a compromise that would allow for any military assistance provided for the Contras to be fenced in for a brief period, perhaps 30 to 45 days. This would allow sufficient time for President Duarte to pursue his peace initiative and press for a regional summit.

However, should the negotiations not occur, should the Nicaraguans refuse to participate in diplomatic processes, then our process, our response should be automatic.

Once the time period has passed, the President should be free to certify the release of Contra aid funds approved by the Contras.

Last Saturday morning, Mr. Chairman, I met with President Ascona of Honduras. I asked him for his views on the delays, and his response was direct: He said:

A small period of waiting after any legislation has passed would be very helpful for the negotiations. The negotiations of a political settlement with Nicaragua.

President Ascona was frank and to the point. While preoccupied with the internal situation he expressed his concern.

I urge my colleagues to vote no and to vote for the alternative.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON].

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKELTON. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. McCANDLESS.]

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Chairman, the most important critical ingredient in any political movement is the composition and identity of the men who lead it: The United Nicaraguan Opposition, who they are, and where do they come from.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said about the opposition forces in Nicaragua, a great deal of which is misinformation and inaccurate, such as the assertion that the opposition movement is nothing more than Somoza sympathizers and former members of the Somoza national guard, attempting to return to power. For this reason, I feel the need to share with my colleagues some background information on the leadership, composition, and organization of what has been referred to as the Contras, now unified under the banner of the United Nicaraguan Opposition.

The membership of the United Nicaraguan Opposition includes:

Nicaraguan Democratic Force [FDN]: The largest of the freedom fighter groups, the FDN is a fighting force of 18,000 to 22,000 men and women, 25 percent of whom are former Sandinistas. Their leader is Adolfo Calero.

Revolutionary Nicaraguan Armed Forces [FARN]: Led by former Sandinista Fernando Chamorro, who had fought Somoza since 1960, FARN has about 1,000 fighters and operates in southeastern Nicaragua.

United Villages of the Nicaraguan Atlantic Coast [KISAN]: An alliance of Miskito, Sumo, and Rama Indians, and English-speaking black Creoles, KISAN is a new organization made up of previously independent guerrilla groups. They have about 4,000 armed fighters and over 100,000 civilian members. Its military commanders are Raul Tobias and Wycliffe Diego, and its civilian leader is an Indian named Roger Hermann. Leader of the black Creoles within KISAN is the Reverend Jenelee Hodgson.

Nicaraguan Opposition Coordinator [CON]: A coalition of civilian political parties, business organizations, and trade unions in exile. This represents the vast majority of the non-Communist political leadership of Nicaragua, much of which had formerly been aligned with the Sandinistas.

The UNO directors are:

Adolfo Calero-Portocarrero: A graduate of Notre Dame who did graduate work in industrial management at the University of Syracuse, and holds a law degree from the University of Central America in Nicaragua. In the late 1950's, Mr. Calero became manager of the Coca-Cola Co., of Nicaragua. In the 1970's he was one of the founders of the Authentic Conservative Party, and in 1978 he was his party's representative in the Broad Opposition Front [FAO]. He was jailed along with other FAO leaders for initiating a general strike that shook the Somoza regime.

Arturo Cruz-Porras: A longtime member of the Democratic Conservative Party. He holds graduate and undergraduate degrees from Georgetown University. He was twice jailed by Somoza. He was a member of the Sandinista junta for 9 months, and served as Nicaragua's Ambassador to the United States from June to December 1981. He resigned that post in protest over the growing Marxist-Leninist totalitarian tendencies of the Sandinistas.

Alfonso Robelo-Callejas: A chemical engineer who served as director of the University of Central America from 1970 to 1972, and was president of the Nicaraguan Chamber of Commerce until 1975. Following the assassination of La Prensa editor Pedro Chamorro, Mr. Robelo founded the Nicaraguan Democratic Movement [MDN], a political party of businessmen, industrialists, and professionals opposed to the Somoza regime.

The military forces of the FDN—under the UNO—are led by:

Enrique Bermudez-Varela: He served in the national guard under Somoza, but was cleared of "war crimes" by the Sandinista regime in December 1982. He has described himself as a professional soldier and, under Somoza, not interested in politics. He is a graduate of the Nicaraguan Military Academy and received training at the U.S Army Command and General Staff College and the U.S. Army School of the Americas. During the last years of the Somoza regime, Bermudez served in Washington as defense attaché at the Embassy of Nicaragua. The Carter administration supported Bermudez as a military expert with no ties to the Somoza regime, who would have made an excellent leader of the post-Somoza Nicaraguan Armed Forces.

The leader of the Revolutionary Nicaraguan Armed Forces [FARN]:

Fernando "El Negro" Chamorro-Rappaccioli: He has been a prominent anti-Somoza figure since the 1940's. He participated in numerous military actions against the dictator and was repeatedly jailed or exiled by Somoza. In 1979 he fought on the southern front with the Sandinistas. The increasingly Communist nature of the Sandinistas, and the absence of any effort to carry out the democratic goals of the revolution, drove him into exile in 1982.

The leader of the Nicaraguan Indian and Creole Leaders [KISAN]:

Wycliffe Diego: A Miskito Indian leader from the Atlantic coast town of Puerto Cabezas, he was a Moravian pastor and was jailed by Somoza in 1971, for allegedly being a Communist. He has a reputation for effectiveness and honesty.

These are dedicated people who are putting their lives on the line to bring about what their revolution was originally designed to accomplish—the implementation of democratic institutions in Nicaragua. They need and deserve our support.

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKELTON. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALLON].

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Chairman, I urge bipartisan support for the President's proposed compromise.

Nicaragua is an increasingly totalitarian regime determined to consolidate its power and subvert the political independence and territorial integrity of the neighboring countries in the region.

In Nicaragua, there must be a reconciliation of differences that separate the government from the democratic opposition. The Sandinista government must be willing to sit down and negotiate in earnest with its own people.

I believe that the Executive order offered by the President in response to congressional concerns, outlining new conditions on aid to the Contras, offers a constructive alternative. It includes a 90-day delay in military assistance and full cooperation of a bipartisan commission established by Congress to report directly to the Congress on negotiations. This compromise demonstrates to the American people that we are diligently pursuing reasonable possibilities for a regionally based political solution.

I am convinced we cannot negotiate with a Communist-supported Marxist regime in Nicaragua without applying pressure, and I believe this compromise proposal shows the world and this Nation that we are presenting the Nicaraguan Government with a clear alternative to a prolonged conflict. I urge bipartisan support for the President's compromise proposal.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the proposal that is before us today. I do so as one who voted for the humanitarian aid the last time, and against the military assistance the last time.

I do so based upon the agreement that has been worked out with others, especially the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CHANDLER] and myself, and I do this because it is a workable solution to the problem that is ahead of us.

It is based upon a proposed Executive order. We asked for certain things to be addressed, and they were. We asked about human rights; we asked about negotiations, having a last chance; we asked about humanitarian aid and holding off military aid for 90-days, and during that 90 days we suggested that there be training and of course air defense.

We asked for a commitment to Central America and to a policy based upon the Henry Jackson report. We also asked that all resistance forces be included.

Mr. Chairman, this is what we have accomplished. We want to give negotiations one more chance, and this we have succeeded in having.

I would be remiss if I did not say at this juncture that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY] was very helpful in this work; he and I agree on so many aspects of it; disagreeing, I believe, on the vehicle on which we reach the same goal.

I would like to very briefly review what we have accomplished in the negotiations and agreement with the White House. That humanitarian assistance would be given immediately, and that other assistance would be withheld for 90 days following approval of this request.

That immediately, equipment and supplies for defense air attack would be supplied. That support for democratic, political, and diplomatic activities be given. That immediate training be given.

Following the 90 day period, additional types of assistance would be provided to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance only if it has been determined after consultation with Congress that the Central American countries have not concluded a comprehensive agreement, that the Government of Nicaragua has not engaged in serious dialog, and that there is no reasonable prospect of achieving these developments through further diplomatic measures and that there has been a report to Congress.

Also, that there is a commission established to make the reports to the Congress on a bipartisan basis.

We have also included in this an agreement to require assistance to human rights. Also, we have stopped receipt of any assistance by those who violate human rights or involve themselves in drug smuggling.

This is one that involves an equal proportion of assistance to the Indian groups as well as to others.

Mr. Chairman, this body seems polarized on this issue, but it is not the first time that this body has been polarized over Central America. The first time was back in the early 1800's when Henry Clay was the Speaker. The great decision at that time was whether to endorse freedom from the Spanish rule for those countries in Central and South America.

After a long and bitter debate, the House came down on the side of freedom for those countries. We set a precedent then that has been maintained ever since.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HUBBARD].

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Chairman, some of those who are very enthusiastic about $100 million in aid to the Contras of Nicaragua like to paint the opponents as liberal Democrats or liberal Republicans who are apparently not worried about the spreading of communism in Central America.

This Congressman is a Democrat who frequently votes with President Reagan and who met with the President in the Oval Office on Wednesday of last week for 25 minutes.

I'm a Democrat who genuinely likes and admires our President.

Some of you consider this Kentucky Democrat a hawk on defense issues—and I am.

I represent Fort Campbell, KY, home of the 101st Airborne Division, Air Assault, and several of my constituents are employed at Fort Knox, KY.

If this country ever goes to war again, among the most valued troops first to be called upon would be Fort Campbell's 21,000 soldiers.

Last Sunday night my wife Carol and I watched with interest the President's speech.

The whole awkward rationale for the $100 million in aid for the Contras was summed up in a few arresting sentences.

I quote our President:

> Clearly the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact have grasped the stakes involved, the strategic importance of Nicaragua. The Soviets have made their decision—to support the Communists. Fidel Castro has made his decision—to support the Communists. Arafat, Qadhafi, and the Ayatollah Khomeini have made their decision—to support the Communists. Now we must make our decision.

An elderly lady at Beaver Dam, KY, asked me last Monday morning: "Gee whiz, are Arafat, Qadhafi, and the Ayatollah really concerned about Nicaragua?"

Let's be serious. If I thought the United States were actually faced with the kind of armed threat and refugee invasion pictured by our President, I assure you $100 million in aid to these Contras waging a losing battle in Nicaragua would not be appropriate for us to be considering today. The use of U.S. troops would be the issue of the day if our security were actually threatened.

The foreign ministers of eight Latin American nations—known as the Contadora group—visited with Secretary of State George Shultz here in Washington last month to ask that their Contadora process be given a chance to work. The nations at the meeting were Mexico, Colombia, Panama, Venezuela, Argentina, Brazil, Peru, and Uruguay. These eight countries plead with you and me today to give the pursuit of the Contadora process a chance to bring about a meaningful, lasting peace in Central America.

This is my 12th year in Congress. During all this time and through seven administrations Fidel Castro has led a Communist regime just 90 miles from Key West, FL. They haven't attacked us yet.

No one advocates today sending $100 million in military and economic aid to anti-Castro Cubans.

Let's establish economic improvements and not war in Central America so that democracy will be the chosen form of government in Nicaragua and all of Central America.

Please vote "no" today.

□ 1225

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA].

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURTHA. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the pending resolution to provide military assistance and other assistance to the Contras in Nicaragua. Now I would like to say by way of preface here that all of us recognize that there are deeply and sincerely held differences of opinion on how to approach this matter. I take no issue with any of my colleagues. I have certainly no quarrel with the rationale by which they try to solve their dilemma. I reached my decision based on my own conclusion, observations, and analyses. In the last administration I was one of the congressional leaders to help put through a program of assistance to the new government in Nicaragua to try to help undo 40 years of misery with which the United States had at least a little something to do. I am not ready to give us all of the blame. But nevertheless, it was an unfortunate experience. There were people in the hills for years and years and years who fought against the dictatorship of Somoza. And when a new government came in, all of those people who were part of the revolution of Somoza thought a new day had come, that there finally was the opportunity to bring democratic processes to the people of Nicaragua. Those of us who visited Managua at that time, who took the lead in this House to extend the hand of friendship to that new government, found out very quickly where that government was coming from. They cut us off at the elbow.

Their concern was not for democratic processes or carrying out their statements on which the revolution was predicated, but simply to consolidate Communist power. I guarantee you they followed the handbook paragraph by paragraph on how to consolidate Communist power, how to subjugate the people and get rid of all opposition.

Many of the people who fought and were part of the revolution against Somoza, and started out being part of the new government in Nicaragua, were frozen out. They were forced to quit. Their whole being was shattered by virtue of the fact that the revolution they had fought for had been subverted beyond any question.

That is my conclusion also after having talked to every single member of the Directorate, either down there in Managua or up here in the United States, and to every single member of the junta, and after having talked to the leaders of all of the democratic elements that were part of the fight to get rid of Somoza.

And they all say unanimously, "We did not fight to get rid of Somoza to wind up with a Communist goverment subjugating our people." And where are those leaders? They are out in the hills again. They are called all kinds of names, Contras, counterrevolutionaries, whatever you want to call them. But the first guy was Pastora. He fought Somoza with a ragtag outfit and with no apparent support from anybody. People said he would never win. But he was part of that revolution, and he was part of the new government. He is back in the hills fighting again.

He told me personally, "I will fight for as long as it takes, with or without anybody's help, because this is not what I fought for, this is not what the Nicaraguan people are entitled to. They are entitled to something better than this." The same is true for, Robello and for Colero, and for Cruz.

The thing that really brought down Samoza was the assassination of Chamorro—from one of the principal families of Nicaragua and who ran the free press—and now that family is right down the middle. Now, ever since we had to cut off our assistance—which was designed to be friendly and establish a new relationship with this new government—absolutely nothing has happened in terms of democratic processes, with or without force, with or without diplomacy. I have come to the conclusion the only way we are going to get any kind of talk at all, if indeed we can, is to go to the two-track approach. And to do that military assistance in a serious way is absolutely essential. That is where I come down.

In conclusion, let me say, and I thank the gentleman for yielding, unfortunately there will be no victory here today by one vote, or two votes, or three votes, or whatever the vote is. This issue is here before us for a long time. And if the Congress is divided and the country is divided, you cannot have a long-term policy to deal with the issue. It is not going to go away. The issue is: Will we have democracy in Nicaragua? We have to do our best to start now to help bring it there.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington has 36 minutes remaining, and the gentleman on the minority side has 32 minutes remaining.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MOODY.]

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution before us today.

I recently met with Lt. Col. Edward L. King, U.S. Army, retired, formerly a combat soldier, Joint Chiefs of Staff military liaison officer to the U.S. delegations to the Inter-American Defense Board, and still an acknowledged expert on military conditions in Central America. For those interested in the military merits of the President's Contra aid package, it might be useful to share Colonel King's observations.

First, the Contras are nowhere near capable of effectively fighting the Sandinista army.

The Sandinistas' so-called irregular warfare battalions are highly trained, highly motivated counterinsurgency soldiers and have had growing success against the Contras. Meanwhile, the United States has invested approximately $130 million in the Contras, yet their actual military capability remains very poor. They have inadequate training, low morale, poor leadership, inappropriate tactics, and no coherent strategy. Another $100 million won't substantially correct these inadequacies. Unless the U.S. commits about $400 million and at least 2 years of intensive military training, the $100 million will be largely wasted.

Second, there are now only small bands of Contras actually fighting in Nicaragua.

Eden Pastora's group fo Contras have been virtually eliminated in southern Nicaragua and their remnants driven back into Costa Rica. In northern and central Nicaragua, all but about 1,000 of the original 12,000 to 14,000 troops have been driven back into camps in Honduras. Those Contras now remaining in Nicaragua are capable of only hit-and-run tactics against chiefly civilian targets.

Third, the President's claim of 20,000 Contras is grossly exaggerated.

There remain only 3,000 to 4,000 highly motivated Contra troops. Most of the larger number counted as Contras by the President include: Dodgers of the unpopular Sandinista draft; Sandinista POW's given the option of becoming Contras or dying; villagers pressed into service by the Contras; teenagers who hear that joining the Contras is a good way to eventually get to the United States; and several hundred, according to Honduran radio reports, unemployed Hondurans looking for work.

Colonel King's cogent observations have strengthened my conviction that President Reagan's Contra policy is fundamentally flawed in five important ways:

First, it is unrealistic. Without massive funding, the Contras will never pose a sufficient military threat to force change in the Sandinista government.

Second, the President's policy plays right into the Sandinistas' hands. It gives them an excuse to continue domestic repression, press censorship, tight economic controls, and the unpopular military draft.

Third, the President's policy alienates our allies in Latin America and Europe. Not one democractically elected government in Europe or Latin America supports U.S. military aid to the Contras.

Fourth, the President's policy inflames and encourages anti-U.S. emotions throughout the region as we are again seen as utilizing "gunboat diplomacy" to promote our aims. Such a policy, which may have worked once upon a time, is perceived as unwelcome confirmation that the United States still wants to substitute force for negotiations in the region—a policy that deeply offends the sense of nationalism and sovereignty held by Central Americans today.

Fifth, the President misdiagnoses the real appeal of revolution in this region: Poverty, illiteracy, and exploitation of the compesinos—made far worse by 5 straight years of falling regional income.

Many of the Nicaraguan people are dissatisfied and resentful of the Sandinista government. But military aid to the Contras fails to tap into that reservoir of feeling, and in fact strengthens the Sandinistas.

I urge all of my colleagues to vote against President Reagan's request.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOWNEY].

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the proposal to provide $100 million in assistance to the Contras. I also oppose the compromise of the President is offering now that it is clear that there is not sufficient support for his original request.

Today, we face a choice, and it is a choice which we have confronted several times over the past 5 years. Will we seek a diplomatic resolution of the crisis in Central America, or will we commit ourselves to military involvement in Central America?

Let us not deceive ourselves, for if we approve $100 million in assistance today—no matter how many Executive orders, no matter how many 90-day windows of negotiation we cloak it in—we will have moved one step closer to a direct military commitment.

Let us not deceive ourselves, for we all know that this aid package will not be enough to bring victory to the Contras—$70 million, $100 million, $200 million will not do the trick. The Contras have been in the field—or as their partisans here like to say—in the hills for several years. Where is the popular support for the Contras? It has not materialized. How much longer must we wait for some sign that the people of Nicaragua support the Contras?

When it comes to the Contras, the only consistency we find is that the administration's means never quite match their stated goals. When we first started our overt covert support for the Contras, it was to interdict the supply of arms to the rebels in El Salvador. Unhappily for the Contras' supporters, no interdicted arms ever surfaced. Our next goal in supporting the Contras was to exert influence on Nicaragua to change its orientation and somehow reduce its dependence on the Soviet Union and Cuba. That did not work. Rather than change the means, the administration changed the goal yet again. Now the goal is to bring the Nicaraguans to the negotiating table. What is clear is that the means never change—just the goal.

Let us not deceive ourselves, Mr. Chairman. The real goal is now, and has always been, the removal—not the reform—of the Nicaraguan Government.

Rather than choosing the path of military involvement, I urge my colleagues to choose the diplomatic path. Let us not deceive ourselves. The diplomatic option has never been fully tried. U.S. diplomats have offered lip service to the Contadora peace process, but the underlying commitment to support the Contadora nations has been lacking.

Last summer, Congress accepted a compromise with the President in return for a letter promising negotiations. But in the succeeding 9 months, there is precious little evidence of the administration's commitment to negotiations. The administration has undercut the Contadora nations. Let us not deceive ourselves. Every time it has appeared that the Contadora nations are nearing a diplomatic breakthrough, the administration rushes in to denigrate their efforts, to point out the shortcomings of the proposed solution. This is not constructive engagement; this is not the way people interested in reaching a negotiated settlement respond to breakthroughs.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that we should be clear about our goals. Our goal is to deny the Soviets an offensive military base in Central America. This is not an impossible goal. Our goal should also be to promote peace in the region. This is a goal which is not incompatible with the first goal.

The question has been raised as to whether we can negotiate from a position of weakness. A position of weakness? The United States and Nicaragua? Where is the weakness in our position? Even if by some stretch of the imagination we concede we are weaker than Nicaragua, how will providing $100 million to the Contras make us stronger? Can we buy strength so inexpensively? Mr. Speaker, we can negotiate with the Nicaraguans and we can do so in a confident and strong manner, and we do not need to give the Contras $100 million to protect our negotiating abilities.

I believe that we can reach these goals by a wholehearted commitment to the Contadora nations' efforts. They have committed a significant amount of their own resources to a peaceful resolution. They are on the frontline. They are willing to trust in a diplomatic solution. Why shouldn't we? Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of House Joint Resolution 540 this afternoon. One hundred million will not bring peace to Central America.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I rise to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL].

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I am touched by the sincerity of the debate today and the high level of information imparted by our Members and especially the previous speaker from Florida, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

I will say to him that I oppose this resolution but I agree with many of the things that he has said. I too went to Nicaragua in 1980 as an emissary to meet with the factions there. However, my views on this issue differ from his largely because I see the Contra army in a much different light. I have a letter which I will submit for the RECORD by Edgar Chamorro, who is a Nicaraguan who opposed Somoza. He later joined the FDN and became one of the directors of the Contra movement until 1984. He became disillusioned with the Contras because, in his words, his letter says, "The Contras do not represent a viable military force, a successful political project, nor an appropriate means for reaching U.S. foreign policy goals in Central America." This former Contra leader says that ultimately it is the Nicaraguans themselves who must resolve this problem and we must put faith in pluralism and democracy to allow it to work in that region.

The letter follows:

WASHINGTON, DC,
March 19, 1986.

Esteemed Members of Congress:

Over the past few days I have spoken with many members of both the House of Representatives and the Senate. As many of you know, I was a member of the national directorate of the FDN, the principal armed group fighting the Saninistas. I am now firmly convinced, based on my experience within the FDN, that the United States should stop its support of the contras and seek a political solution in Nicaragua.

I left Nicaragua in June 1979, just before the ouster of Somoza. I feared the radicalization of the revolution and went to Miami with my family. In exile, I became an organizer of the expatriate Nicaraguan community. In 1982 I was contracted by someone who identified himself as representing the United States government to join the directorate of the FDN. All the leaders of the FDN were similarly handpicked by the CIA to join with the remnants of the old National Guard in the fight against the Sandinistas.

I joined the FDN hoping to bring democracy to Nicaragua. But I realized that this would be impossible within the context of the FDN which is controlled, directed and financed by the CIA. I soon found that we civilians on the directorate had no control over the military. We were simply a democratic facade to convince Congress and the American public of our good intentions. I feel the current civilians associated with the FDN and UNO are being similarly used.

Over time I came to know of the consistent use of terror tactics by the FDN combatants against the civilian population. I criticized these tactics and tried to change them with no success. Ultimately, my break with the FDN came when the CIA produced its now-Infamous "Manual on Psychological Operation" that called for the hiring of professional criminals, selective assassination of government officials, and the creation of martyrs among our own ranks. I tried to delete the more offensive aspects of this manual, but it was distributed over my objections. This experience convinced me that the FDN could never be a democratic organization and by the end of 1984 I left.

All of this history is well known. With time, more revelations will emerge regarding the dirty tricks used by the CIA and the contras to manipulate public opinion in Central America, lobby the U.S. Congress and deceive the public in the United States.

In summary, the contras do not represent a viable military force, a successful political project, nor an appropriate means for reaching U.S. foreign policy goals in Nicaragua. By any standard, the contras have been a failure. Instead of encouraging democracy in Nicaragua, the government has restricted civil liberties in response to military attacks. Rather than halting an arms build-up, the Sandinistas have armed themselves to defend against the contras and threatened U.S. aggression. The contras provide a ready scapegoat for Sandinista economic failures, build international support for a beseiged "David" facing the U.S. "Goliath", and justify the Sandinista's tilt toward Cuba and the Soviet Union.

All of these arguments have been made and heard in this debate. I would like to turn to the future and the options facing the United States and Nicaragua. First, imagine the best case scenario of the Reagan policy. Suppose after years of protracted conflict, thousands more deaths and millions of dollars spent—suppose the contras win. The fighting will not be over. The Sandinistas would fight on from the hills, from neighboring Costa Rica and Honduras—destabilizing fragile democracies. The northern contras would fight the southern contras—because they don't fight for the same reasons. The Miskitus would fight whatever government for their autonomy. In short, you would have the fragmentation—the Lebanonization—of Nicaragua and an increased possibility of regional war.

If the contras win with direct U.S. intervention, then we are back to 1928. Back to the Marines in Nicaragua and the creation of a new Somoza, a new National Guard, and a new Sandino.

Speaking in practical and realistic terms, what would constitute a constructive, positive approach by the United States toward Nicaragua? We must start by acknowledging the positive aspects of the revolution, and grant that revolution the right to exist. There should be no rolling back the revolution. The revolution has brought many positive things to Nicaragua—equality, pride, self-respect, and national dignity—values which America shares and should promote. The United States is, after all, a revolutionary country.

A political solution is still possible in Nicaragua. A genuine opposition exists inside Nicaragua. The United States should encourage and support these internal democrats in a non-military way. Look at the successful example of the Philippines. There the United States supported the internal opposition—not with contras—but with political and moral support. This was very successful.

The United States has a historic opportunity to approach the Nicaraguan problem through its Latin American allies. The Contadora process represents a multilateral, diplomatic approach with great promise for a political solution acceptable to all the countries in the Hemisphere. The foreign ministers of the eight countries of Contadora and the Support Group made an exceptional plea to the United States when they came to Washington; a plea for restraint, understanding, and time to work out a solution. To ignore this gesture is to invite disaster.

The United States is the dominant political, military and economic power in the region. As a great power it can afford to be magnanimous with its smaller, weaker neighbors. It is inarguable that if the United States faces a security threat in the Hemisphere it must act with resolve and strength to face that threat. But even if Nicaragua could be construed as a security threat, certainly the contras are not an appropriate response.

Nicaragua is a local political problem that can best be handled by local politicians. The first step toward a political solution is to create an atmosphere of trust and mutual respect. The key here is to end U.S. support of the contras and stop the war.

At the same time, we must demand concessions from the Nicaraguans. The security concerns of the United States regarding the presence of foreign military bases and advisors and support for subversion must be addressed by the Sandinistas. Internally there must be a restoration of civil rights, extension of amnesty to the leaders of the contras and the guarantee of safe passage back to Nicaragua for the purpose of organizing political parties and pursuing any public office. There must be assurance of a true mixed economy without fear of retaliation or confiscation, a genuine commitment to cultural and political pluralism, and respect for the rule of law.

Ultimately it is we Nicaraguans who must live together. This will require concessions on both sides. We must reduce the polarization affecting U.S. policy toward Nicaragua and encourage political moderates. The current policy does the opposite.

Sincerely,

EDGAR CHAMORRO.

Mr. Chairman, President Reagan's proposal facing Congress today is the best example so far of his shoot-first-ask-questions-later diplomacy.

While the President has said on several occasions that he supports negotiations to resolve the issues in Central America, the fact is his administration over the past 5 years has repeatedly frustrated the efforts of the Latin American nations to resolve regional conflicts through diplomacy.

Mr. Chairman, the leaders of nearly every American ally in Latin America and Europe and Japan has voiced opposition to Mr. Reagan's militarization of Central America.

Former Venezuelan President Carlos Andres Perez said that any attempt to find a "military solution to the conflict in Central America would bring regional warfare, in which the United States could not win, and Latin America could not win." In his opinion only the Soviets would benefit.

President de la Madrid of Mexico has said that United States policy was causing "anger and resentment" toward the United States among its Latin neighbors, while President Betancur of Colombia has repeatedly pleaded with the United States to abandon military intervention and use its great power to support the efforts of the Latin nations to solve their own problems from within the region.

President Alfonsin of Argentina, who credits the saving of his own life to the human rights policies of the United States under President Carter, came to Washington last year to personally tell President Reagan that "dialog, not intervention" would cause democracy to flourish in Central America. Add to this list the Presidents of Costa Rica and Uruguay, the Prime Minister of Spain, the President of France, the Pope, the new President of Guatemala, and the President of Peru.

Mr. Chairman, it is so sad to look at Nicaragua through the eyes of Latin America and see that it is the United States policies of militarization which are the instruments of chaos in Central America. It is the view of our Latin neighbors that it is the Reagan administration which is standing in the way of a genuine regional effort to resolve the conflict in Central America.

Mr. Chairman, can it be true that the nation of Nicaragua—one of the poorest nations in the world, a nation most of whose citizens are below the age of 18, and whose total population is less than half that of Tennessee—can completely thwart the will of all of its neighbors including that of the greatest nation on Earth? I do not believe that is true.

I trust the leaders of Latin America when they say there is a chance for a negotiated settlement. I am embarrassed when President Reagan says the Sandinistas will not negotiate in good faith when at the same time the nations of Latin America continue even as we speak to be engaged in a constructive and meaningful dialog with the Government of Nicaragua. I look at the diplomatic agreement the Costa Ricans and the Nicaraguans have recently implemented, and it is clear that given time, patience and earnest support from the Reagan administration, the United States can persevere. We have everything to gain through diplomacy, and everything to lose through the reckless use of our military might.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, let me turn to a second point that every one of us must consider in light of the budgetary crisis our Nation now faces.

Mr. Chairman, during the past 5 years the United States has spent $3.4 billion in bilateral foreign and military assistance to Central America. Add to that another $2.4 billion in 1986 and 1987; add to that another $21 million for military bases in Honduras; add more for training excercises, and add even more in overt and covert assistance for the Contras. It is an enormous price tag for a policy that seems at best to be without goal or purpose.

My concern about this costly policy is that it has achieved vitually nothing. The President's request for another hundred million dollars is a proposal for throwing good money after bad—more and more money for a policy we know is doomed to failure. It did not work in Vietnam. It has not worked in Central America.

During the past 2 months I have spent much of my time working with the people of my district helping them prepare for the impact of Gramm-Rudman. Unemployment in several of my counties now exceeds 20 percent, while the farm economy has reached levels equal to that of the Great Depression.

When I see so many people of my district struggling just to make ends meet, I cannot justify a vote to commit more American resources to a foreign adventure so unmistakably marked for failure.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, what is the division on time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has 32 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Washington has 35 minutes remaining.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLINGER].

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Chairman, today I will be voting in favor of the $100 million aid package before us. I have, in the past, voted against military aid to the Contras because it was offered in the absence of a coherent, rational, long-term policy for Nicaragua as well as for the Central American region. There has been confusion over whether we are intent on overthrowing the Sandinista regime, or on taking an active role with the Contadora countries in negotiations between the warring factions in Nicaragua. The aid package alone does not offer any opportunity for reconciliation, however, the bipartisan compromise embodied in the President's Executive order to allow a period of 90 days for negotiations forms a workable, reasonable outline for United States strategy in Nicaragua and represents the first step toward democracy in that country without immediately resorting to military action.

I believe the key provision of this compromise is the requirement that a special envoy be dispatched to the Contadora nations to begin the negotiations. The nations making up the Contadora group—Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama, once shared the problems that currently afflict their neighbors in Central America—their understanding of the social and political problems there is more acute than our own. These four, along with the Central American countries, are the key actors in Latin America, the ones to whom America's strategic interests turn. The Contadora group warns the United States of the disastrous long-term consequences a military invasion would have on our relations with Latin America. The group also points out the long-term benefits of an enhanced American standing in the region if we resolutely commit ourselves to negotiations. All four governments are firmly anti-Communist and unwilling to see an expansion of Soviet influence on the mainland of the Western Hemisphere. This commitment to the Contadora process and the $2 million earmarked for the Central American democracies will bring us that much closer to national reconciliation.

Should, after 90 days, the Sandinistas choose to reject the United States and Contadora efforts, and fail to show good faith in implementing the conditions stated in the Executive order, the President would then, in the face of such intransigence, release the $70 million in military aid.

Mr. Chairman, it is my fervent and sincere hope that the President will never have to resort to this action. But, if the Nicaraguan Government is unwilling to sit down and negotiate with its own people, then Nicaragua, not the United States, should be held up to the international community as the obstacle to peace and reconciliation.

The status of our future relations with Latin America will in large part be determined by the decision Congress makes on this aid package. Let us today show Central Americans and the world that our commitment to pluralist democracy and economic development is genuine by working to implement a cease fire in Nicaragua as called for in the compromise and begin negotiations toward an eventual political settlement.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS].

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, I speak to all of the American people and, according to the polls, I speak for 58 percent of the American people. You need not wait until tomorrow to read this debate. You can read it on every day of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the Vietnam war, you can read the same debate in the Lebanon blunder.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN] has quoted President Reagan as saying, "Absolutely, no Americans will be sent, no American flyers" et cetera.

Let me read you a quotation from President Reagan on October 25, 1962, just in case you are interested to know what the President will do when this so-called Contra force fails, as everybody in this Chamber knows it must fail on its own with or without our financial aid—this is what President Reagan said in 1962:

> Can any of us deny when we abandoned the 1,500 Cuban fighters in the Bay of Pigs that we turned our back on their suffering and the fact that they were dying in prison because we were willing to sacrifice honor in order to avoid unpleasantness?

"Unpleasantness," what a euphemism for the kind of slaughter our young men suffered in Lebanon. Lebanon was to save this country in its vital hour of need. So it was argued in the case of Vietnam, in World War I, to "make the world safe for democracy."

Mr. Chairman, and the 58 percent of the American people who have learned the lesson of history, if this country ever gets involved in a war again, let it be because we have to, not just because we have a chance to.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, as we engage in the final moments of debate over the President's request for military aid to the Contra resistence in Nicaragua, let each of us refrain from such exaggeration and rhetorical excess that we would seek to mislead those yet uncommitted on the issue, and inadvertantly fall into the trap of engaging in the same polarized extremism which has all too often characterized the politics of our Latin American friends who themselves now search for the political center.

To those uncommitted on the issue, let me note first of all that the divisions between both sides of this issue are not as great as our own rhetoric would have us believe. If we compare the President's statement of Sunday last with the response on behalf of the Democratic Party offered by Senator SASSER, we note that both acknowledge the present regime in Nicaragua to be Marxist in character, that both acknowledge the export of revolution and terrorism from that country, and that both acknowledge the appropriateness of discussing aid to the Nicaraguan resistence. What does distinguish the two positions is the issue of waiting up to 6 months before releasing such assistance, in order to allow yet one more opportunity for a negotiated settlement both within Nicaragua and between Nicaragua and its neighbors. And now even this difference has apparently been resolved.

Mr. Chairman, during the recent task force visit to Central America, of which I was a part, the nine Members of Congress met with Nicaraguan Vice President Sergio Ramirez Mercado. I asked him during that meeting why Nicaragua was the only Central American government unwilling to sign the Contadora treaty proposal. His direct response was, and I quote verbatim, "We won't get anywhere if we debate this issue. I prefer simple answers to simple questions."

Why, then, should we release these funds as immediately as possible? First, to add military pressure to the efforts to secure a negotiated settlement in the face of such intransigence. Second, to add risk viability to those who courageously resist this regime, be it militarily or from within the civil resistance.

But there is yet an even more important consequence and significance to our vote on this matter today. In Central America, we have the tale of two cities, two nations, which have experienced two very different types of revolutions. And the differing character of each of these revolutions has profound impact on the current struggle between those committed to and those opposed to the dream of freedom for the Latin American peoples.

These two revolutions are as strikingly different as the English Revolution of the 17th century, and the French Revolution of the 18th century. In the one—as in El Salvador—the necessity of mediating social change through democratic political institutions is recognized as central to the ultimate character of its final result. In the other—as in Nicaragua—the end is elevated above the means. And the "liberators" have subsequently become the new "oppressors."

Mr. Chairman, our constituents are not particularly sensitive to the critical nature of this distinction. Nor for that matter have we been as sensitive as we ought in acknowledging its importance. But our Latin American friends have been—and they look to us for a sign as to where we stand on the issue. The Nicaraguan resistance looks to us in desperate hope of reclaiming a revolution betrayed. And its neighbors wonder whether it is worth the while to stand firm against those who, while using the language of democracy, use tyrannical means to reach their ends.

The assistance to the resistance within Nicaragua is not only a matter of supporting the forces for democratic change within that country, but a signal of profound diplomatic significance sent throughout the region. And it has direct implications for the democratic revolution in El Salvador which needs an opportunity to consolidate its gains against subversion from abroad.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, it is we, the American people, who are being tested. Can we continue to be passive in the face of Communist subversion in the region? Can we permit our own ignorance of world affairs, or our preoccupation with profoundly important domestic concerns, to allow the Soviet bloc to operate with relative impunity and without cost in destablizing the fledging steps of infant democracies in the region?

As we close our debate, Mr. Chairman, regardless of the outcome of this vote, let us speak honorably and respectfully of those with whom we disagree on the choice before us. And as such, let us seek to move forward together in the continued quest to honor the ideals of freedom both in our own land and abroad.

□ 1240

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MAVROULES].

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, profound changes have come about in Latin America during the last decade. These changes have come through peaceful means. They have been brought about by ballots not by bullets.

This map, distributed by our State Department, vividly portrays the massive movement throughout this hemisphere toward democratic societies.

Ten years ago, most of the southern tilt of our hemisphere was dominated by military dictatorship of the right or the left. They are portrayed in brown.

Today, by the patient application of peaceful dialog and constitutional process, 90 percent of the inhabitants of Latin America live under constitutional systems.

Not one of these changes was brought about by U.S military intervention—nor by our financing violent overthrow of existing governments. Our Latin American friends tell us that would have been counterproductive. The people who live in these democracies insist that we can help the cause of democracy not by financing invasion and violent efforts to stain their lands red with blood, but rather by the process of negotiation and reason.

We must understand, just as in Lebanon, our well-intentioned but clumsy efforts to direct events by force of arms bred only resentment and hatred of the United States by these people. If we wanted to influence these people in the right direction we would heed the leaders who understand the mores, the sensitivities, the conditions and the great underlying strengths of their own society. We would not do it by presuming the right to dictate from Washington whom they chose to run their own country. Surely we have the right to insist that each such country would leave its neighbor in peace.

Our friends in Latin America insist that this goal can best be achieved by the Contadora process for the things that Latin Americans themselves are anxious to do to promote peace and democracy in the hemisphere and to influence Nicaragua within. As President Duarte and the democratic forces are demonstrating in El Salvador, the future lies not in military conquest but in orderly democratic procedure.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. STUMP].

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 540.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Michel-Murtha resolution to approve the President's request for aid to the Nicaraguan Democratic Resistance. The time has come for all Members of the House to stand and be counted in support of those fighting for freedom and democracy in Nicaragua. The United States must respond effectively to the Communist challenge in Nicaragua.

We can spend the money the President has requested now to help the members of the Nicaraguan Resistance fight for their freedom, or we can abandon them and thereby abandon the only hope for a free Nicaragua. Money spent today will obviate the need to spend much greater sums in future decades to arm our southern border and liberate a Communist Central America.

I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of House Joint Resolution 540 to protect the security interests of the United States and its allies and to help in the fight for a free Nicaragua.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP], who is a member of the Kissinger Commission.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend from Michigan for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, Congress has been debating what to do about Nicaragua each year since 1982. And each year, Communist oppression within Nicaragua has grown, and Soviet-Cuban arms shipments have risen, and the Sandinista government in Managua has reaffirmed several times its solidarity with Havana and Moscow.

Last year we voted to provide $27 million, in humanitarian aid only, to the democratic resistance. At the time, I believed we should have done more, that we should have provided military assistance as well. But the majority supported the limited measure as a last ditch effort at stimulating negotiations, to avoid the need to resume military support.

What has happened since?

In October, all civil liberties were suspended in Nicaragua.

President Duarte's daughter was kidnaped by terrorist guerrillas, and her release had to be negotiated through representatives in Managua. The implied threat behind that act cannot have escaped the attention of the democratic leaders of Central America.

And the resistance forces, in large part, have been forced to retreat into Honduras and Costa Rica, chased by Soviet helicopter gunships.

And so today, President Reagan has come to the Congress with an urgent plea for military assistance for the freedom fighters. Yet many of our colleagues have urged a vote against this request, arguing that our policy should rest entirely on negotiations.

It is easy to stand here and say, "We should talk." Congress excels at talking. But the fact is that we have already tried negotiations. We have talked bilaterally and multilaterally, directly and indirectly, until we are blue in the face. During the Carter administration, we even provided generous economic assistance to the Sandinistas, in the hope that they would fulfill their promises of free elections. All to no avail.

It is clear by now to any person of good faith that the Sandinistas see negotiation as a way to buy more time, further entrench their totalitarian government, and starve out the democratic freedom fighters.

As Jeane Kirkpatrick has written, while they talk, the Sandinistas move "to further consolidate their power over the economy, church, schools, press, military—and all other aspects of Nicaraguan society."

While we negotiate, thousands of Miskito Indians have taken refuge in Honduras, fleeing from aerial bombings and Sandinista gunfire. While we negotiate, the leaders of the Catholic Church in Nicaragua are threatened with state censorship. The tiny Jewish minority in Nicaragua is facing religious persecution. And political prisoners are jailed for daring to speak out about Sandinista repression.

In its military and political campaign against the democratic opposition, the Communist government seeks to destroy the Contras and to intimidate the population into submission. Their task becomes much easier if the Contras are given no means with which to fight and the people see nothing but talk out of the United States.

The Contras cannot sustain themselves with our words. They cannot continue without our help. And if they go, Nicaragua loses any hope for a democratic future.

And I wish the opponents of this bill would tell us what to do when the Marxist-Leninist Sandinistas turn their large military forces against neighboring countries to pursue what they call "the revolution without borders"? I served on the Bipartisan Commission on Central America, and I would like to quote its report:

The Commission encountered no leader in Central America, including democratic and unarmed Costa Rica, who did not express deep foreboding about the impact of a militarized, totalitarian Nicaragua on the peace and security of the region. Several expressed the view that, should the Sandinista regime now be consolidated as a totalitarian state, their own freedom, and even their independence, would be jeopardized.

And as we debate whether to support freedom fighters in Nicaragua, Daniel Ortega has just returned from Havana, where he helped draft resolutions that called for armed struggle against the United States.

It is all well and good to talk about compromising and more trial periods and more delays. But there is more at issue here than the capacity of diplomats and Government agents to manufacture talking points and working drafts. We must never lose sight of the fact that there are lives—and freedom—in the balance.

There comes a time when the people of Nicaragua can sustain themselves no longer. If the Contras do not receive our aid, what would aid opponents have them do? Are they supposed to return to Nicaragua, to face certain imprisonment and death? Are they supposed to live in exile, either in the region or in the United States? What of their families living in refugee camps or hiding in the hills? What shall we say to these people who have turned to us for help?

If aid is denied today, and Congress later decides we made a mistake, what then? We can't just wave a magic wand and wish the lives unshattered—bodies untortured—units reconstituted. These are not chessboard pieces. They are real men and women with families and hopes and dreams. They can't simply be put on hold. They must know what we will do. Will we support them, or not?

Is the United States committed to extending freedom? Or do we believe that is no longer our concern?

By our actions in Nicaragua, people everywhere in the world will know our answer.

I have heard some colleagues argue that $100 million is too little to dislodge the Sandinista government. And so they oppose this aid request—as they have opposed aid requests in the past. Do they mean that they would support a larger request? Of course not. But their argument is simply a self-fulfilling prophecy. The resistance cannot succeed if it cannot fight. And the hope of victory is necessary to win active popular support.

Charles Krauthammer has correctly pointed out what he calls "an unexceptionable and rather undeniable fact: If the Contras wither, as the House Democrats devoutly wish, there will be an irreversible consolidation of Sandinista power in Nicaragua." He likened a vote against Contra aid to a vote for the fatuous "neutrality acts" of the 1930's.

We were elected to take these votes. We were elected to take this stand. We were told by the American people to support democracy with freedom and justice. We cannot escape this vote. And our vote will be recorded in history as to which side we are on.

The time for equivocation has passed. The time has come to act. The time has come to provide the Nicaraguan freedom fighters with the arms and training they need to win. The time has come to give freedom a chance.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT].

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Chairman, here we go again. If there is a problem, throw some money at it.

I have not heard one committee chairman really come forward and give us a documented litany of facts surrounding this matter. We are here again under an air of emotionalism, and a lot of people are waving the flag, but whomever I have talked to in the last several months when asked this question, What happens if our $100 million bluff should fail? Everyone of them says we are up a creek without a paddle.

Ladies and gentleman, we need to formulate policy, and $100 million is a Band-Aid. It is not going to treat the cancer in Central America. And we have been herded in here again on emotionalism, and we have yet to get any facts from this President.

Mr. Chairman, I think that our committees, after we defeat this measure, should demand those facts, if we have to close this House down, shut off C-SPAN and give us a litany of facts showing what really is the case in Central America.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SLATTERY].

□ 1250

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Chairman, in the spring of 1966 I graduated from high school, in Atchison, KS.

The war in Vietnam was heating up, and I was thinking about joining the Marines.

My dad was a Kansas farmer, and I still remember him saying: "This war just doesn't make sense."

Today, Mr. Chairman, we are debating another war, in another place, at another time.

Once again, we are approaching a fateful decision that will escalate this war, and escalate our commitment to it.

But we are asked to act without a consensus in Congress, and without much hope of military success.

We are asked to act without the support of the church, and without the support of our people.

And we are asked to act without the support of our democratic allies in Latin America.

It just doesn't make sense.

Mr. Chairman, we must have a bipartisan policy, and we do not have one today.

The lesson of history is clear: As a nation, united we are strong, divided we are weak.

And today, we are divided.

On February 3, I joined with 30 other Members, in a letter to President Reagan.

We urged him to postpone his Contra request.

We urged him to work with the Latin democracies, to search for peace, and to work with Congress, to search for consensus.

Our advice was ignored.

And then, only days later, eight Latin Foreign Ministers came to Washington.

They represented Colombia, Panama, Mexico, Venezuela, Argentina, Brazil, Peru, and Uruguay.

They urged the administration—unanimously—to withold the Contra request, and to support the Contadora process. They, too, were ignored.

Mr. Chairman, we can develop a bipartisan policy, and we can agree on goals to contain communism: No foreign military bases in Nicaragua. No foreign military advisers. No interference with the other nations of the region. And human rights for the people of Nicaragua. But Mr. Chairman, despite the gloom and doom rhetoric of this debate, one point is clear: Throughout Latin America, democracy is winning, totalitarianism is losing. Throughout the himisphere, the trend to democracy is clear. The democracies are not surrounded by Communists. The Communists are surrounded by democracies. Will we work with, or against, these democracties. That is the question.

And our answer must be a renewed commitment to these democracies.

We must work with them—diplomatically, politically, and we must help them economically.

We should respect them, and join them, in a common effort based on common principles. Mr. Chairman, in closing, I hope we all understand that the proposal before the House today: Does not have the support of the American people. Does not have the support of our allies in Latin America, or Europe. And does not have the support of the church. To pursue such a policy, in our democracy, just doesn't make sense. That's why we should vote down this request, and develop a policy, working together, that does.

Mr. BROOMFIELD, Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, I'd like to confine my remarks to the risk to peace of aiding or not aiding the Contras. The risks are borne by:

The Nicaraguans themselves;

The people of the region; and

The people of the United States.

I ask you to consider whether it is safer or more dangerous for the people of Nicaragua to experience the increasing brunt of Soviet-style communism's hopelessness, pain, and failure or an internal struggle to divert the country from Sovietization. What are the tradeoffs between living under the mailed fist and fighting for liberation? Does slavery under communism without struggle equate to peace?

One need only ask the American people what they would do in a similar circumstance if faced with similar choices. Would my Democratic colleagues voting against Contra aid put up with what the Nicaraguans are expected to bear under Soviet communism?

I ask you to consider whether it is safer or more dangerous for the people of the region—and indeed, all of Latin America—to have a conflict inside Nicaragua which slows or stops the establishment of a Soviet-Cuban military base or to allow unfettered the completion of such a base which, by its very size and capability and historic parallel, projects power and violence outward (as in the support of Communist rebels in El Salvador or, with the M-19 terrorists, in Colombia, or in the training and arming of Communist revolutionaries) for export.

Maybe we should ask the East Europeans whether proximity to Soviet military bases has had an impact on their national and personal lives.

Finally, is the United States safe or endangered by a new Soviet-Cuban base on the Central American land bridge so close to our borders; so capable of subversion, among our nearest southern neighbors; so involved with the international terrorist movement; so certain to create the vast refugee stream northward; so ready to project Soviet air and naval power in the Caribbean and up along our west coast.

For the answer there, we need only look at the island of Cuba serving as the U.S.S.R.'s operations base in this hemisphere, and its support for subversion, and Soviet overflights or our east coast; its supply of proxy troops and military advisers for hemispheric and worldwide ventures of violence.

And that, Mr. Chairman, is the key to this vote—the safety of the people of the United States and the people of this hemisphere. Considering the facts, considering the history, it is far safer for us to provide assistance to the Contras than to withold it.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELBY].

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Chairman, today, the House is addressing what may be one of the most important foreign policy decisions for the remainder of the century—United States support of the freedom fighters of Nicaragua.

We do not know what will happen if we do or do not approve the President's request for aid to the Contras, but we can certainly make an educated guess based on past Soviet behavior.

The Soviet Union's recent performances in Afghanistan and Poland portray the true role of the Soviet Union—a role of aggresssion and totalitarianism.

The stage is now set for another new performance much closer to home—the establishment of a second Cuba on the mainland of Central America.

Before us is basically a question of national security, or more precisely, a threat to our national security.

Cuba has been used as an island base to spead communism and terrorism. Can we imagine the horrible possibilites of a land base in Central America?

There is no doubt of the intentions of the Soviet Union, Cuba, and Nicaragua—a triumvirate of revolution.

The Soviet Union and Soviet-bloc countries have orchestrated a massive flow of arms and material—over $1 billion—to Nicaragua. A deep water port capable of basing Soviet submarines is being constructed on Nicaragua's Caribbean coast. The largest military air field in Central America is being built outside Managua.

These are not Soviet public works projects. These are the trappings of a military operation strategically located so as to launch a revolution to the north and to the south, to El Salvador, Guatamala, and Colombia, and even Mexico. From this base will come the direct export of terrorism to the United States.

The establishment of a Soviet-backed military presence in this crucial part of the Western Hemisphere poses an intolerable threat to the Caribbean sea lanes through which half of America's foreign trade, including oil, passes. Vital supplies for our NATO allies are also shipped through these narrow passages.

If a Soviet-styled totalitarian state is established, millions of families will be forced to flee to the United States in search of freedom.

Many would tell us that negotiations are the key. I have no doubt that everyone in this body would want to see a peaceful solution and the return of democracy. Does anyone believe that the Soviet-backed Sandinistas will negotiate with a group of abandoned Contras? Did the Soviets negotiate in Afghanistan? No, Did the Soviets negotiate in Poland? No. Will they relinquish power to the democratic forces? No.

Without our support, the Contras will become demoralized, eventually disband, and the hope of democracy will be forever dashed. Who can rise up to fight for democracy? Who will take the risks, knowing that the United States will not support the effort?

If we abandon the Contras, we will extinguish the hope of democracy in Nicaragua and ignite the fear of a future of terrorism and repression in those living in the neighboring countries of Central America.

If we step aside now for the Sandinistas and their Soviet and Cuban mentors, our next debate will be on aid to freedom fighters in Costa Rica.

I urge you to stop now this Soviet threat at our doorstep and support the President's aid package to those fighting for the freedom and rights that we enjoy.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge a no vote on this resolution. The Congress should not give 1 cent to this band of terrorists. And the American public should vociferously object to the way in which the President and his aides have conducted the debate on this crucial issue. They should be angered by the cowboy mentality which has once again been revealed at the White House.

For the President, the Contras are the guys in the white hats. The bad guys, wearing the black hats of course, are the Sandinistas, Members of Congress who oppose the aid request, and any American who suggests that waging war in Central America is not necessarily a good idea. To President Reagan and those who speak for him, the issue is simple—if you don't support the President, you must be one of the bad guys. White House Communications Director Patrick Buchanan summed up the administration's viewpoint with his now infamous comment, "With the vote on Contra aid the Democratic Party will reveal whether it stands with Ronald Reagan and the resistance—or Daniel Ortega and the Communists."

What the administration fails to understand is that opponents of Contra aid are acting on the basis of their well informed understanding of what is in the best interests of the United States. Fortunately, to most Americans, the issue isn't reduced to the "let's get 'em boys" mentality.

Americans do not have to choose between Nicaraguan President Daniel Oretega and President Reagan. The decision is not that simple. Instead, we have to do our best to sort the reality from the rhetoric. Why is it, for example, that the United States recognizes the Sandinista government and maintains an Embassy in Managua, while during the last 5 years U.S. taxpayers have paid over $100 million in efforts to overthrow the same government?

Let's take a look at the reality. While the Reagan administration claims that the Contras number about 20,000, news reports put the number at somewhere between 6,000 and 16,000. Despite the administration's generous estimate, the Contras for years have been fighting a losing battle without control of a single village, without popular support and without progress. The reality is that the Contras cannot win without the support of the people, and the support of the people is not for sale.

If we give the Contras another $100 million, which incidently would double the investment we've made over the past 5 years, where will the money end up? Let's not forget that there are already millions of dollars for which we have no account; $7.1 million, in fact, has been lost without documentation, record, or account. Taxpayers should demand to know what this money has purchased.

Although Congress specifically demanded strict auditing procedures to ensure delivery of the aid, the General Accounting Office recently concluded that of the $27 million appropriated for the Contras last year, $7.1 million was deposited in a Miami bank account held by one of several brokers for Central American suppliers. Other than this report, virtually no record has been kept as required by law. With all the talk of across-the-board budget cuts and the dire need for deficit reduction, the administration's request for more money, when it lacks the methods or the will to monitor what becomes of these funds, just doesn't make sense.

As we consider the Contra aid issue, we are forced to consider some very difficult questions. We must take a hard look at history, and we must take a hard look at the present.

For some of us it's hard to look back at the Vietnam experience. We can't, however, forget the lessons we learned. We learned that no amount of money or weapons could win the support of the Vietnamese people. Equally important, we learned that to succeed, American foreign policy must have the backing of the American public. To some, the Vietnam war is an old argument against the administration's requests for military aid for the Nicaraguan rebels. These arguments may be old, but they have lost none of their validity.

In the 5 years of United States financing, training, and attempting to legitimize the Nicaraguan guerrillas, the end result has simply been the promulgation of suffering by the Nicaraguan people. And with the path our administration has chosen, we are well on the way to direct U.S. intervention. When this happens, the suffering will be brought home through the experiences of young American soldiers who will pay the price of an irresponsible foreign policy. Above and beyond the effects of our 5 year, multi-million dollar investment in the Contras, this is the more penetrating long term effect which we have not considered.

Where do we go from here? Should we support the President's freedom fighters? The answer is "No." Instead, we should join Mexico, Peru, Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Venezuela, Panama, and Uruguay in strongly urging the President not to provide aid to the Contras. If the administration supports the cause of democracy in Latin America, how does it explain the failure of the United States to support the Contadora peace effort? While doing everything in its power to undermine the work of the democracies of the Contadora group, and the Contadora support group, the United States has consistently opposed renewal of direct negotiations with Nicaragua.

Though the Reagan administration has attempted to legitimize the Contras through money and rhetoric, they are not legitimate, they are not our allies, and they are not our friends.

President Reagan has dispatched Ambassador Habib to Central America, but it's clear that the President is not committed to negotiations, diplomacy or to cooperating with our Latin American allies. This is evident by the cursory treatment the foreign ministers of the Contadora group received this February, when they met with Secretary Shultz in Washington.

Yet, the best solution is the Contadora process which calls for the expulsion of all foreign troops in Central America. Until this is recognized by the President, the United States will continue to move closer to a disaster.

The vast majority of Americans believe that waging war is wrong, and that the alternative to war is diplomacy, negotiations, and the Contadora process. Since President Reagan will settle for nothing less than a wholesale "restructuring" of the Sandinista government, it is hardly surprising that the administration's "diplomatic" initiatives have led nowhere.

Rightly so, the American people are alarmed by the threat of United States troops in Nicaragua. And rightly so, the American people deserve an honest debate on the real issues surrounding this question, free of aspersions on patriotism.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE].

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, most Americans, and a large majority of the constituents I have heard from, oppose the President's request for $100 million to aid the Contra rebels in Nicaragua. Our national security is so vital, though, and our interests in Central America so compelling, that if the President were right I would stand by his policy and vote for the aid.

But the President is wrong. His Nicaraguan policy seems to be based on a simplistic one-dimensional analysis that sees only left and right and ignores the actual circumstances in Nicaragua and Central America. His policy is hurting the people, especially the true democrats, of Nicaragua, our allies in Central America, and the hemispheric interests of the United States, and it will make more mischief the longer our Government pursues it.

Let us be clear from the outset; the issue under debate is not the Sandinistas. I do not favor or like the Sandinistas or Mr. Ortega. However, the issue under debate is whether funding the Contras is the best policy to achieve our national interests in Central America.

It is not; in fact, it is counterproductive. It involves four major consequences that undermine American interests: self-delusion about the Contras; escalation of the military conflict, both within Nicaragua and throughout Central America; isolation from our democratic allies in the region and throughout the world; and polarization of Nicaraguan society between two repressive forces, at the expense of the democratic center.

After discussing these problems of self-delusion, escalation, isolation, and polarization, I will outline the elements of a constructive and potentially more effective policy to achieve our goals of democracy in Nicaragua and security for its neighbors. Finally, I will comment on the difference in perspective between myself and the President.

SELF-DELUSION

The Contras, after 5 years and 100 million American dollars, have never held control of a single village in Nicaragua. They have completely failed to build either political or logistical support in their country. Almost all of them have now fled Nicaragua, and most are camped in Honduras.

The Contras have been hurt by Nicaragua's increasingly strong counter-insurgency capability, but no amount of American assistance is likely to even the odds because their dismal record of failure is primarily due to internal faults. Many of the Contra troops are simply dodging the Nicaraguan draft. Many others were recruited at gunpoint. Their desertion rate is high, and despite ideological coaching their motives remain selfserving and incapable of sustaining the will required to take the offensive.

Former officers of Anastasio Somoza's hated national guard created and still control the Contras, severely constricting their appeal in a country that has no desire to escape Sandinista tyranny by restoring Somocista tyranny. To improve the Contras' image, at least in the United States, the Reagan administration recruited three Nicaraguans who support democracy—Adolfo Calero, Arturo Cruz, and Alfonso Robelo—to form the UNO, which supposedly oversees the Contras supported by the United States, known as the FDN. I wish the Contra leaders were all as democratic as Calero, Cruz, and Robelo, but they are not, and real power belongs to the military comandantes in the FDN, led by former national guard leader Enrique Bermudez. Another democrat in the UNO, Edgar Chamorro, broke with the organization because he refused to serve as a figurehead propped in front of reactionary Somocistas.

The Contras' record of violence against civilians has contributed further to their unpopularity. The Sandinistas have also abused human rights, but impartial observers agree that even their record is less dirty than the Contras' record.

Delusions are reinforced by calling the Contras the democratic resistance, freedom fighters, or by comparing them to the Founding Fathers of the United States. The triumvirate that signs their press releases comprises three democrats, but power belongs to right-wing comandantes who kept Somoza in office through violence and repression and are now trying to shoot their way back into government. Even UNO member Arturo Cruz passed up the opportunity to run for office in Nicaragua's elections of November 1984, despite the fact that he could have received very strong support and reinforced the other non-Sandinistas who now control one-third of Nicaragua's National Assembly. When I visited El Salvador a month after the Nicaraguan elections, President Duarte told me he thought Cruz had seriously erred in his failure to participate in the elections and enlarge the democratic opening.

We must stop deluding ourselves and face squarely the fact that the Contra's goal is to win power by military means. The Contra comandantes have repeatedly and consistently stated that they intend to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. This is important because all unbiased experts, including our own intelligence agencies, agree that the Contras cannot do this without the direct help of American combat forces.

ESCALATION

We must not underestimate the dangers of military escalation, which is taking two forms. One is the increasing destructive power, and cost, of the arms in use. The other is the geographic broadening of the war.

Nicaragua has already imported Mi–24 Hind helicopter gunships from the Soviet Union. These gunships have allowed Nicaragua to pursue similar counterinsurgency tactics to those adopted so successfully by our allies in El Salvador. Now the Contras want advanced surface-to-air missiles to fight the Hinds. We should consider how unlikely it is that those missiles would win victory for the Contras, and how likely it is that, instead, they will provoke the importation of more, and more advanced, East-bloc aircraft into Nicaragua. And if the Nicaraguans import, say, Mig jets, would the United States feel compelled to call an air strike by our brand new B–1 bombers? It is not mere happenstance that the first B–1's delivered were based, not in the Dakotas to threaten the Soviets, but at Dyess Air Force Base, TX, just 2 hours away from Managua.

A more dangerous possibility is that continued buildup of the Honduran-based Contras will provoke a Nicaragua invasion across the border, requiring direct American intervention and igniting the Central American powder keg in a regional war. During "exercises" in recent years, the administration has spent millions of dollars, often without congressional knowledge or approval, to develop a military infrastructure in Honduras of air fields, base camps, hospitals, docks, armories, radar installations, and communications networks. They are harmless in themselves, but they indicate a readiness to commit American ground troops as the Contra war escalates.

As evidence that the Contras are raising international tensions, I cite the item in this morning's newspaper, from the Associated Press, stating that Honduras has just sent 5,000 troops to reinforce the border in response to a reported mass deployment of Nicaraguan troops near the frontier. Nicaraguan troops had been reported to be heading north on Tuesday, following a series of Contra attacks.

ISOLATION

If the United States is not worried about this escalation, our democratic allies in Central America certainly are. They do not want a costly and dangerous arms race in Central America. Furthermore, they do not believe that support for the Contras will bring democracy to Nicaragua. That is why they continue to participate in the regional Contadora negotiations, and why they refuse to support the American policy of aiding the Contras.

The administration hints that our allies are too scared of Nicaraguan power to openly support us, so they have to communicate their support for us through private winks and nudges. This is hard to believe. Any winks or nudges are more likely meant to keep American aid flowing from an intransigent and pushy American Government. What they say publicly about desiring peace in the region is what they mean.

This is clearly the case with Costa Rica, which has entered into direct negotiations with Nicaragua in spite of objections from the United States. The two countries are establishing a border commission that will, in effect, protect Nicaragua from the Costa Rican-based Contras.

Even Honduras, which has cooperated with the United States more closely than any other country in the region, has lately tried to distance itself from the Contras. It has apparently recognized that the Contras are doomed to failure and is understandably worried over the prospect of several thousand armed and undisciplined guerrillas in its territory. It has, therefore, stopped allowing aircraft carrying supplies for the Contras to land in Honduras, causing severe logistical problems for the Contras and further impeding their effectiveness.

Obviously, these countries no longer believe their security is protected by the escalating militarism of the administration's policy. Indeed, our support for the Contras has placed us in direct opposition to all 13 Latin American countries participating in the Contadora process. Indeed, every democracy in the Americas, from Canada to Mexico to Venezuela to Brazil to Argentina, opposes our policy. Any Central American policy that can't find a word of allied support between Baffin Bay and Tierra del Fuego deserves serious reconsideration.

We should be especially circumspect in our policy considering the history of unpopular intervention by the United States in Latin America generally and Nicaragua in particular. All our efforts in recent decades to become good neighbors to the rest of the hemisphere are being undermined by the Reagan administration's actions, which lend new credibility to the old charges of gunboat diplomacy and Yankee imperialism. Our Nicaraguan policy may backfire as it shows the hemisphere, once again, the arrogant face of the ugly American.

Our support for the Contras has caused Nicaraguan nationalism to be directed against the United States, when it should properly be directed against the Sandinista Front. But, even more dangerous to our foreign policy in the long run, the military adventure against a government we recognize as legitimate has concerned nationalists everywhere. Our Contra policy has weakened our credibility and lowered esteem for us in the eyes of our allies, and lent credibility to the charges of our adversaries. Everywhere we discuss international relations with other democracies, whether in Japan or Europe or Latin America, the discussion is soured by our own allies' vocal objections to our support for the Contras. The damage we have already inflicted upon ourselves is likely to weaken our foreign policy for many years.

Far from standing tall in the world, we are standing alone. Our isolation prevents us from rallying diplomatic pressure against the Nicaraguan Government. In fact, we have provoked sympathy for Nicaragua from other countries. They not only refuse to join our economic embargo of Nicaragua, they are actually sending foreign aid there.

We have also prevented ourselves from making our case in the Organization of American States, which could otherwise press Nicaragua for adherence to its original commitments to free enterprise, political pluralism, and strategic nonalignment. We have failed to press our case in the United Nations, where our own policies have been attacked from all sides. No international organization will take our side against Nicaragua as long as we support the Contras.

POLARIZATION

Our policy has been extremely damaging to the prospects for progress toward true democracy in Nicaragua, because it has polarized Nicaraguan society and weakened the forces that could otherwise form a democratic center, a "third force," in their country. Nicaragua, unlike, say, Cuba, has a strong middle class and vital social institutions that can provide the basis for political pluralism. Private businesses, labor unions, churches, independent news media, and opposition political parties, are all deeply rooted in Nicaraguan society and all work naturally to press for democracy. They have been starved, though, by the President's trade embargo. They have been repressed under the state of emergency declared in response to the war by the Contras. They have been caught in the middle of the increasingly polarized political situation, accused by the Government of being traitors and by the Contras of being collaborators.

The longer we continue to support the Contras, the weaker the nonviolent opposition will become. The situation is especially critical now, because the Nicaraguan National Assembly is drafting a new national constitution that is supposed to be ready by the end of the year. This constitution could answer American concerns about Nicaraguan domestic policy, and the United States should be putting an international spotlight on the drafting process to ensure that the new constitution is democratic. Instead, the administration pins its hopes on the Contras who are futilely trying to overthrow the Government, and provokes a reduction of the political space in which nonviolent opposition forces could bring about a real democratic evolution in Nicaragua.

ALTERNATIVES

The cornerstone of a sustainable, effective policy toward Nicaragua should be support for the institutions within Nicaragua that can bring liberalization from within much more easily than we will ever be able to force it from without.

One example of such support would be to allow American trade, perhaps even subsidized by the United States, with the Nicaraguan private sector, but not with the Nicaraguan Government or its agencies until specific reforms were adopted. This would strengthen the private sector, which will eventually work for democracy. Since most of the Nicaraguan economy is controlled by the private sector, Nicaragua would be under strong pressure to accept our trade to revive its economy. And the policy's effectiveness would be bolstered by cooperation in it with our allies. Such cooperation will only be won, though, if the United States ends its aid to the Contras.

Other measures should be found to buttress independent labor unions, the print and broadcast media, opposition political parties, and the churches. I would not overlook the importance of this last group, considering the vital role played by the Catholic Church in bringing democracy to the Phillippines. Our hope for a moderate and open democracy in Nicaragua lies with all the indigenous institutions, not with the Contras.

Armed resistance to the Nicaraguan Government may well continue after the United States ends its assistance. Eden Pastora's ARDE forces, and Brooklyn Rivera's Misurasata, have been fighting the Sandinistas without assistance from the United States, because they are supported by the Nicaraguan people. They have gained a kind of legitimacy from their popular support that American dollars cannot buy for the FDN, and in some ways they have been more successful. The Nicaraguan Government, for example, has negotiated with Misurasata but refused to negotiate with the United States-backed FDN. Even if the United States ends its support for the Contras, armed resistence will continue as long as the Nicaraguan Government continues its repression. But it will be a more legitimate, and therefore a more effective, armed resistance.

Furthermore, if the only armed resistance were indigenous and justified by internal repression, democracies throughout the region and throughout the world could be expected to lean on Nicaragua for reforms. We must take away from Nicaragua the sympathy it receives as the victim of a superpower's undeclared and uncompromising aggression.

An aggressive diplomatic front, though, should not be the only element in a new policy toward Nicaragua. We should offer whatever support would be effective and appropriate in bolstering the institutions of pluralism in Nicaragua. Business, labor, religion, the press, and political parties will all be more effective in building democracy from within Nicaragua than the United States will be by aiding the Contras from outside.

At some point, it might be appropriate to take the final step toward normalization of relations with Nicaragua by offering economic aid if certain conditions are met, including the adoption of a democratic constitution, the free and fair election of a new government, the restoration of civil rights, and the loosening of ties with Cuba and Soviet-bloc nations. Nicaragua's geography gives it strong incentives to want cordial relations with the United States, and we should show that we will not be the ones to prevent such relations from developing.

In the meantime, we must lay down conditions for direct military intervention against Nicaragua. For example, the establishment of Soviet military bases in Nicaragua, or aggression, either direct or indirect, against our Central American allies, are two threats to our security that would justify the use of force. We must be clear in drawing our lines, though, because there is a broad consensus among the American people that it is wrong to use military force arbitrarily, and our support for the Contras as pressure on Nicaragua has seemed arbitrary to many Americans.

To help defend the security of our allies in Central America, it may be necessary to increase our military assistance to them. One effective way to help them defend themselves would be to support border patrols that would prevent the secret support of rebels in other countries. Nicaragua and Costa Rica, as I have said, have already begun working for agreement on such a plan. Nicaraguan support of rebels in El Salvador was the administration's original justification for aid to the Contras. For less money than we might waste on an ineffective Contra policy, we could help build very effective border security for our allies.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Chairman, the controversy over aid to the Contras is not new to this Chamber. We have been over the arguments before.

But the level of escalation this request represents, the strident rhetoric with which it has been promoted, and the deepening perplexity of the public as to how their Government can continue to pursue a policy so patently doomed to failure at best, and disaster at worst, compel me to speak of the issues beyond the policy. I am concerned about the programmatic, ideological style of President Reagan's foreign policy.

President Reagan began sending aid to the Contras during his first year in office. In all the time since then, he and the members of his administration have never described the goals of the policy, how it will achieve them, and what commitment will be required from the United States.

Instead, they have staged a huge and expensive public relations campaign to paint an unrealistic picture of the Cental American situation. They have supported their judgments with hearsay and innuendo, ignoring the truth when formulating their policy, and distorting the truth when promoting it. They have shamelessly pandered our national history and ideals—the Founding Fathers, democracy, and freedom—to gangs of young men led by fugitive war criminals. They have violated international treaties that carry the force of law under our Constitution. They have propagated hysterical fear of Nicaragua, while shirking their responsibility to develop an effective policy to protect American interests from realistc concerns about the Sandinista government.

Our most stunning international achievement in recent years has been the promotion of democracy in Latin America, but that has come largely because of congressional insistence on observance of human rights, always over the administration's objections. The administration seems to lack appreciation of the natural tendency toward democracy wherever human rights are taken seriously.

Nicaragua only pays lipservice to human rights, but the Contras are no better, and even lipservice raises demands and expectations. Patience and prudence are needed to nurture the social institutions of pluralism in Nicaragua, and to build popular demands for political liberalization. Funding the Contras will only stifle the institutions, defer the demands, and create a bigger, dirtier war in Central America.

We can accomplish our goals through coordination with our allies, aggressive diplomacy to apply international pressure, strong support for pluralism and the nonviolent opposition, and clear demands, backed by armed force, for American security. The precondition for these constructive policies to work is to reject, once and for all, the failed, flawed folly of the Contras.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. NEAL].

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I am very much opposed to this resolution and urge its defeat.

It needs to be said first of all, Mr. Chairman, that we must not tolerate Soviet, Cuban, or any other foreign country to become established or dominate in this hemisphere. The Monroe Doctrine has not been repealed and it must be enforced. These facts should be made clear to the Soviets, the Cubans, and the Nicaraguans in the strongest terms possible.

Mr. Chairman, the United States has a legitimate stake in preventing Nicaragua from threatening its neighbors, as well as preserving the liberty of its citizens. And this, too, should be made abundantly clear to the Sandinistas.

The administration maintains that it cannot negotiate with the Sandinista government in Nicaragua. The only way to impress the Nicaraguans, according to the administration, is try to overthrow them using the Contras. We have, in effect, declared war by proxy on the Sandinista government. The CIA set up the Contras with the help of Argentina 5 years ago. And nearly $100 million has been spent directly on Contras support since then. Another $150 million may have been spent in indirect assistance.

Has this policy worked, Mr. Chairman? Clearly not.

The Sandinistas have greatly strengthened their military forces and are more dependent than ever on the Soviets and the Cubans. Moreover, the Sandinistas have used U.S. support for the Contras and our military exercises in Honduras as an excuse to increase internal repression: Suppressing the press, persecuting political opponents and antagonizing religious organizations.

Will sending another $100 million in tax dollars be enough to topple the Sandinista government, Mr. Chairman? Absolutely not. The President and his advisers of course know this. Their strategy is to use this aid to gain a foot in the door. They reason that once our commitment to the Contras reaches this level, we will not be able to stop. Mr. Chairman, If we approve this request, the administration will be back again and again for hundreds of millions, if not billions, more. They will argue that we must not abandon our valiant allies, these freedom fighters, whom they irreverently compare to our own Founding Fathers. If we continue down this path, Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that it will end tragically in loss of American lives in the jungles of Central America, without accomplishing our goals.

Is there another way? I think there is, Mr. Chairman. This approach is supported by Nicaragua's neighbors and our Latin friends. It requires that the administration negotiate directly with the Nicaraguan Government. The administration must clearly define for the Nicaraguans our dedication to keeping Central America free from Soviet, Cuban or other Communist domination, and our stake in preventing Nicaragua from threatening its neighbors. Most importantly, the Sandinistas, the Soviets, and the Cubans must understand that we are prepared to take whatever action is needed, including military intervention, to protect the interests of freedom in the region.

In this carrot and stick approach, Mr. Chairman, the threat of our military strength, especially our forces in Honduras, is the stick. The carrot is the promise of opening economic ties with Nicaragua; resuming trade between our countries, letting Nicaragua participate in the Caribbean Basin Initiative and so on. Our goal should be to end Soviet and Cuban involvement in Nicaragua and to get Nicaragua to join its Central American neighbors in a verifiable, nonagression compact, and move toward greater individual freedom for its citizens.

Will this work, Mr. Chairman? There can be no guarantee. But I believe the American people want the administration to negotiate first. We always have the military option available if we or any of Nicaragua's neighbors are threatened.

Again, Mr. Chairman, we must not tolerate the Soviets establishing a base or installing threatening weapons in Central America. But it is naive to believe that a relatively small, inexperienced guerrilla army with $100 million can prevent foreign domination of this region. We need a much more comprehensive approach along the lines I have outlined. I am optimistic that such a policy can be fully developed by April 15, 1986, when we will next deal with this issue.

It is time to end the rhetoric and red-baiting and bet on with a sensible foreign policy toward Nicaragua. I urge my colleagues to vote down this request for $100 million and let us move forward with a real bipartisan approach that has a real chance of success.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one other observation about this issue. I am certain that many Members sincerely believe we should continue to support the Contras, but I also sense that many, both within and outside of Congress, believe they have here a red-hot political opportunity, a chance for a massive smear campaign. My guess is that at this very moment NCPAC and other rightwing organizations are busy producing some of the nastiest smear campaigns we have ever seen. I can see the TV ads now; a jack-booted Communist hoard marching across Latin America, trampling the American flag, urged on by Fidel Castro and so on with the clear implication that anyone not now supporting a military solution in Nicaragua is a Communist sympathizer. I hope I'm wrong Mr. Chairman, but we have seen this kind of approach before and my prediction is that we will see it again. I expect soon.

I hope that our colleagues will not yield to this kind of intimidation and that the American public will recognize it for what it is. Preserving democracy at home means preserving the opportunity for open, honest intelligent discussion of issues leading to informed choices. It is not un-American to differ with each other on issues. It is un-American to try to intimidate through smear campaigns.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, there are four things I wish to say on the eve of this vote. First, beware of letters and executive orders. If there is going to be a compromise, let it be in legislative language.

As a victim of a letter, one who believed in that letter, I speak from experience.

Second, we are spending too much time on this issue. There are other important national domestic priorities that we should be spending our time on.

I wish the President could consider some other problems domestically that we have in our country.

Third, it is clear that the ads—and I was victim of radio ads—have backfired. They produced a 4-to-1 vote against the President after provoking these ads that are shameful, that question patriotism. I hope that is a lesson to be learned.

Last, I think if this bill is defeated, the message to the President is not a rejection of his policies but a rejection of the methodology of achieving his policies. If we reject the President's package, we can truly come up with a bipartisan compromise in legislative language and supported multilaterally by other nations.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to aid to the Contras.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY].

Mr. MCCURDY. Mr. Chairman, regardless of the outcome of this vote, in my opinion, no one really wins. We still do not have a bipartisan foreign policy, we do not have a comprehensive regional plan for Central America, we still do not have a real commitment to economic social progress in the region.

I have been a supporter of President Reagan on much of his defense posture, and as one who believes that the President is our chief national spokesman on foreign affairs. I also believe that our country has vital interests at stake in Central America.

The Sandinistas are Marxists, and their government is undemocratic and repressive. To the extent that they export revolution and subversion, and provide bases for Soviet and Cuban military operations, they pose a security threat to their neighbors and to the United States.

But Nicaragua is only one part of the equation. The other four countries of Central America have democratic governments in place and they need our support for economic development. We have made a bipartisan commitment to provide that support through the Jackson plan, and we need to deliver on it.

There is also a regional peace process in place, supported by all the major democracies of Latin America. As an American Nation, we have an obligation to demonstrate our commitment to a political, rather than a military solution.

Three years ago, when the Intelligence Committee was debating the Boland amendment, I did not believe that our Government had a well-thought-out policy with respect to Nicaragua and the region. The President's message to Congress last month did not convince me that we now have such a policy.

Since that time, there has been some movement. A number of Members on both sides have worked long and hard to address our common concerns in a bipartisan way. I want to thank the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON] and the other Members on our side who gave many months to this effort. And I particularly want to express my appreciation and high regard for the leadership, the courage and the personal integrity of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CHANDLER].

I wish that the administration had been as eager to work with us over the past 24 weeks as they have been over the past 24 hours. And I wish that some Members of my own party would be as eloquent in telling us what they support as they have been in telling us what they oppose.

In any event, we are faced today with an up-or-down vote on the resolution, with the understanding that, if it is enacted, the President will undertake certain commitments by Executive order. The proposed order addresses some of my concerns. For various reasons, including constitutional limitations, it does not address others.

On this issue, as on most issues, the divisions in this House reflect the divisions in the country. In my view, the best way to achieve a truly bipartisan policy—one that the American people can understand and support—is through the legislative process. Therefore, I will vote against the resolution.

Regardless of the outcome of this vote, no one in this Chamber believes that the debate will end today. In President Reagan's words, the President and the Congress share "both the power and the responsibility for our foreign policy." We must work together. The American people expect no less.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the President and the eloquent words of my committee chairman of Foreign Affairs, Mr. DANTE FASCELL. He said it correctly. So did the last speaker. This issue is not going to go away.

Mr. Chairman, time and time again in this debate the courageous cardinal of Nicaragua, His Eminence Miguel Obando y Bravo, is misquoted on this House floor. No man of God announces publicly for a military option. I have met with the cardinal four times and he believes that true reconciliation means the Communist government in Managua must meet with the Contra Freedom Fighters in the hills. I submit for the RECORD again the pastoral letter on reconciliation from the Nicaraguan bishops, Easter Sunday, April 22, 1984:

The road to social peace is possible through dialogue, sincere dialogue that seeks truth and goodness. * * *

It is dishonest to constantly blame internal aggression and violence on foreign aggression.

It is useless to blame the evil past for everything without recognizing the problems of the present.

All Nicaraguans inside and outside the country must participate in this dialogue, regardless of ideology, class or partisan belief. Furthermore, we think that Nicaraguans who have taken up arms against the Government must also participate in this dialogue. If not, there will be no possibility of a settlement, and our people, especially the poorest among them will continue to suffer and die.

Shortly after the publication of the pastoral letter, Tomas Borge said the following of the bishops in an interview with Mexico's Excelsior:

Those bishops belong to a race of traitors, to the sector that has turned itself over to imperialism. * * * The stand taken by such individuals, enemies to their country and their people and traitors to their own homeland, causes indignation.

No less a liberal Democrat than Senator EDWARD M. KENNEDY said the following on May 22, 1984:

Why can't some of you grasp the level of church persecution that we're dealing with down there?

When it comes to dealing with their critics in the Catholic Church in Nicaragua, the Sandinistas are flunking the test. And when it comes to taking concrete steps aimed at achieving a meaningful dialog with their opponents—the only real basis for an enduring national reconciliation—the Sandinistas are falling far short of their promises.

They [the Nicaraguan bishops] called for national healing, reconciliation and dialog among the people of Nicaragua. The Sandinistas response brought back memories of their confrontation with Pope John Paul II when he visited Nicaragua. They called the bishops' pastoral message criminal and accused the bishops of being instruments of counterrevolutionaries.

The Sandinistas' response to the bishops' letter is unacceptable. When the bishops voiced concern for the suffering of the Nicaraguan people, the Sandinistas accused them of abetting foreign intervention. When the bishops urged negotiations and dialog for peace, the Sandinistas accused them of criminal statements. When the bishops called for freedom, the Sandinistas accused them of seeking confrontation.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, today we have an opportunity to give peace a chance in Central America. We have the means to say to the Nicaraguan Sandinistas, to Guatemala, to Honduras, to Costa Rica, and to El Salvador that we want peace for them and a chance for democracy to flourish everywhere in this hemisphere. We have a chance to say to the American people and to the rest of the world that the United States will not tolerate tyranny and subversion of allies, but we will always extend the olive branch before aiming the gun.

Can there be any doubt in anyone's mind that the people of Nicaragua have been conquered by yet another dictator—throwing off an authoritarian from the right only to be subdued by a totalitarian on the left? And can there be any doubt that the Soviet Union and Cuba are using Nicaragua as an outpost—a staging ground for further subverting the democracies of Central America?

But knowing that, I still believe it is not too late. The Nicaraguan people want freedom. They want to practice their religion; read newspapers whose writers are free to report without interference; they want to elect their representatives in elections with real choices and in a process that assures fairness; they want to raise their children knowing they will stay at home and build a strong economy, not become conscripted riflemen in an army of terror and subversion in a neighboring land; they want to enjoy the promises made to them in 1979 when they courageously overthrew Somoza, promises coming true today for the people of Honduras, Guatemala, and El Salvador.

The President of the United States has agreed to provide a window of opportunity. He worked with us to fashion this concept of carrot before stick, olive branch before gun. He did so in good faith and, I believe, what we have before us now is superior to the measure as it existed yesterday.

In addition to the 90-day negotiations window, the President's Executive Order addresses the concerns of many Americans.

With this measure, we strongly endorse—and even provide resources for—the Contadora countries and their peace proposal.

If at any time during the next 18 months, the Sandinistas agree to genuine diplomacy, military aid to the Contras will cease.

We heighten the visibility of the diplomatic process by appointing a top-level, bipartisan commission to report to Congress on progress being made.

We implore the democratic forces in Nicaragua to unite behind a common leadership.

And, in no uncertain terms, we immediately terminate aid to any group that practices torture, kidnaping, forced recruitment, or any other violation of human rights.

We also will absolutely not tolerate anyone who deals in drug trade or misuses the funds appropriated.

And finally, the President has renewed his commitment to the economic assistance envisioned in the Kissinger Commission report, recognizing that peace takes root where there is the promise of a better tomorrow.

Yesterday I had the opportunity to visit extensively with Special Ambassador Philip Habib. He told me his instructions from the President were emphatic: "Find a peaceful, diplomatic solution to the problem in Central America."

Ambassador Habib believes, and I do, too, that a peaceful solution can be found.

Look at Central America. Nicaragua is the aberration. The spark of freedom and democracy has ignited a flame of reform and change in that region. Daniel Ortega is the only leader today who wears a military uniform. And the United States has committed itself to these democracies to help them grow and to prosper and to be free and independent. We have no quarrel with any nation in Central America that leaves its neighbors alone and rejects the certainty of slavery offered by Cuba and the Soviet Union.

We have tyranny on the run in this hemisphere. Democracy and freedom are being chosen wherever people are free to choose. I deeply believe that our vote today will send a strong message of strength and hope to these people. It will be a message of peace—of conciliation and of tolerance. But it will be backed by the rigid determination of a free people to unite behind anyone who is willing to throw off the shackles of slavery and lay their lives on the line for the values our ancestors fought and died for.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we have a new slogan today. It used to be "Given Peace a Chance;" today it is "Give Surrender a Chance."

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND].

Mr. BOLAND. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the President's request that we provide $100 million to the Contras in Nicaragua.

We have had this debate before, and whatever we do on this request, I believe we will have it again.

The arguments haven't changed much since 1982 when we first discussed this matter on the House floor. Neither have the facts.

But the arguments have become colored by a regrettable level of rhetorical excess which has not facilitated our ability to develop a sound policy to deal with the situation in Nicaragua.

After 4 years of debate there are some who would still frame the Nicaraguan question as a choice between the Sandinistas and the Contras.

In my judgment, that dangerously misstates our interests in Central America, and our ability to further those interests.

What are we faced with in Nicaragua?

We are faced with a Sandinista government which has quite clearly betrayed the promise of its own revolution, which has repressed freedom of expression and religion, which is totalitarian, and which is Marxist.

The Sandinistas are neither committed to, nor in pursuit of, democracy.

And Daniel Ortega will never be mistaken for Simon Bolivar.

Under the Sandinistas Nicaragua has become increasingly dependent on Cuba and the Soviet Union. The evidence is convincing that it has provided support for leftist guerrillas in other countries in Central and South America.

These facts are of legitimate concern to the United States, and to the other nations of this hemisphere.

As items of legitimate concern, they demand a sound policy response.

Our closest allies in Latin America have chosen the Contadora process as their response, President Reagan has chosen the Contras.

Who are the Contras?

By all accounts, they are a mix of fighters from the Sandinista revolution dissatisfied with its results, members of various Indian groups, and some members of the security forces of former President Somoza.

They have no internal political following.

They have not been able to capitalize on popular dissatisfaction with Sandinista rule.

They have achieved no major military successes.

They have no internal organization to get their message across.

And therein lies their other problem—they have no clear message.

They are Contras.

They are against the Sandinistas.

But what they stand for is less clear.

In a country which has, we are told, a very unpopular totalitarian government, that same government continues to arm large numbers of citizens drafted into the militia to fight against the Contras.

Those guns—in spite of the government's unpopularity—are turned against the Contras, not the Sandinistas.

No, based on all available evidence, the Contras do not appear to be the vanguard of a popular revolution in Nicaragua.

Since we are being asked to provide them with $100 million, I think it is fair to ask what the Contras can do for us.

Can they prevent Nicaragua from turning into a Soviet-Cuban outpost?

I think not.

Let no one in this Chamber be deluded.

That is our job.

If a line is to be drawn in the dirt in Nicaragua let it be a credible line, one which makes clear the importance we place on, among other things, certain types of weapons being kept out of Central America.

Only the United States can draw that line, and expect it to be observed.

The Contras cannot be its enforcers. It is dangerous, and wrong, to pretend that they can.

Can the Contras prevent Nicaragua from assisting leftist revolutionaries in Latin America?

There is no evidence to support that conclusion.

That task falls to the other nations in the region, including the United States.

It will require material support, both economic and military, and it will require the development of an allied response to those instances of Nicaraguan behavior, which the nations of this hemisphere consider unacceptable.

The Contras have not been, and by all available evidence will not be, sanctioned by Mexico, Costa Rica, Honduras, Guatemala, or any other country in Latin America, to be the instrument by which the behavior of Nicaragua is conformed to acceptable standards.

Can the Contras produce democratic reforms in Nicaragua?

History and logic suggest otherwise.

Military pressure from the Contras will not encourage the Sandinistas to ease repression, and will not cause them to sever their ties with the Soviet Union or Cuba.

A threatened government will take actions to protect its power.

In the case of Nicaragua, this will not mean better treatment of the church, a smaller army, an end to the importation of sophisticated arms, or less government control of the economy.

What can the Contras do?

Well, they can certainly be an irritant to the Sandinistas.

And I know that there are those who place great value on irritating any government that receives supplies and support from the Soviet Union, because they believe the irration flows through to the Kremlin.

Regardless of your view on that reasoning, understand two things about the recommendation the President has sent us.

Even in guerrilla warfare, $100 million does not buy an inexhaustible supply of irritation.

The military supplies in this request will be expended, and when they are gone, the administration will be back for more.

You cannot buy a Contra victory, on any terms, for $100 million.

But you should also understand that you will not be voting on just $100 million for the Contras.

If we approve the President's request, we would be making available other funds in the fiscal year 1987 intelligence budget—specifically, those in the CIA's reserve for contingencies.

We would also remove all current legal restrictions on CIA or DOD assistance with respect to the $100 million in the President's request.

This Congress has traveled down that road before, at other times, and in other countries.

I think we should seriously consider whether we want to make that journey again.

The President's proposal—the Contras—represents the sum total of his plan for a policy toward Nicaragua.

It barely acknowledges another option—an intensified diplomatic and security assistance effort, in concert with our allies, to isolate Nicaragua and to strengthen our friends' ability to resist Nicaraguan aggression.

In my view, the Contras represent a flawed plan—one which cannot achieve its announced or implied goals—and one which ought to be rejected.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ROBERT F. SMITH].

Mr. ROBERT F. SMITH. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the call to aid the Contras.

I realize that this isn't a simple issue for many Americans to understand. After all, very few Americans have ever experienced the situation faced by the Contras in Nicaragua.

But I believe this issue is important enough to search for that understanding.

I urge every American, and certainly every Member of this House who stands in opposition to this resolution, to look for understanding from people who have walked the mile the Contras walk today.

If you really want to know what its like to believe in freedom but run from the muzzle of a gun because of that belief—as the Contras must do—ask a refugee of the wholesale slaughters in Cambodia.

If you really want to know what its like to watch as your neighbors and friends and family are murdered because they represent an unspecified threat to the state—as the Contras are being murdered—ask a Jewish survivor of the Nazi Holocaust.

Or if you just want to know what its like to live without any political voice in your own home—as the Contras do—you need not go any farther than my own congressional district in Oregon.

When you get there, ask any native of the little town of Antelope.

In Antelope, the "politically legitimate" control was captured, perverted and abused, and the native residents placed under armed surveillance and political control of followers of the Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh.

That happened in America. Antelope, a community deeply embedded in the most open and free society in all of the world's history, was ultimately liberated—but only with our help.

Nevertheless, they can tell you what it's like to fear for your life, regardless of the righteousness of your belief.

They can tell you what it's like to watch as good is dominated by evil and enforced by terror.

We must help. Whether its Antelope, OR; Stuttgart, Germany; or Managua, Nicaragua, freedom must not be allowed to die by default.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA].

Mr. MURTHA. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, in 1977 the United States cut off aid to the Somoza government. In 1979, the overthrow of President Somoza was broad-based, popular; it had the support of labor, business, professional groups, and the church, and most segments of Nicaraguan society.

The OAS passed a resolution of support for the revolution and this was extraordinary. It was extraordinary because they supported the overthrow of one of its members.

But a condition of the overthrow by OAS was requiring a democratic, pluralist, and nonaligned Nicaragua. These conditions were accepted by the Sandinistas in a cable on July 12, 1979.

Now, after that we had an acrimonious debate in the House of Representatives and I remember it vividly. The gentleman from Florida, Mr. DANTE FASCELL, the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, who spoke so eloquently a few minutes ago, talked about the gentleman leading the battle to get the money for the Sandinistas.

I remember being convinced that even though I did not think the Communists were going to change their minds, I remember people saying;

You've got hard line Communists, you've got people who have got money from outside the country coming into the country and you're not going to do anything at all by giving them money.

But I voted for the money, because I felt it was the right thing to do and it was about the same amount of money we are talking about today.

We offered to send Peace Corp volunteers into Nicaragua, and instead, what they accepted were military advisers and economic advisers from Cuba. They did not accept any aid from the United States and the repression that was so prevalent under the Somoza regime was back under the Communist regime that is now ruling.

As I said, the amount of aid that we gave to the Sandinistas at that time was about the same amount of aid that we are talking about today.

Now, the Carter administration had to withdraw that aid because they violated the very agreement that they made. The Sandinistas violated the agreements that they made.

As a matter of fact, during that period of time the Costa Rican national assembly investigators estimated that at least 1 million pounds of material entered Nicaragua from Cuba in the 6 to 8 weeks before the Somoza government was overthrown, so they established very clearly the link between Cuba and the Nicaraguan Government which took over.

Now, going down to the Philippines not long ago, I saw what the church can do when it supports a free election, what international observers can do. The thing that Nicaragua worries about the most are free elections. You saw the farce that they called a free election not long ago. You know that if there is a free election in Nicaragua what will happen. You know very well, even though you see on TV the people say, "Well, I support the government."

Well, if I lived in Nicaragua, I would say I support the Government also, because obviously it is not to the benefit of the people to not support the Government on TV.

But I remember vividly going to El Salvador as an observer to the elections. The press reported there would be a very low turnout and it would be a free election. Many people here were criticizing us for giving aid to the El Salvador Government and that the guerrillas were inside guerrillas, not being directed from the outside and the people would not vote and would not support an election.

I remember flying out over on election day and seeing the long lines of people and talking to some of the people who were voting, standing in those lines for hours, and saying to us after being threatened by the guerrillas and walking for miles, "They can kill me. They can kill my family, but they can't kill us all."

They were threatened with cutting their fingers off because they were going to vote and when they make a threat in El Salvador, it is a serious threat. There is no question about it, because of the violence that goes on in that country; but they ignored that and 80 percent of the people in El Salvador voted and you saw the turnout and they have a freely elected Government.

And even though we got all kinds of criticism in the United States for giving them aid, they had another election. They elected a freely elected Government and they are doing well.

Some of the very same people who criticized what we are doing in El Salvador now try to take credit for the legislation that we passed a couple years ago.

So if in this country can give aid to places like the Philippines, which is 8,500 miles away, Zaire, $4 million, 6,500 miles; Malaysia, 9,000 miles away; Gabon, Oman, Portugal, thousands of miles away, hundreds of millions of dollars to countries that are so far away, it seems to me that there can be bipartisan support for a compromise which has been worked out so that we can send a message to them that they should have free elections and the people of Nicaragua can select a majority party in that country to run that country and get rid of the repressive regime which is in Nicaragua today.

I just want to say this. In my feeling, there is no way we are going to have a chance in government down there unless the United States has military aid in order to stimulate a change in that government.

There is no way the other democracies will survive unless the United States supports what is going on down there.

So I very strongly urge this House to support the aid recommended by the President under the compromise position under the skeleton plan.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURTHA. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman agree with me that the question here is not negotiations. It is whether you negotiate from weakness or from strength and that if you believe you can negotiate with a Marxist-Leninist government from weakness, then vote "no"; but if you believe you need the correlation of forces to negotiate successfully with a Marxist-Leninist government, then vote "yes."

Mr. MURTHA. I think in order to have a free election, we have got to have some pressure. In order for them to negotiate, we have to have pressure. The only way we are going to have pressure is to have some sort of military aid.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman form Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA].

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, this is perhaps one of the most difficult votes that I have had to cast since serving in this great body. The leadership in our country is divided on the issue. Those from whom I seek counsel and advice are divided on the issue. My district is divided on the issue in a sort of polarizing way where it has become very divisive.

I have prayed for divine guidance, Mr. Chairman, and I have come to one conclusion. If I strip all the rhetoric and come only to the single basic issue, if I dissect it and have only the naked issue, with no rhetoric around it, I come to the basic question: Do I use my taxpayers' money to put guns and arms in the hands of a group of Nicaraguans to kill other Nicaraguans with whom they have an ideological difference?

There has to be, there must be, a better alternative.

Mr. Chairman, until then, I must vote "no."

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY].

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about the persecution of Catholics, the persecution of Jews in Nicaragua. Nothing has been said about the persecution of blacks, because there is none.

For the first time in the history of Nicaragua, blacks are enjoying some sense of freedom.

Under Somoza, they were semislaves in the sugar cane and the coffee fields. Now most of them come from the Caribbean. They are enjoying at least some freedom of moment, some sense of equality and I just thought the Members ought to know this.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, think about the Indians, too.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS].

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the delivery of $100 million into the hands of a group of bandits whose record of murder and torture of civilians is undisputed. Nicaragua can be saved from the jaws of totalitarian oppression but this is not the way to do it.

Much has already been said about the need for a comprehensive policy for Central America. I would like to join those who deplore the piecemeal approach of the administration with respect to a policy for the promotion of security, peace, and a decent standard of living within the Western Hemisphere. The time has come for a policy which initiates a true partnership with our neighbors in the Western Hemisphere. The United States has always assumed certain privileges and prerogatives. The time has come for the United States to assume certain vital responsibilities as well.

Nicaragua and the rest of the countries of Central America can be saved from outside interference and influence if the United States would accept greater responsibility for the well-being of all of the citizens of this hemisphere. The threat of gunboat diplomacy is obsolete. Financing rightwing rebellions is a waste of the American taxpayer's money. Only a policy which promotes a true partnership in the development of the economies of our neighbors will enhance real security within this hemisphere. Our fellow Americans in Haiti, Grenada, and in NIcaragua also deserve life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Sharing the American way of life is the best way to prevent the establishment of beachheads of communism in the Western Hemisphere. Citizens who live in countries like our longstanding ally, Haiti, should have more to look forward to than mud and misery. The eroded soil of Haiti stands as a stark symbol of the rewards of loyalty and friendship to the United States. Our approval and friendship with Samoza and our friendship with Duvalier are glaring examples of how not to conduct foreign policy in the Western Hemisphere.

The work of the Peace Corps and the initiatives of the Alliance for Progress under President John F. Kennedy are far better examples of the elements which must go into a new foreign policy for the Western Hemisphere. Instead of $100 million for murder and mayhem, let us follow these two examples and spend money to provide bread and promote democracy. We need a Marshall plan for Central America, Haiti, and the Caribbean area.

All Americans want security in this hemisphere. But the security we seek will not be gained by financing bandits. Let us have instead a comprehensive policy based on a true respect and partnership with our fellow Americans, inlcuding the citizens of Nicaragua. I urge my colleagues to vote no on this wasteful and dangerous resolution.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, the question before the House today is a historic one. I think if there is anything about the debate that has been disturbing for some of us, I hope on both sides, it is the occasional references that have been made to the patriotism and commitment of Members. Nobody in this House is anything but a patriotic American seeking to find the best solution for our country, but we were, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP] said quite accurately, elected to make this decision.

The President was not elected to make it for us.

I would personally prefer today to be in the position of supporting the recommendation of this President or any President of the United States; but I believe it is most ill-advised for us to move forward on a course of escalating the violence in Nicaragua until we have truly exercised every effort to explore negotiations. That is the position of the countries of Latin and South America and of the other countries around the world with whom we are allied.

As objectionable as the conduct of Nicaragua is viewed to be both here and abroad, attempting to change it by pure military pressure has not succeeded and will not succeed.

We need to have a policy that reflects the intentions, concerns, and values of those in the hemisphere in addition to ourselves who respect democracy and freedom. Clearly, that is not the policy that is proposed to us today.

We continue to have the opportunity to consider alternatives to this issue and problem, and we will, but let us have a program which Americans can stand behind.

Let us have a program that the Congress can stand behind, united and determined together.

Let us have a program that our allies and friends, those who respect democracy and freedom around the world, can support, applaud, encourage, and help in. The policy before us today, however, offers no such possibility or hope.

For this reason, I urge you to vote no on this resolution; in doing so, allow us to continue working for an acceptable bipartisan solution that brings us together.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OXLEY].

Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the resolution.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MARLENEE].

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Chairman, those opposing aid to the freedom fighters would demagogue the issue by stating the question, "should $100 million be spent on the agricultural producers or the freedom fighters?" My response is that both are critical areas. On one hand, our producers are losing their farms, if not all at once, then little by little they should be helped far in excess of $100 million.

In Nicaragua, they are losing their farms to a totalitarian Communist regime and along with their farms, they are losing their freedom and any chance to rebuild.

In America, there are people in need and we try to help them. In Nicaragua, there are people in need, but they can't be helped until they become refugees in Honduras or Costa Rica. They can't be helped because they don't have a ration card if they don't support the totalitarian Communist regime. Under conditions where whole villages have been burned in an attempt to motivate communism, how do our farmers get their products to the people of Nicaragua who need them?

Yes, there are a group of us ag rebels who understand how painful the economy is to the American producer, and as a result we sought and received an audience with the new Secretary of Agriculture. We wanted an opportunity to air our grievances.

As a result, in my opinion, there is hope for American producers. The Secretary stated his commitment to making the 1985 farm bill work, instead of manipulating regulations. The Secretary exhibited sensitivity to producer problems. The Secretary promised an aggressive pursuit of exports. He assured us there would be no crosscompliance for 1985. He has delayed the deadline for reconstitution from March 1 to April 1. He has assured us that the nonprogram crops bill will be signed; $750 million has been diverted into FmHA.

And, most important, the Secretary's stature is being brought to bear on the Federal Reserve, to bring pressure to allow banks to carry, without prejudice, farm loans.

I remind my colleagues that a lot has been done, and, given the opportunity, the new Secretary will attempt to do more.

Just as we must work to solve the problems of the producer, we must work to see that communism does not destroy our sea lanes of commerce, the freedom of our producer neighbors, our markets to the south, or the lives of our children.

Support aid to the freedom fighters.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to zero in on where we in this House agree and where we don't.

I believe there is broad agreement on a number of issues.

First, most of us agree the Nicaraguan regime is Communist and moving Nicaragua down the road of totalitarianism. Some may argue the degree of press censorship or religious persecution, or the number of political or labor leaders jailed. We may argue the numbers of Soviet or Cuban advisers and troops or the number of Mesquito Indians murdered, but most of us accept that the Communist leaders are doing exactly what in their unguarded moments they've said they would do: Change Nicaragua into a Leninist state.

Second, most of us agree this Nicaraguan Government is exporting violence and terror. We may argue as to whether the shipments go by air or sea or land. Or how many rifles or rounds of ammo there are. But most of us accept that the Communist regime in Nicaragua goes on trying to extend, as they put it, a revolution without borders.

I believe most of us here agree that the opposition to the Nicaraguan Government offers more hope for democracy and security than the Nicaraguan Communist leaders. There is some disagreement on this issue. Some question the democratic credentials of some of the regime's opponents. Some question alleged human rights violations on all sides. But most of us if asked "who offers more chance for democracy and security in Nicaragua—the Communists or the opposition?" would not answer "the Communists."

We agree therefore that Nicaragua should change. We disagree on how to bring that change about.

But even here there is some agreement. Most of us here agree that we should not send United States troops into Nicaragua.

Most of us here agree we must pursue diplomatic efforts to change Nicaragua.

Where we disagree—and deeply—is on one issue: whether we should aid the democratic resistance—those Nicaraguans fighting to bring change.

Let's not kid ourselves. This issue is not economic U.S. military aid. It's whether to help them. Any aid to a fighting force has a military purpose.

Put another way we disagree on whether along with diplomatic pressure there should be military pressure.

But look, in facing this choice we must realize that our diplomatic efforts to get withdrawal of Soviet and Cuban forces simultaneously with withdrawal of our support for the resistance have failed, failed during bilateral negotiations, failed during the Contadora process, and failed at the Organization of American States. In all these forums we have also failed to get the Nicaraguan Communist rulers to agree to negotiate with the democratic resistance and with the internal opposition.

Yes, I know that we have no guarantees that military aid will bring change and success. But I also believe to deny military help—to rely solely on diplomacy without some teeth will guarantee no change—will guarantee failure.

Last month we gave our support to democratic change in the Philippines. A phone call from Senator LAXALT or a visit from Phil Habib may work with a corrupt despot in the Philippines. That option has not and will not work with the Communist elite of Nicaragua.

That is why diplomatic efforts to succeed need military pressure. That is why I believe we must help the Nicaraguan democratic resistance to help themselves.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'BRIEN].

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I would like the record to show that I cast my vote today for the President's proposal to provide further aid to the Contra freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

Mr. Chairman, I want to publicy and officially express my thanks to under Secretary of the Army James R. Ambrose for his leadership in resolving a difficult situation at the Joliet Army Ammunition Plant, a situation which for a time delayed my opportunity to support the Contra freedom fighters.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 540.

Before I visited Nicaragua last week, I thought the Sandinista government was a totalitarian regime. After I returned, I was certain of it. Everything I saw and heard demonstrated that the Sandinistas had blatantly violated their revolutionary pledges of freedom. Most unfortunately, my conversations with the Nicaraguan Government gave me no confidence that the Sandinistas are willing to give peaceful negotiations a chance. I continue to hold hope for negotiations, but I have no reason to believe that we can bring the Sandinistas to the table without effective pressure from the democratic opposition.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps the most striking symbol of the situation in Nicaragua came during our meeting with Cardinal Obando Y Bravo the leader of Nicaragua's Catholic Church. When I asked him for the best way to bring change to the country, he called for whatever pressure the United States could bring to bear. When I pressed him to be more specific, he replied "We're not in the United States but Nicaragua. Our words have to be measured."

In the past, debate on assistance has focused on the nature of the Sandinista society. The Sandinista's apologists have clung to the facade of democracy provided for their consumption. Today, the nature of the Sandinista government is no longer a question. It is an oppressive, Communist totalitarian state which nobody denies. For most Nicaraguans, the 1979 revolution is still under way almost 7 years after Somoza's fall. The names of the oppressors have changed but the oppression remains and is in most cases greater.

Our conversations with the editorial staff of La Prensa revealed the extent of repression through censorship. The nation's leading opposition newspaper regularly has 40 to 90 percent of its stories censored. Under the Sandinista's 1982 state of emergency, the Government regularly excludes reports of military contact but also of the country's depleted economy and human rights record. Censorship extends to the minute details such as the closing of local markets unable to survive the country's economic policies.

Articles reporting on the Catholic Church or Cardinal Obando are cut from copy. The exclusion of the church from the news effectively limits the church to communicating through daily Mass. On October 12, 1985, the Sandinistas banned Iglesia, the Catholic Church's newspaper. On January 1, 1986, the Government closed the Catholic radio station because it failed to broadcast President Ortega's year end message.

Sandinista Vice President Sergio Ramirez flatly lied during our interview. His lies came among a familiar chorus of denials that Nicaragua was aligned with the Soviet Union and Cuba or exported its revolution to other countries. When questioned about the great exodus of Nicaraguans seeking refuge in neighboring countries, Ramirez refused to accept the numbers, claiming they were gross distortions. He also indicated that those Nicaraguans which had left the country had been taken against their will—kidnapped he said.

In the same conversation, Ramirez denied the construction of prisons which have been clearly documented by aerial photographs. He also claimed the prisons which he admitted exist have model conditions for cleanliness and treatment. This statement was in stark contrast to those of the independent local permanent Commission on Human Rights which described the prisons as worse than those under Somoza and certainly more populated. Commission members described prison cells as absolutely dark with no sanitary facilities. My discussions with the staff of La Prensa confirmed that it does not limit its measures to censoring opponents. Carlos Ramirez, a La Prensa editor, told me about his kidnapping and beating by the Sandinistas. He is only one of several La Prensa staff to be so arrested. I couldn't blame him for fearing for his life.

As I vote in favor of the President's aid package to the Contras this week, I do so with several thoughts in mind. First, it is the Sandinistas who, having accepted the objectives of the Contadora group in 1983, most recently asked that negotiations be suspended. Second, the United States, who has no official role in the Contadora process, has supported the process and offered repeatedly to reopen bilateral talks with the Sandinistas on the condition that they do not undermine the Contadora process. Third, previous restraint exercised by the House has not shown the Sandinistas any more willing to negotiate. In fact, from 1979–81 when we were providing aid to the Sandinistas, there was no sign of cooperation on their part.

I seek to remind those, who oppose aid and screech for America to disengage from Central America, of an important consideration. We are inherently involved in Central America as a member of the international community and as a leader of the free world. If we decide this week to void our intervention by not approving aid, we must realize that we are not really disengaging ourselves from the situation. De facto we will be involved by aiding the Sandinista government in its consolidation of power.

Mr. Chairman, as I talked to the opposition, I realized I was talking to the same Nicaraguans that led the charge against Somoza. It was the assassination of La Prensa Editor Chamorro which ignited Somoza's fall. It was the same human rights group which supported the Sandinistas and even comforted imprisoned Sandinistas, like Tomas Borge, in Somozan jails. These were the same revolutionaries who assumed they were achieving their democratic goal when Somoza fell in July 1979.

As I said in the well yesterday, Mr. Chairman, the revolution for freedom continues for the people of Nicaragua. The Contras, while not perfect, provide our only hope for pressure on the Sandinistas. Supporting this aid package takes a bold step toward ensuring that we will never be forced to send a U.S. combat troup to fight for our liberty in the region.

I implore my colleagues—vote "aye" on House Joint Resolution 540.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT].

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I think the problem we face today is that not enough of us are sure that we know what the goal of the administration is in its policy with regard to Nicaragua. In order to have a successful foreign policy, there have to be some clearly defined and perceptible goals that our Nation is trying to achieve.

In looking at what the administration has said in the past 3 or 4 years, I cannot, and I think a lot of Members of the House cannot understand what our goal is. If our goal is to negotiate with the Sandinistas to try to increase the security of the United States and the security of nations in the region, then why have not those negotiations gone forward? Why have we not taken the Sandinistas at their word and said not to allow Soviet and Cuban advisers, stop sending Cuban and Soviet advisers, stop sending arms to other countries, and let us have on-site verification of whether or not you are willing to do that.

The Sandinistas have said they are willing to make those promises in writing, and if that is our goal, why have we not tried to negotiate that treaty? The fact is, we have not. The fact is, the Congress has voted for Contra aid on four or five different occasions on the assumption that that kind of a negotiation was our goal, and yet that kind of a negotiation has not gone on.

Because there is not a clearly perceptible goal that we are trying to achieve, there is no unity in the Congress and there is no unity in the country with regard to our policy on Nicaragua, and there will not be unity until the American people understand what it is that we are trying to do.

If we have learned nothing from the last 20 years, surely we have learned that the only way America has a sound foreign policy is if the American people understand what it is that we are trying to do, accept the goals that we are trying to achieve, and then support the President and the Congress in trying to achieve those goals.

My worry, my concern today, is that those goals have not been articulated and the American people are not behind this policy. Therefore, I intend to vote "no" and I urge the Members of this body to vote "no," and if the House sustains that "no" vote, maybe finally the Reagan administration will begin to articulate to America what our policy is in Central America. If that can be done, the Congress and the American people will report that foreign policy.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Four hundred nineteen Members have answered to their names, a quorum is present, and the Committee will resume its business.

The Chair will advise that there are 9½ minutes remaining on the majority side and 10½ minutes remaining on the minority side.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DICKS].

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to this resolution.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MOLLOHAN].

Mr. MOLLOHAN. Mr. Chairman, it is after a long and careful assessment of the current situation in Nicaragua and the Central American region as a whole, that I rise today to oppose the President's request for $100 million in military and humanitarian aid to the democratic resistance forces in Nicaragua. I vote against the President's request not because I am unconcerned about the situation in Nicaragua; indeed, I am deeply concerned about the situation there and I am certain that the majority of my colleagues in the House share my concerns. I feel strongly that the United States needs to fashion a comprehensive policy in the region which will strengthen economically our democratic friends in the area as well as help move the Government of Nicaragua toward democracy.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I am not confortable with a policy in Nicaragua which leads with military force without serious support and consideration given to diplomatic initiatives. In light of the statement issued in January by the Contadora group and the Contadora support group which called for a Latin American solution to the Central American problem, I feel that the time has come for a major diplomatic initiative by the United States in support of Contadora.

On February 3, I joined 30 of my colleagues in sending a letter to the President. In our letter, we asked the President to support the democracies of Latin America in their efforts to seek a solution to the problem in Nicaragua. The President and the administration have tried to address our concerns and work with us in developing a more comprehensive policy toward Nicaragua. However, I must say that I am neither satisfied nor comfortable with the compromise offered by the President yesterday.

This is not the end of our debate on United States policy in Nicaragua. The question we will decide today is whether the United States should send $100 million in military and economic aid to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua. The question we may face in the weeks ahead is: What direction do we want the future of our policy in Nicaragua to go? Many of our colleagues in the House have worked together to develop compromises to the President's request. I am very encouraged by the proposal put forth by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY]. I feel that Mr. MCCURDY's proposal offers strong incentives for both parties in the conflict, as well as the Contadora countries to negotiate a Latin American solution to the problem in the region. I am hopeful that the House will vote against the $100 million aid request today so that we will have the opportunity to debate Mr. MCCURDY's proposal or something similar April 15.

In the final analysis, the debate today is one of means; not of goals. All of us would like to see a cease-fire in Nicaragua, direct talks between the Sandinistas and the democratic resistance, and the restoration of freedom of press and religion within Nicaragua. This debate is about the means we will use to achieve our goals. I urge a "no" vote on the resolution before us.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MACKAY].

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

As the Congress debates the conflict in Central America, I want to outline my reasons for opposing $100 million of additional military aid to the Contras.

I want to make clear that I dislike the Sandinista government of Nicaragua as much as the President does. Furthermore, I do not intend to stand by and allow Nicaragua to be used as a base to export communism throughout Central America. But I don't think $100 million in military aid will solve anything. The money will only escalate the human suffering and will deepen the quagmire we are already in.

The alternative I support was developed by a bipartisan group of moderate and conservative Congressmen. It is patterned after the recommendations of President Reagan's Blue Ribbon Commission on Central America. That Commission recommended a two-track approach, combining military pressure with diplomatic negotiations—which is exactly the policy that other nations of Central America as well as our allies in Western Europe and Japan have asked us to follow. In fact, our proposal is entirely consistent with President Reagan's approach in dealing with the Soviet Union and other Communist nations.

I propose undertaking serious and committed diplomatic efforts to achieve national reconciliation in Nicaragua. While this effort is in progress, the United States would provide humanitarian aid to the Contras, but no military aid. All opposition groups would be included in the negotiations, including the internal opposition parties in the Nicaraguan Government.

If the Sandinistas are unwilling to sit down and negotiate with their own people and their neighbors in Central America, then Nicaragua, and not the United States, will have been identified as the true obstacle to peace in Central America.

I believe that before we provide military assistance to the Contras, we must demonstrate to the American people that we have diligently pursued all possibilities for a regionally based political solution. I firmly believe we must show the world that this Nation is presenting the Nicaraguan Government with a clear alternative to a prolonged conflict. If good faith negotiations are tried and fail, I will support military assistance to the Contras and other Nicaraguan opposition groups who are willing to carry on the fight without targeting civilians or engaging in human rights violations.

I have not arrived at my position lightly. My study and discussion of this question has included personal meetings with the Contra leadership, officials from the State Department, the CIA, and leaders of various church groups. I have talked with leaders of the internal opposition parties in Nicaragua, as well as Nicaraguan businessmen and ordinary citizens. I have raised this issue for discussion, at numerous town meetings and forums in ever county in my congressional district, and have discussed my views with hundreds of my constituents.

It isn't clear which side will prevail in the debate. But both President Reagan and Speaker O'NEILL need the votes of our bipartisan group. So both of them have agreed to incorporate more elements of our compromise into their policy if their position prevails. So our effort has been of importance, no matter how the vote turns out today.

One more point. I have been working hard for weeks to develop the bipartisan compromise outlined above. I believe the issue is of crucial importance, because without this compromise, we must choose between being untrue to America's historic principles, on the one hand, and jeopardizing our national security on the other. It is sad commentary on today's politics that even while this good faith effort was going on, complete with meetings at the White House and personal discussions with top officials in the Reagan administration, I have been subject to a barrage of paid political ads accusing me of disloyalty and favoring communism.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Chairman, verbal warfare over this legislation started off with a fevered pitch when White House Communications Director, Patrick Buchanan, wrote in an op-ed piece that, "With the vote on Contra aid, the Democratic Party will reveal whether it stands with Ronald Reagan and the resistance—or Daniel Ortega and the Communists."

Mr. Buchanan has missed the point. Opposing aid to the Contras is not a question of siding with Daniel Ortega. It is, instead, a question of what is the best policy for the United States to pursue not only with regard to Nicaragua but toward all the nations of Central America.

Pressure must be applied on the Sandinistas, but a two-track approach—using military pressure via the Contras, while at the same time seeking a negotiated settlement—has not proven to be effective. The Contras have not been able to firmly establish themselves within Nicaragua, and the Reagan administration, despite promises and protestations to the contrary, has not continued to pursue a negotiated settlement, either bilaterally or through active support of a regional agreement through the Contadora nations.

In many ways, the Contras are as destabilizing to Costa Rica and Honduras as they are to Nicaragua. In fact, the Sandinistas have continuously used the Contra war as an excuse to consolidate their power in Nicaragua. As journalist Christopher Dickey wrote in his book, "With the Contras," "With the war against the Contras as a reason and as a pretext, the Sandinistas moved steadily into the Soviet orbit.* * *" The longer the war continues the further the Sandinistas will drift away from serious bargaining either with the United States or within the framework of Contadora.

A recent article on the Contras characterized them as being plagued by "internal disputes, inadequate training, and human rights abuses, as well as (having) little political direction and faltering public appeal." Yet, even if the Contras were somehow able to establish a presence in Nicaragua, the Sandinistas would not be any more willing to make changes or "cry uncle." They fought a prolonged war with Somoza; they most certainly would be willing to do so with U.S. backed rebels.

None of these arguments against aid touch on the financial burden that extended support for the Contras would entail. The present Presidential request of $100 million is merely part of the down payment. The guerrillas in Guatemala have been fighting for nearly 30 years. It is conceivable that the same thing could happen with the Contras—if we continue to support them. Thirty times $100 million is a lot of money, particularly in light of Gramm-Rudman inspired cuts to domestic programs. One hundred million dollars would go a long way to build houses in the Bronx.

If, however, the President remains determined to come to the aid of the nations of Central America, which in principle is a good idea, then he should use that money for economic development. President Oscar Arias Sanchez of Costa Rica in an interview with conservative journalist, John McLaughlin, said that if the United States really wanted to help the nations of the region, then we should use the $100 million to help the ailing economies of Guatemala, Honduras, Costa Rica, and El Salvador. The prosperity of its neighbors, economically and politically, will finally undercut the Sandinistas.

Reports indicate that there is growing discontent in Nicaragua with the draft, the failing economy, and the chastisement of the church. The Sandinistas are crumbling from within; if given enough rope they will hang themselves. The Contras are one of the best excuses they have to avoid their excesses and corruption.

In essence the argument over the Contras is really an argument about control. The United States wants to control the destiny of the region. It's not enough to want to influence change and to work for democracy in the farms and factories of Central America. We also insist that events follow our preconceived notion of how they should proceed. That's not going to happen in Nicaragua or anywhere else in the region.

This does not mean that we should somehow surrender the fight to aid the nations of the region in their efforts to build democracy. We should continue to work for democracy throughout the region. That is the best way to isolate the Sandinistas. We should listen to those Governments comprising the Contadora and Contadora support groups, Colombia, Venezuela, Mexico, Panama, Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, and Peru. They all oppose aid to the Contras. In addition, the nations of the European Economic Community and Japan have endorsed the Contadora group's Caraballeda statement, which is also supported by the five nations of Central America. Among other things, it calls for "termination of external support to the irregular forces operating in the region."

Finally, there is not now and there never has been enough support in Congress or across the Nation for the Contras. Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, DANTE FASCELL, and committee member, DAN MICA, correctly pointed out at the committee's recent hearing on Contra aid that in order for foreign policy to be effective, it must enjoy a broad consensus of bipartisan support. The Contras can't muster that kind of support. Instead of aiding them, let's stick to what we do best—helping to build democracies and market economies.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RODINO].

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chariman, I rise in strong opposition to House Joint Resolution 540, to approve the President's request for $100 million for the Contras fighting to overthrow the Government in Nicaragua. This is a huge, nearly fourfold increase in funding for the Contras since the first request 5 years ago for $19 million. If this request is granted, it will surely not be the last.

We are all well aware that the Sandinista government is repressive and has a continuing record of human rights violations, and no one wants a continuation and strengthening of a Marxist-Leninist regime in Central America. But the Contras have also committed brutal atrocities and, led by military strongmen from the Somoza national guard, they do not represent a viable or acceptable alternative to the Sandinistas. They do not inspire a popular, democratic movement inside Nicaragua, but instead spread terror and hatred among the innocent campesinos.

Equally important is the message from the leaders of the eight leading countries in the region who urged a halt to aid to the Contras. These neighbors of Nicaragua believe the only effective solution is through negotiation. It is time we give peace a chance and vigorously support the Contadora process.

This continued funding of the Contras, I am convinced, would be counterproductive and should be disapproved. Apart from the fact that we should not be aiding an ineffective group of men who spread violence and brutality throughout the countryside, I am appalled that this should be asked at a time when the President is proposing deep cuts in vital programs providing nutrition, health, education, job training and other services to our disadvantaged and vulnerable citizens. Under the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1987, 27,000 low-income women, infants, and children would be removed from the WIC nutrition program. Under his budget, student financial aid programs would be reduced by $1.9 billion, eliminating 2 million students from assistance. Under his proposed budget, funding for the National Institutes of Health would be cut by $417 million from the fiscal year 1986 appropriation and frozen at this lower level through fiscal year 1991.

It is inconceivable to me that we can consider sending funds to support a suspect, no-win, terrorist group while contemplating budget reductions that would endanger the health and welfare of so many of our citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of this unwise and unrealistic request.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOLTER].

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this resolution.

I believe that we should continue the traditional role of the United States "as peacemaker wherever the parties in a local conflict seek our help in promoting negotiated solutions. In Central America, * * * and other regions, we will continue an active diplomacy for peace."

I believe that we should "* * * (m)ake no attempts to impose our will on any other country."

We should not seek "to destabilize or overthrow the Government of Nicaragua."

We should support "the comprehensive, verifiable implementation of the Contadora Document of Objectives."

These are not my words, Mr. Chairman. These words belong to none other than President Reagan.

Today however, we are hearing a different story. The President has requested $100 million to destabilize the Government of Nicaragua thereby dismantling any hope for peace. An action that can only serve to escalate present hostilities.

The requested funding of the Contra forces in Nicaragua has only one goal. The objective of U.S. military assistance and funding is to remove the Sandinistas from power. To suggest anything else is rediculous.

Will the requested $100 million accomplish the desired goal of the administration? Or will it take $200 million next year and $400 million after that?

Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that it will not stop at $100 million. This beast will grow. It will grow by being fed American tax dollars and in the process irrevocably entrench United States aid and involvement in Nicaragua for years to come.

Make no mistake about it. A vote for House Joint Resolution 540 is a vote for eventual American involvement in Nicaragua. Funding the Contras is the first step toward putting American troops on Nicaraguan soil.

In January of 1983 the Contradora group met for the first time to pursue the path of peace, just 3 short years ago. The neighbors of Nicaragua are content to pursue peaceful negotiation through the Contadora process. Who are we to deny a chance for peace?

Placing time constraints on peace whether they are 90 days or 90 months—is in itself—self-defeating.

In closing I would like to commend to my colleagues the words of wisdom offered by Joachim Prinz, "A neighborhood is not a geographic term. It is a moral concept. It means our collective responsibility for the preservation of man's dignity and integrity."

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, today, Congress was once more called upon to deal with the issue surrounding a financial commitment to military aid for the Contras in Nicaragua. No Member of this Congress supports or embraces the goals of communism. However, all are genuinely concerned with the welfare of Americans and the commitment each and everyone of us has to promote the welfare of our fellow beings particularily in this hemisphere.

It is the concept of how to support the human condition of those living in Central America and Nicaragua, in particular, which has separated many serving in Government. I, like others, feel as a democracy we must be committed to pursuing all viable avenues for resolving the differences among governments, societies, and philosophies without first empoying military activities. For on too many occasions, long after many valiant servicemen and women have been lost to the harvest of war, the same beligerents set down together and engage in a cooperative relationship. Therefore, the only justification we may attach for the sacrifices of former wars is to dedicate ourselves to obtaining the goals of a cooperative relationship without the middle stage: war.

Owing to the present circumstances in Nicaragua and being responsive to the commitment made by those who served our Nation's and mankinds' interest, I am compelled to vote against aid to the Contra's. Also, I will be joining the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, G.V. "SONNY" MONTGOMERY, and others in meeting with the American Ambassador and the leaders of Nicaragua to effect direct negotiations between our two governments, soon. I urge my colleagues to vote "no."

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. COLLINS].

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to voice my strong opposition to military aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua and to urge my colleagues to vote "no" on this measure. The proposal submitted by the President and his supporters is both excessive and insufficient all at the same time.

It is excessive because any additional military aid to the Contras will only add fuel to the violent tension in Central America at the expense of all efforts to reach a peaceful resolution.

It is insufficient because the best available evidence shows us that the proposal we are considering will not be enough—standing alone—to provide a long-term solution.

Furthermore, the President has offered us no real compromise on this issue. After all, in any compromise, you have to give up something in order to get something. It is a process of give and take. In this case, the President is doing all the taking while we are being asked to do all the giving.

I am terribly concerned that we are being asked to support this measure on the basis of misleading information put out by Contra supporters.

For example, the President, in his attempt to sell the Contras to the American people as freedom fighters, has failed to point out that these forces actually were organized and continue to be led by remnants of the notorious Somoza national guard. These so-called freedom fighters are, in fact, terrorists. They have shown utter contempt for human rights and have subjected the people of Nicaragua to a nightmare of violence and oppression.

If these people can be characterized as freedom fighters, it is only because they built their careers fighting against freedom whenever it has tried to blossom.

The President has announced to the world that now, he, too, is a Contra.

Well, by describing himself in this manner, the President is telling us something very significant about the way he is viewing a matter of grave importance regarding our foreign policy.

By his own admission, our President, the Contra, has shown us just how narrowly he has come to view this serious issue. By his own admission, our President, the Contra, is not shaping policy in the well-considered, deliberative fashion that rests as the cornerstone of our democratic system. By his own admission, our President, the Contra, is not attempting to formulate his opinion, to make his decision, to exercise his awesome power as the result of balancing the many critical factors at play here.

Well, I an not a Contra. I have just come from my district where the calls are coming in 3 to 1 against Contra aid. The people in my district have sent me here to represent their interests—American interests. I urge my colleagues to vote in the best interests of the American people—not in the interests of a ragtag band of terrorists who have no widespread support among their own people.

The views of the American people are clear. They do not want United States military involvement in Central America; they do not want any situation to develop which would require our boys to have to go over there. That would be absolutely unacceptable. And war by proxy, which is probably if we continue to prop up a force with questionable goals and the inability to stand on its own, is equally unacceptable.

Let us not fool ourselves about what is at stake here. What is at stake here is not limited to the $100 million in aid to the Contras. After all, we are being asked to grant this money request with no assurances it will be effective, with no provisions for congressional oversight, with no guarantee that we will not have to grant another money request later. What we are being asked to consider is, in effect, a blank check for what may wind up being endless support for a questionable cause.

In its simplest Spanish form, "Contra" means "against." In that sense, the Contras live up to their name. Clearly, the Contra rebels stand against everything we hold true—long-held principles of freedom, justice, and fair play. The very principles that made this country great. The Contra supporters are running against the grain of American public opinion and ideals. I refuse to cast my lot with a band of terrorists and murderers disguised as freedom fighters. I urge my colleagues to do the same and vote "no" on Contra aid.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES].

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

We are engaged in an extensive, detailed, and informative debate on the policy implications of providing the President with the funds to finance an armed insurrection against a government with which we maintain diplomatic relations. The issues are serious and in the past 2 days we have examined and considered the issue from every possible angle and point of view.

History has a way of repeating itself. President Reagan's policy in Nicaragua is a policy which looks to war—to a military settlement. It seems increasingly clear to me that the Reagan administration is ignoring facts and history and is proceeding on a course of action that is blind to the past that will be unsuccessful in both the near and long term. The $100 million the President requests is a pittance to the flow of funds the President will request later if this request is approved by the Congress.

Let's look to past history, Mr. Chairman. In less than a month, Castro will celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion. In what President Kennedy himself called a monumental disaster for the United States, the CIA recruited, trained and equipped a force of anti-Castro Cubans. Although they were not called Contras, or freedom fighters, these anti-Castro Cubans were in many ways quite similar to the Contras in Nicaragua. Many of their leaders had been officers of the despised former Batista dictatorship. The CIA premise for the invasion was based on the idea that the invasion would result in the overthrow of the Castro government by triggering a popular, public uprising in Cuba. But the CIA failed to understand how much the Cuban people hated Fulgencio Batista. There was no popular support for the invasion at the Bay of Pigs and it ended in tragedy and defeat for the United States. Castro remained firmly in control. Cuba still has Castro firmly entrenched.

The policy of the Reagan administration is very much like the policy that failed in Cuba. There is no evidence or reason to believe that the Sandinistas do not command popular support in Nicaragua, particularly when the Contras are led by people affiliated with the hated Somoza. Nobody believes—not even our military experts—nobody believes that Somoza-laced Contras can topple the Sandinistas. It may even strengthen their power throughout the country as the government resists with the cry of "Yankee imperialism." The United States will again be branded as the aggressor throughout Latin America.

Mr. Chairman, a bona fide diplomatic effort should be our alternative. President Reagan has not given the Contadora group its support or cooperation. We should make that bona fide effort instead of intensifying the war effort which is what the President wants to do.

I urge defeat of the resolution.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES].

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SAVAGE].

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to this resolution.

Mr. Chairman, to be honest, it is difficult for me to understand why the President is pushing with such ferocity for $100 million to help the Contras overthrow the legitimate Government of Nicaragua and for the murder of innocent Nicaraguan citizens when so many desparately needed programs are being neglected in this country.

While our most challenging domestic problems are being ignored, President Reagan continues his all-out effort to drive the Sandinistas from Nicaragua arguing, among other nonsensical and unfactual allegations, that if you supported the decision to permit the ouster of Baby Doc in Haiti and Marcos in the Philippines, then you must support the military ouster of the Sandinistas in Nicaragua.

Under no circumstances, however, can the Government of Nicaragua be compared to the Duvalier government in Haiti or the Marcos government in the Philippines—neither morally nor in terms of the popular support of the people. Rigidity in the attempt to establish a more equitable distribution of wealth, universal literacy, and health care, while defending your country against a well-financed invasion, cannot be viewed in the same light as rigidity designed to increase personal wealth and privilege in the face of increasing poverty and violence orchestrated by the fascists of Haiti and the Philippines.

The Sandinistas insist that there should be room in this hemisphere for the existence of different ideologies and that they can work out their problems with their Central American neighbors if the Reagan administration would stop interfering.

I have traveled to Nicaragua, spoken with the leaders and citizens, and have studied the arguments. The hypocrisy and outright falsities emanating from the White House are insulting, at best.

The argument that the government does not represent the people has no logical basis. Eighty percent of the citizens voted in the election for seven very distinct parties to both the political right and left of the Sandinistas. International human rights and legal groups monitoring the elections found them to be free and fair.

Unlike many Central American countries supported by the United States, such as El Salvador and Guatemala where rightwing military forces murder civilians with impunity, Nicaragua has allowed opposition newspapers to write and parties to preach. The brutality of the Contras, on the other hand, the vicious murder of women and children before their very families, has been well-documented.

Contra aid can do nothing but continue killing the Nicaraguan people. The overthrow of the Sandinistas, a move I am wholly opposed to, can only occur through direct American military action. I hope and pray that Vietnam is too fresh in the minds of us all to permit such unjustifiable, immoral maneuvers. It is time we respect the wishes of the people of Central America and allow them to resolve their differences and build their communities in peace.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. KAPTUR].

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, today, I will vote against the administration's proposal to send an additional $100 million in military aid to the Contra guerrillas seeking to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. This is the wrong way to control the Communist threat in Central America. One-hundred million dollars channeled to a ragtag army lacking the popular support of the people is insufficient to result in a clear military victory. Because the Contras will not be able to gain the military highground, military aid will ultimately result in drawing the United States into a protracted war in Central America. You can't gain true loyalty of peasant people through rifle butts. That is the Communist way. Rather, loyalty starts by respecting the worth of people and getting food to empty stomachs.

The United States has already spent $100 million in Nicaragua. The impact has been minimal. No amount of money given to the Contras would be enough. Nearly $30 million of this amount cannot be accounted for by the General Accounting Office. In essence, this proposal puts good money after bad.

Diplomatic efforts to resolve the conflict in that region should be redoubled. Any aid should be made contingent on serious diplomatic initiatives being undertaken. In fact, aid should be used as an incentive for negotiation. Leaders of neighboring democratic nations in the region have urged us, as recently as last month, to exhaust dimplomatic efforts before applying a military solution. No serious negotiations have been underway in over a year.

At a time of record U.S. budget deficits and when Americans are being asked to sacrifice for the national good, I find it difficult to justify another $100 million in foreign aid to a ragtag group that has yet to prove it can win on the battlefield. And so do the vast majority of constituents from whom I have heard. They believe, as do I, that the money could be better spent here at home—in our manufacturing and farming communities, in our downtowns and in our neighborhoods. One hundred million dollars could create a lot of job opportunities in our district.

Controlling the spread of communism in Central America is an important national foreign policy goal. If the threat to the United States is that severe, then let the President come to Congress and explain the clear and present danger to our national security. Short of that, we should seek other solutions which are in the long-term interests of the United States and the democratic nations of Central America.

Thank you.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to House Joint Resolution 540.

Let me make several points:

First, the choice before us is not between aid to the Contras and the triumph of communism. If it were, the choice would be easy, since we cannot allow the triumph of communism in Central America.

The choices before us include better alternatives to protect U.S. interests.

Our approach must be multilateral;

Our approach must favor negotiations over an expanded war;

Our approach must contain and isolate Nicaragua;

And our approach must strengthen our democratic friends throughout Central and Latin America, as well as have their support.

Second, the principal defect in the President's proposal is that the Nicaragua problem simply cannot be solved unilaterally.

The Contra war has isolated the United States, not Nicaragua;

U.S. support for the Contras is a policy that today stands in splendid isolation from all the world, and such a policy, no matter what its temporary gains may be, cannot be sustained over time and cannot in the end succeed;

Thirteen governments representing over 85 percent of the population of Latin America support Contadora and a negotiated settlement of conflict in Central America;

The European Community and Japan, Nicaragua's two largest trading partners, are on record firmly in support of Contadora. Neither the European Community nor Japan support United States funding of the Contras;

Our friends in Central America regard United States military intervention as a more destabilizing threat than the existence of the Sandinista government in Nicaragua;

The Contra war frustrates efforts for a regional settlement which is essential to preserving and promoting democracies in the area;

European as well as Latin American allies see the necessity of a negotiated settlement as the only possible practical alternative to a lengthy and unwinnable war. We owe it to them and to ourselves to explore that alternative thoroughly.

Third, the President's request before us fails to take into account the reaction of our adversaries to it.

When the United States steps up its aid to the Contras, the Soviet Union and Cuba will step up their aid to the Sandinistas. What will the United States do then? The administration does not address that question. It assumes that our move will be the last move. But it will not be the last move. This proposal would lead us to further escalation, more bloodshed, and stalemate.

A vote for the President's request today will lift restrictions on CIA and DOD participation in the Contra war. It will bring American military advisers into Central America to train the Contras. It will put American soldiers shoulder to shoulder with the Contras.

The President has said that he does not plan to send United States troops to Nicaragua, and I have no doubt that he does not intend to do so. But, I submit, the announced goals of the President, his commitment to those goals, the predictable response of our adversaries, the chances of accident and miscalculation all raise the risks of deeper American military involvement.

Fourth, there is a better alternative than expanded war. That better policy consists of three parts in equal measure: Containment, carrots and sticks, and Contadora.

We need to contain and isolate the Sandinistas

We need a long-term strategy of carrots and sticks to change Sandinista behavior; and

We need active U.S. support for Contadora and negotiations.

First, we should contain and isolate the Sandinistas.

We should prevent the Soviet Union or its allies from developing an offensive capability in Central America that threatens United States security. We should support economic and military assistance to help strengthen the democracies of Central America against threats from Nicaragua or anywhere else. We should use skillful diplomacy, encouraging the support of our friends and allies, to isolate and contain Nicaragua—diplomatically, politically, economically, and militarily.

Second, we should use carrots and sticks to influence Sandinista behavior in years to come because, short of United States intervention, we cannot change their behavior in the near term.

If Nicaragua were to agree to a cease-fire, remove Soviet and Cuban advisers, reduce the size of its armed forces, or make progress toward national reconciliation and a pluralistic democracy, we could respond positively. We could suspend United States military exercises in the region, resume normal trade, and support bilateral and multilateral assistance for Nicaragua.

On the other hand, if Nicaragua's behavior worsened we could press Europe and Japan—now Nicaragua's largest trading partners—to cut trade and cooperate in blocking assistance. We could impose tougher economic sanctions, including an assets freeze and a prohibition on bank lending or travel to Nicaragua. Such steps, however, would only be effective if taken together with our friends and allies.

Third, we should vigorously support the Contadora negotiations.

The administration has only paid lip service to the idea of a multilateral, negotiated settlement:

The President's speech of March 16, 1986, does not once mention Contadora. There is no more revealing statement of this President's views on the Contadora process than this speech. It simply draws a blank on Contadora;

The President's diplomatic approach requires the Sandinistas to relinquish power. It cannot and will not succeed.

The United States has yet to make public comment on the third Contadora treaty draft issued 6 months ago.

If we don't like the draft, we should work to improve it. The current draft has many positive elements which serve U.S. interests.

If agreed and implemented by Nicaragua, it would:

Stop new military deliveries to the Sandinistas;

Establish a ceiling on the size of their military forces and a schedule for their reduction;

Prevent the establishment of Soviet or Cuban military bases;

Force Nicaragua to send home all foreign military advisers;

And end Nicaragua's support for the export of revolution.

A Contadora agreement would also substantially increase Latin American and Western European political pressure on Nicaragua to live up to treaty commitments for national reconciliation, A pluralistic democracy and free elections.

Why would Nicaragua ever live up to any deal it might cut with the United States through the Contadora process? Because its survival would depend on it.

The Sandinistas know that the heart of the bargain is that we would let them survive in exchange for stopping foreign policies we don't like and beginning to improve their domestic record;

If they reneged, all bets would be off, including any United States pledges at Contadora. With strong support from Western Europe and Latin America, the United States could make life for Nicaragua very difficult.

Nicaragua needs peace and economic development. The Soviets and Cuban's can't provide either one. Nicaragua knows that Latin America, Western Europe, and the United States hold those keys—and that only a Contadora agreement can lead them to open the door.

CONCLUSIONS

Mr. Chairman, the proponents of this legislation say that if you do not support an expanded war, the United States policy will fail. In my view, the proponents of funding the Contras overestimate what war can do and underestimate what diplomacy can achieve.

A vote for House Joint Resolution 540 today will not resolve the issue. The Congress, and the country, are simply too divided on this aspect of Central America policy to sustain the proposed military policy. A policy which is not sustainable cannot succeed.

A vote against House Joint Resolution 540 is a vote to concentrate United States energies and policy on those aspects of Central America policy on which there is a consensus, to build on that consensus in order to isolate and contain Nicaragua, and to work together with the democracies of Central and Latin America who oppose Nicaragua's policies but also oppose the Contra war.

Mr. Chairman, we need a better policy because a unilateral policy will not work:

A policy that favors Contadora negotiations over an expanded war will have the support of our friends and allies, and can work.

A policy that offers carrots and sticks to Nicaragua can work.

A policy that contains and isolates Nicaragua can work.

I urge a vote against House Joint Resolution 540 and for a better alternative.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the resolution.

Anyone who cares to look can see the historic parallels between the Nicaraguan revolution of 1979 and the Russian revolution of 1917. The overthrow of a hated despot by all elements of society working together, followed by the gradual squeezing out of the moderates by the Communists. Their cry of imminent foreign intervention to justify an immense military buildup then used to divert domestic attention and, together with martial law, to quell domestic dissent. Repression of the church and the press, formation of the neighborhood committees to identify those not committed to the government's ideals, and gradual elimination by assassination, execution, or imprisonment of "enemies of the people." Russia since 1917 and Nicaragua since 1979—it's all there to see and it's all the same.

Now, four new fragile democracies in Central America are facing the threat of subversion from the only totalitarian government left there, Nicaragua.

Our President's policy is to prevent that threat from succeeding, and there are over 15,000 brave men willing to fight to contain it.

There are some here who would turn their backs on these freedom fighters and give Communist subversion on our doorstep a free hand. Mr. Chairman, I'm not one of them.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOULTER].

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, today Members of the House will cast a momentous vote that will determine, in part, whether the people of Central America will have the opportunity to enjoy democratic freedoms we have in the United States, or fall victim to Marxist tyranny where no individual freedoms exist.

It's this simple: Will the United States continue to be the defender of freedom and democracy, or will we turn our backs on our friends to the south, leaving them to the designs of the Soviet-backed Sandinistas who have said their revolution is without frontiers? It is clear that Nicaragua is not the only country whose future is at stake. The Sandinistas have stated publicly that they have their eyes on all of Central America, with Mexico being their ultimate and most sought after prize. Should we not approve the President's request for aid it will signal to the Sandinistas and terrorists worldwide that we lack the resolve to defend the development of democratic institutions that are evolving throughout Latin America and elsewhere.

The Marxist strategy continues to rely on a war of patience and attrition. They test the resolve of the United States by seeing just how far they can go. Slowly but surely they grow stronger. Each delay in United States assistance to the freedom fighters contributes to the Sandinistas' growing strength. Meanwhile, the freedom fighters grow weaker. Though fairly large in number and steadily growing in support, the freedom fighters are ill-equipped to fight a protracted war with the Sandinistas. The Sandinistas know this, as do the Soviets. Without our assistance, the freedom fighters will most certainly lose this war of attrition.

The revolutionary promises of a democratic Nicaragua have gone unfulfilled. The true believers in democratic ideals were hoodwinked by a shrewd bunch of Marxist practitioners. What we are trying to do today is breathe new life into the democratic vision many Nicaraguans had in mind when the revolution took place in 1979. I urge my colleagues to provide the needed lifeblood which is necessary to make this vision a reality.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this measure.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOWERY].

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this measure.

Mr. Chairman, today the House of Representatives will vote on one of the most difficult and important foreign policy issues of our time. The magnitude of this decision is reflected in the unprecedented amount of mail and calls all of us have received from our constituents. I have heard from many constituents who stress the ill-effects of Contra aid and ask that we end any assistance to these rebels. Conversely, many other citizens in my district insist that we continue supporting the freedom fighters and help them with their struggle for freedom and democracy. If we examine all the competing factors in this debate, I firmly believe that the soundest policy is to support the Contras in Nicaragua as the best means of promoting democracy, stability, and peace throughout Central America. I would like to take this opportunity to explain the reasons which led me to this conclusion.

Perhaps it is best to examine the present regime in Nicaragua, ascertain its system and intents, and compare it with United States policy for the entire region. It will then be possible to weigh the various policy options available to the United States and select the one that best promotes a free, democratic, and peaceful Central America.

The most alarming aspect of the Nicaraguan system is its astounding military buildup. Today, the Sandinistas have the largest armed forces in Central America. There are active duty forces of 60,000, with a reserved militia adding another 50,000 people in arms. That is roughly 110,000 troops ready for speedy mobilization. Aside from raw numbers, the firepower of the Sandinistas is unmatched in the region. Their arsenal includes 150 tanks, 300 armored personnel carriers, over 40 helicopters (including 6 of the Soviets' advanced MI-24 Hind helicopters), over 200 artillery pieces, and 300 missile launchers. Compare this with neighboring Honduras (21,000 troops) and Costa Rica (which has no army) or even to the 15,000-strong Contra rebels, and it is evident that the Sandinista arms buildup is offensive in nature. Any objective observer of these facts must reach the same conclusion—that the Soviet/Cuban-supplied Sandinista army far exceeds any defensive needs and is offensive in nature.

Many opponents of Contra aid contend that United States hostility toward the Sandinistas has forced them to seek help from the Soviets and Cubans. The facts do not support this. The United States, albeit belatedly, cosponsored and voted for the Organization of American States [OAS] resolution calling for the replacement of the Somoza regime with the coalition opposition (which included the Sandinistas). During the first 18 months of the new government, the United States provided Nicaragua with 100,000 tons of food, some $118 million in bilateral economic assistance, and supported the flow of $1 billion from international lending institutions. It was only after this period (during the Carter presidency), when the Sandinistas imposed press censorship, began their military buildup, and revealed ties to the Soviets, that the United States cutoff aid to the Sandinistas. It must be acknowledged, therefore, that the Sandinistas preference for Soviet and Cuban friendship was voluntary in nature.

Let's take a look at the Sandinistas themselves. Few now doubt the Marxist-Leninist leanings of the Sandinistas. Humberto Ortega, Defense Minister, put it this way: "Marxism-Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution * * *." Commandants Bayardo Arce, in his speech to the political committee of the Nicaraguan Socialist Party in 1984 commented on the upcoming elections in this fashion: "For us then, the elections, viewed from that perspective, are a nuisance, just as a number of things that make up the reality of our revolution are a nuisance—In the future of our country, all changes through development is in the hands of the revolutionary authority * * *."

Unfortunately, the Sandinistas have backed up these words with actions. Radio and television news are under government control, and they broadcast only what the Sandinistas permit. There is only one opposition newspaper, La Prensa, and it is government-censored to the point that publication must sometimes be suspended for lack of news. On October 15, 1985, the Sandinistas suspended civil liberties. The church, political parties, labor unions, and the press were faced with increased censorship. The attack has been waged against all religious beliefs—Jewish, Protestant, and Catholic. In addition, the Sandinistas ended the long-standing policy of exempting seminarians from the draft and closed Radio Catolica on January 1, 1986. Compare this grim reality to the promises the Sandinistas made to the OAS for human rights, political pluralism, free elections, and a mixed economy. The Sandinistas record is clear and poor.

In essence, we have a militaristic government ruled by self-proclaimed Marxist-Leninists which exhibits all the traits of oppressive Communist regimes. Is there any other conclusion to draw except that the Sandinistas are committed to the doctrines of Lenin? Again, an objective observer must concede that the regime in Nicaragua is antidemocratic, pro-Soviet, and poses a potential threat to the entire region.

Still, some opponents of Contra aid say that these facts are insufficient justification for seeking what they see as the ultimate goal—the military overthrow of the Sandinistas. They suggest that if we leave the Sandinistas alone, they will behave in a peace-loving way, concerned only with the welfare of Nicaraguans. Aside from the historical inconsistencies of applying this rationale to Communist countries, it is necessary to examine specific Nicaraguan behavior.

The Nicaraguan Government has embraced the likes of Muammar Qadhafi, Yasser Arafat, and members of terrorist organizations throughout the world, referring to their shared struggle. In addition to this symbolic display, the Sandinistas are aiding the guerrillas in El Salvador. Since 1979, the Salvadoran insurgents have relied on Nicaragua for weapons, training, intelligence, and sanctuary—the guerrilla high command is based in Nicaragua. There is also evidence which suggests the Sandinistas are subverting the governments of Honduras and Colombia.

Clearly, then, the threat to Central America is real. The citizens in Nicaragua face oppression at home and the neighboring fragile democracies are feeling the intrusive arm of the Sandinista military machine. The question now becomes: how can the United States best attain the twofold goal of internal reconciliation for all Nicaraguans and external stability (ending Sandinista-backed subversion in the democracies of Central America)?

All of us would like to see this achieved through peaceful negotiation. The Contadora process and Church-mediated talks offer the best hope for a lasting settlement and the United States has fully supported both these approaches. Since 1981, the United States has sent over 40 diplomatic missions to Latin America and has held nine rounds of direct talks with the Sandinistas. The United States maintains a standing offer to talk any time the Sandinistas wish to discuss changes in four principal areas of concern: Soviet/Cuban presence; military buildup; support for subversion; and internal reconciliation. It is the Sandinistas who have categorically refused to open dialog with the rebels—something President Duarte agreed to in El Salvador.

Moreover, the record is replete with examples of Sandinista intransigence on Contadora. For example, last December, Daniel Ortega proposed in writing to the OAS a postponement until May 1986 of further Contadora negotiations. The OAS General Assembly, meeting in Cartagena, voted 24 to 1 (Nicaragua) to recommend continuation of the negotiations. The one draft treaty the Sandinistas did endorse contained no verification or enforcement provisions for reducing military stockpiles and holding free elections. In short, it is the Sandinistas who refuse to seriously negotiate.

Nevertheless, the President has agreed to postpone deliverance of offensive military materials to the Contras for a period of 90 days. This grace period will afford the Sandinistas yet another chance to seriously engage in meaningful dialog. In addition, a special envoy will be sent to the capitals of the Contadora and support group nations urging a unified effort for a regional peace accord. In light of past Sandinista behavior, I believe this is an eminently fair proposal.

A viable resistance force, ever-ready for negotiation but also willing to fight, is the best hope for convincing the Sandinistas that a negotiated settlement is in their interest. It is naive to believe the Sandinistas will come to the peace table without the impetus of a viable Contra force. Strength of United States resolve in this matter is critical.

For the reasons outlined above, I believe continued assistance—both humanitarian and military—is in order. Before ending this discussion, however, I would like to address some of the concerns often expressed by my constituents.

The most frequently aired complaint is that the Contras are unpopular Somocistas who can't win. It is important to recognize that the rebel force has grown from 3,000 in 1981 to 15,000 to 20,000 today. The opposition includes people from all walks of life including a large number of campesinos. While some of the Contras are undoubtedly ex-Guardia, the vast majority are ordinary citizens disillusioned with the Sandinistas. Moreover, the three leaders of the United Nicaraguan Opposition—Adolfo Calero, Arturo Cruz, and Alfonso Robelo—all fought to overthrow Somoza. In essence, the Contras are a growing force of peasants, shopkeepers, with Somocistas comprising a smaller and smaller percentage of this group.

To those who say the Contras can't win, I agree that yes, unarmed they can't win. They certainly can't be expected to win by lying down in front of Sandinista tanks, Philippines-style. Under Leninist regimes, Philippine and Solidarity approaches do not fare well. Nor do vastly out-gunned, out-trained guerrilla armies do well against Cuban-Soviet-style military machines. The Contras cannot win the way North Vietnam won in South Vietnam. However, they can win in the way the Sandinistas won in Managua—not by rolling over the Sandinista army, but by controlling the countryside, gaining popular support, and forcing the Sandinistas to recognize that their oppressive and subversive policies are untenable.

Another frequent statement is that the Nicaraguans held elections and that the people of Nicaragua worked their will. The facts say otherwise.

Opposition candidates were harrassed and censored from La Prensa and, not surprisingly, the government controlled media did not carry opposition statements. As the New York Times put it:

> Only the naive believe that Sunday's election in Nicaragua was democratic or legitimizing proof of the Sandinistas' popularity. The result was ordained when opposition parties tamely accepted terms that barred them from power. . . .

A further concern often aired is that we can't afford this $100 million. It must be noted that this is a transfer of existing funds and requires no new appropriations. In addition, if this is a legitimate security concern, which I believe it is, then this amount is trivial.

The last argument that opponents of contra aid cite is that Central America does not support United States assistance to the freedom fighters. A recent Costa Rican gallup poll indicates widespread local support for United States efforts in the region. As for public statements by Latin leaders in opposition to the United States, I offer this explanation—what do you expect? Costa Rica, a country with no army, faces a 100,000 plus force across its border. Does one expect Costa Rica publicly to come out in support of overthrowing its neighbor, given an isolationist U.S. Congress and a rising military power in Nicaragua? But many leaders of these fledgling democracies told the Kissinger Commission that they want the United States to help the Contras and control the growing threat of Managua.

It is absolutely vital for all Americans to pinpoint the issue at hand. The history of Nicaragua, and indeed all of Central America, has been one of military dictatorship, widespread depravation and poverty. In fairness to the Sandinistas, it must be acknowledged that they have implemented modest improvements in health care and education. However, these gains do not, in themselves, justify their massive military buildup, their oppression at home, and their subversion abroad. Moreover, more substantial social gains have been made in the neighboring democracies of Honduras and El Salvador.

The issue at hand is whether the United States will ignore a substantial segment of Nicaraguans—arguably a majority—who seek to restore their revolution. Those brave men and women fighting the Sandinistas are risking their lives for privileges which many Americans take for granted. The issue is whether the United States will cutoff the freedom fighters and watch them whither away as the Sandinistas consolidate their control and continue to work on their neighbors. This issue is too important and the need for action too great for the Congress not to act.

If we do not strengthen the resistance now, our worry in the future will be a very different one—a far more serious one. Our worry will be a Soviet and Cuban base on the mainland of Latin America, a regime whose consolidated power will allow it to spread and directly threaten Mexican oil fields, the Panama Canal and Caribbean shipping lanes. And nothing is more likely to force American military intervention than the consolidation of an aggressive, highly militarized, pro-Soviet regime in the area. The contras want to do their own fighting. Cut them off, and the only body in the hemisphere able to restrain the Sandinistas will be the U.S. Army.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support this request for assistance to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. PACKARD].

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewomen from Rhode Island [Mrs. SCHNEIDER].

Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LENT].

Mr. LENT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, what we decide in the House today—whether to approve aid to the Contras or deny it—will affect the political future of that nation and of the entire Central American region.

Moreover, it will seriously affect the security of the United States in this hemisphere for many years to come.

Certainly, from an ideological standpoint, the hope of democracy as opposed to Daniel Ortega's Marxist-Lenist military regime, is critical.

But even more fundamental, and what I personally perceive to be the deciding factor in this debate, is the fact that the Sandinista government threatens to destabilize Central America and ultimately the entire hemisphere.

The massive flow of Soviet-Cuban arms and materiel into Nicaragua—now estimated at approximately $500 million—is no secret. A government supported by Soviets and Cubans is bound to be a source of constant instability in a region of fledgling democracies, many of which are weak militarily. It took Daniel Ortega's flight to Moscow a few days after the Contra aid vote last year to dramatize the Soviet connection, and since that time, the situation has not changed. Neighboring countries in the region—Honduras, El Salvador, Costa Rica—regard the Sandinista government as a serious military threat to their sovereignty.

I don't think anyone—Republican or Democrat—could argue the fact that the United States has a vital interest in preventing the establishment of a Soviet base in Nicaragua. Yet my colleagues who oppose this aid package offer no alternative solution.

They place their faith in a diplomatic process that, in my view, is doomed to failure because of the nature of a key participant, the Ortega government.

Mr. Ortega and his associates gained power through force of arms and they are not going to relinquish that power, either in whole or in part, because of the Contadora process. The Sandinistas understand one thing and one thing only—force. And they will not seriously negotiate until they are forced to do so.

A democratic Nicaragua is the only hope that this threat will not materialize. This is a goal worthy of support and those willing to fight for the cause are deserving of American support. Thank you.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, it seems clear to me that if client rulers of the Soviet Union obtain external assistance to maintain their rule, certainly those citizens who are deprived of liberty have the right to ask for external assistance to reclaim it.

The Sandinistas' military buildup in Nicaragua and their dependence upon Soviet bloc and Cuban security advisers began shortly after Anastasio Somoza was ousted and before the advent of anti-Sandinista military operations. Since 1979, the Sandinistas have received at least $500 million in military assistance from Cuba and the Soviet bloc. There are 6,000 to 7,500 Cuban military and civilian advisers in Nicaragua. In addition, there are about 300 other advisers from the Soviet bloc, Libya, and the PLO. The Sandinistas have received sophisticated Soviet military hardware, including the formidable Hind helicopter gunships. Cuban military advisers are found down to the company level and are playing an increasing operational role, including the piloting of the Hind helicopters supplied by the Soviet Union.

Those who contend that the Sandinista government in Nicaragua is a legitimate government, sustained by the people, need only look at the facts to see that it is not. Its power is sustained through repression, foreign assistance and those who are bent on securing Nicaragua as a Communist stronghold on the American Continent.

Let there be no misunderstanding as to what the goals and objectives of the Sandinistas are. Statements by the Sandinistas and their allies plainly spell it out:

On July 19, 1981, Tomas Borge, the Sandinista Minister of Interior, said, "This revolution goes beyond our borders. Our revolution was always internationalist. * * *"

On September 1, 1984, Colonel Muammar Qadhafi was quoted as saying, "Libyan fighters, arms, and backing to the Nicaraguan people have reached them because they fight with us. They fight America on its own ground."

Sandinista leaders and PLO leader Yasir Arafat have voiced their sympathy for each other and their common cause, as Tomas Borge did in 1980, saying, "We say to our brother Arafat that Nicaragua is his land and the PLO cause is the cause of the Sandinistas."

Before coming to power, the Sandinista revolutionaries promised that they would hold free elections, guarantee human rights and remain nonaligned in foreign policy. They have betrayed their many promises. In early 1980, the Sandinistas signed an accord with Moscow and ratified the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. In 1980, the Sandinistas reneged on its promise to hold elections, announcing instead that elections would not take place and banned electoral activities until 1984. On October 15, 1985, the Sandinistas extended restrictions on fundamental civil rights guaranteed in the Statute of Rights and Guarantees of Nicaraguans. The October crackdown formalizes de facto Sandinista restrictions on civil liberties that have been imposed in varying degrees of severity since the Sandinistas came to power in 1979. Some of the same people who fought tyranny under Somoza are now fighting repression at the hands of the Sandinistas.

Let there be no misunderstanding as to the extent to which the Sandinistas have gone to deny their people basic civil rights. Some of the rights and freedoms which have been suspended include: Freedom of information, freedom of expression, right of peaceful assembly, right to a trial and freedom from arbitrary interference in personal life, family, home, and correspondence, Catholics, protestants, and Jews have been the target of severe religious harassment and persecution as part of the Sandinista policy to supplant the teachings of these religions with the Marxist-Leninist doctrine of the Sandinistas.

According to accounts from ex-prisoners, ex-Sandinistas, Nicaraguan defense lawyers, and relief agencies, there are approximately 11,000 to 13,000 political prisoners being held within the prison network operated by the Sandinista regime. The Sandinista military along with State Security Forces have indiscriminately imprisoned political opponents of the Sandinista government since the beginning of 1980. Accounts gathered from former political prisoners describe a policy by the Sandinista police and security forces of using systematic means of torture to extract information from civilian prisoners, intimidate those who oppose the government, and weaken the resistance of the opposition.

Under such circumstances, it is not surprising that more than 400,000 Nicaraguans have fled their country between 1979 and 1985. These people have fled Nicaragua to escape this terror and thousands more stand ready to flee, both in Nicaragua and throughout the region, if this terror imposed by the Sandinista regime is allowed to continue.

Mr. Chairman, the President and I have a commitment to democracy in Nicaragua. The people in Central America are waiting for Congress to make up its mind as to whether it is also committed to democracy in Nicaragua. Negotiations have failed and only provide the Sandinistas the necessary time to complete their consolidation of power in the region. We cannot abandon the brave men and women—the trade unionists, church people, businessmen and women, the farmers and ordinary citizens who are struggling, both from within and from exile for the freedoms for which they waged a valiant revolution in 1979. They do not ask us to fight the fight for them, they only ask that we help even out the odds against them.

One hundred and fifty years ago, Col. William Barrett Travis and 187 brave men stood outnumbered and outgunned at the Alamo. There, Colonel Travis drew a line in the sand to see who would stay and fight with him. Mr. Chairman, now is the time for us to draw the line in the sand. The question remains, are we for democracy, or are we not?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WEBER].

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support to the resolution.

Mr. KASTENMEIER, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a personal observation on aid to the Nicaraguan Contras. I am one of the few Members of the House presently serving who served during the period of our slow but steady descent into the quagmire of the Vietnamese civil war.

There may be those who dismiss any comparison between Vietnam and Nicaragua as ancient history or as being irrelevant to present day circumstances. But, the similarities between Vietnam and Nicaragua are striking and we are still living with the tragic results of our experience in Vietnam.

In South Vietnam, a nation about which we knew little, we propped up government after government, each lacking in any political legitimacy and each failing to win the supoport of the people of South Vietnam. We understand the power of nationalism in Vietnam and the desire of the Vietnamese people to rid their nation of forces from foreign powers. Our military advisers in South Vietnam grew into military battalions, and when we found that the South Vietnamese military couldn't carry the fight, these battalions became military divisions. We had a President who became obsessed with a domino theory which held that is South Vietnam toppled, all of the Southeast Asia would fall to a Communist force directed from China and Moscow. In the end, we sided with a decaying political, social, and economic class against a popular mass movement and we lost.

With Nicaragua, again a nation about which the American people really know very little, we are propping up a counterrevolutionary force which has no political legitimacy and very little if any, popular support among the people of Nicaragua. We are again underestimating the spirit of nationalism among the Nicaraguan people and their deep-rooted suspicion of the powerful Yanqui from the north. We, again, are supporting the forces of reaction against a popular mass movement. We, again, have a President who is obsessed with a red menace which, he believes, is directed from Moscow and which, he maintains, will sweep up to the southern borders of the United States if the Sandinista regime is not eliminated. We, again, are finding that the forces which we are supporting are unable, on their own, to win a military victory. U.S. military advisers which will be attached to the Contra forces will, I fear, be augmented by U.S. military forces once the administration comes to accept the fact that the Contras, by themselves, will be unable to overthrow the Sandinistas.

Unlike Vietnam, however, I believe that United States military forces, after paying a price, will be able to conquer the Nicaraguan Armed Forces. But, we will learn that we will never be able to conquer the spirit of the Nicaraguan people and they will hate us for occupying, again, their nation.

History is a teacher, and if we fail to learn the lessons of history, then we are destined to repeat the mistakes of the past. Let us not relive our sad experience of Vietnam through a dirty war in Nicaragua.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, one of the most obvious aspects in this debate is that to a very large degree it is frankly partisan. The Democrats, with some few exceptions, are strongly opposed to providing aid to the anti-Communist groups in Nicaragua; while the Republicans, also with few exceptions, support the President's initiatives.

But it has not always been thus in the long history of our Nation. On the Democratic side of the aisle I daresay an overwhelming majority of Democrats—if you ask them who is their most revered President—will say Harry Truman.

But I wonder how many of these members—who are determinedly resisting the pleas of the White House in this debate—remember that one of President Truman's most courageous and most effective achievements was virtually a mirror image of what President Reagan is asking this 99th Congress to approve?

When President Truman took over the Nation's leadership following the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt, his first official contact with the Soviets was at the Potsdam Conference outside East Berlin. Mr. Truman came back home deeply pleased that he had achieved a warm, personal relationship with Marshall Stalin and regularly referred to him as "good, old Uncle Joe."

But it didn't take very long before that form of address for the Soviet dictator was replaced by some of the more colorful language Mr. Truman used when he really got his dander up.

At Potsdam Stalin had agreed to get his Red army forces out of the Azerbaijan district of Iran, which—during the war—had been the narrow, southern corridor through which United States lend-lease materials had reached the Soviet Union. But Harry Truman suddenly discovered that "good, old Joe" had been dragging his heels in Iran. Truman believed that promises should be lived up to. He gave Joseph Stalin a piece of his mind; and in short order, the Soviet troops were out of Azerbaijan, though subsequently they went back in.

But that was only the beginning. Before long Mr. Truman was advised that Communist agents—and armed guerrillas—were moving in in force to take over two other countries adjacent to the Soviet Union—Greece, the ancient birthplace of democracy, and Turkey. This is very much the same way the Soviets are taking over Nicaragua behind the cover of the Communist Sandinistas and what they had tried to do in Grenada but fortunately failed.

Once again Mr. Truman got his dander up. The President went before a joint session of Congress on March 12, 1947—nearly 39 years to the day—and called on Congress to appropriate funds to both Greece and Turkey—not just humanitarian aid, but also military aid to enable both countries to preserve their integrity and wipe out effectively the insidious Communist infiltration coming from Yugoslavia and Albania. And the peril to us after 39 years has moved within just 2 driving hours on the North American Continent from the borders of the United States.

If you have visited Greece you have seen the statue of President Turman which the people of Greece erected to express their deep gratitude to that courageous and outspoken President for his decisive action in enabling Greece to preserve her historical democracy and drive out the Communist subverters.

I have never heard a single Democrat who ever faulted Harry Truman for saving Greece and Turkey.

So why is it, I wonder, that what Harry Truman was courageous enough to do in 1947—and was made possible, by the way, with the broad support that he got from that terrible Republican 80th Congress—a Democratic 99th Congress now appears to be turning down a very similar initiative to ensure freedom and self-government in place of Communist oppression on the North American Continent.

Incidentally, both leaders learned the true meaning of communism through sad experience and both fought it bravely and effectively—President Truman in those early days in the White House, and President Reagan as a result of his experiences with Communist penetration of the Screen Actors' Guild.

As the philosopher George Santayana put it: Those who are unwilling to learn from the mistakes of histroy are condemned to repeat them.

Mr. Chairman, we are told this will be a very close vote on the matter of Contra aid. Let me just say that, if all those Democrats who claim Harry Truman as their political hero will emulate what Harry Truman urged Congress in 1947 to do in stopping communism in the Mediterranean and will support President Reagan's very similar plea to stop communism on our own North American Continent, the bill we argue here today is bound to pass by a wide margin.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, aid to the Contras has become a big issue; $100 million of reprogrammed funding would seem at first glance to be a modest sum, but the President has given this proposal prime importance and urgency. Naturally, opponents have given it equal importance.

The President has spelled out the threat in stark terms on television. Nicaragua is a small country with minimal resources, but he sees it as a mainland foothold for communism and a source for the spread of revolution and terror in Central America.

Nobody has a good word for the Sandinista government. It is Communist and highly repressive. Its advisors from other Communist countries, its substantial military presence, and its aggressive attitude have made neighboring countries understandably nervous.

Opponents of the proposal have been apparently willing to stipulate that the Sandinistas are nasty and dangerous, but have no practical solutions to contain them, to change their behavior, or to root them out. I am troubled by the fact that extreme-left dictatorships never exit gracefully. Unlike rightwing dictatorships, which, in Latin America, often fade away, Communist dictators have to go out feet first.

What bothers me about the President's proposal is that I don't think that the Contras are a force sufficent to remove a threat as massive as the President describes. The Contras have been in place for years without attracting many recruits, or even much attention for that matter. An extra $100 million would seem unlikely to make them much stronger, or to bring the Sandinistas to their knees.

To his credit, the President has been cooperative and accommodation about being willing to hold up most of the funds pending 90 days more of negotiations with specifically stated objections. The funds won't be available until those negotiations have not been successful. His proposed Executive order, worked out after discussions with a group of Congresmen, makes his overall proposal more extractive.

This additional proposal of the President, seems to be close to a proposal the House Democrat leadership is now said to be willing to schedule in mid-April. This narrowing of differences is not uncommon in issues of this kind in which the President has taken such a strong position. The Nicaragua problem is one on which there should be a national consensus rather than a narrow partisan majority.

Unfortunately, the House majority has refused to allow amendments so that this body might reach such a consensus.

While I do believe that the proposal will be ineffective it will at least be a holding action. The alternative of a negative vote exposes the Contras and leaves us without any policy. I think it is unfortunate that both sides are dug in so deeply.

When all is said today, I come to several conclusions. I don't like the proposal of the President, and I don't like the idea of voting down the only proposal before this House, and one on which the President has staked his leadership.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to House Joint Resolution 540, the President's request for $100 million for aid to the Contras in Nicaragua.

I recognize that the Sandinista regime has grown increasingly repressive and has sought to consolidate its power further. Regardless, the issue remains how we should deal with this regime. The President seeks to use military assistance to solve the problems in Central America through violence and bloodshed. I prefer that the United States pursue negotiations and diplomacy to deal with the problems of Central America, as urged by our democratic allies in the region.

First, I feel that it is necessary to put the situation in Nicaragua into the proper perspective. Nicaragua is a nation with an area slightly less than that of the State of Alabama and has a population of 3 million—just about the same number as Wayne and Macomb Counties in Michigan.

It is also important to take a close look at exactly who are the Contras and what the United States would be supporting should the Congress approve this aid. First, the Contras are equally, if not more, abusive of human rights than the Sandinistas. The administration has attempted to deemphasize the brutality of the Contras. However, the reports of human rights abuses by the Contras are too frequent, too widespread and too well documented by unbiased observers to be ignored.

One of the primary tactics of the main Contra group [FDN] is to attack any organs that it views as part of the Sandinista government. These targets include agricultural collectives, health clinics, and schools. The unfortunate result has been the deaths of innocent civilians.

In addition, the military leadership of the FDN is dominated by former members of Somoza's brutal and hated National Guard. Last year 46 of the top 48 military leaders of the FDN were former National Guardsmen. Although the administration has noted that the overall percentage of FDN members who are former National Guard members is relatively small, the President has refused to recognize that these members of Somoza's security force continue to dominate the miltiary hierachy of the FDN. This is one of the primary reasons why the Contras lack popular support in Nicaragua.

The Contras are further plagued by serious factional divisions and an inability of the factions to work together. The FDN is but one of many guerrilla groups. A second major group under the leadership of Eden Pastora, a one-time Sandinista, has refused to work with the FDN because of the extensive presence of ex-National Guardsmen.

In addition to being factionally divided, the Contras are also militarily weak. Estimates indicate that the Contra currently number 13,000 to 14,000 soldiers. However, upward of 70 percent of the FDN Contras have not left Honduras since October. Only 6,000 Contras have recently operated in Nicaragua. Even with U.S. aid, the Contras would be in no position to challenge the Sandinistas militarily.

Instead of providing $100 million to the Contras, the United States should push ongoing diplomatic efforts of our Central and South American allies. In January the leaders of the Contadora group issued what has become known as the Caraballeda statement calling for the "termination of external support to the irregular forces operating in the region." This is just the latest in a series of ongoing efforts by the Contadora group to achieve a regional peace plan.

The nations supporting this effort include Panama, Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, Argentina, Brazil, Peru, and Uruguay, all of which are members of the Contadora or the Contadora support groups. The latest statement has also been endorsed by other nations in Central America. This action has breathed fresh life into the Contadora process. To approve the President's request would slam shut the door on a potential peaceful solution.

Mr. Chairman, in times of tight budgetary constraints and the guillotine of Gramm-Rudman, there are much wiser uses of $100 million. The President's request is cloaked in the guise of a transfer of already appropriated funds from Pentagon ammunition accounts. The Secretary of Defense has made it clear that the administration intends to make up the money in ammunition accounts from unappropriated and unauthorized funds. There are only two possible sources for this funding. Either $100 million can be added to the deficit or $100 million more can be cut from domestic programs. If we were to approve any additional funding, I would prefer to see this money added to child nutrition, education or job-training programs—programs that have been devastated by budget cuts and that will provide concrete benefits to our Nation's citizens.

In closing, I feel compelled to comment on the tenor of debate on this issue and, in particular, some statements from the administration questioning the patriotism of opponents of Contra aid. In my 22 years on the House, I have never heard such personal, red baiting attacks as those we have heard from the White House over the past month. I served in uniform in two wars—World War II and the Korean war. I resent any implication that I or any of my colleagues who oppose military aid to Contras are less than patriotic.

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Chairman, for the last 4 or 5 years, this body has been debating the question of whether we should aid the resistance forces or give negotiations just one more chance. Except for last year when a strictly humanitarian aid package was approved, negotiations have won every time.

What has this restraint done for reconciliation in Nicaragua and peace in Central America? Nothing.

What restraint have the Sandinistas shown in their military buildup and internal repression? None.

So why are so many people saying "negotiate, negotiate" when the Sandinistas will agree only to peace proposals that include no verification measures? And, most importantly, refuse to talk with their opposition?

There is no question that we have to continue efforts to negotiate, but it has become abundantly clear that the Sandinistas will not agree to live up to the promises they made to the Organization of American States in 1979 without pressure being brought to bear on them. Seven years later, it's time to face up to that fact and get serious about helping the resistance forces.

Just once, I would like to hear someone opposed to military aid offer a realistic alternative.

They say don't send military aid, it will escalate the conflict. What do Soviet MI-24 Hind helicopters, the infamous flying tanks shipped to Nicaragua in November 1984, do to the conflict? What did $200 million in Soviet and Cuban military aid from May 1984 to September 1985 do to the conflict? If those opposed to military aid will recall, that is the very period of time during which the United States provided no aid—military or humanitarian—to the Nicaraguan resistance.

It seems to me that if the theories of those opposed to U.S. aid to the resistance were valid, the Sandinistas would have halted its military buildup and made some good faith efforts toward negotiations and reconciliation. Yet they continued to refuse to talk to the resistance forces, and in the Contadora negotiations, they rejected verification procedures that all of the parties to Contadora—including Nicaragua—had previously agreed to.

I am puzzled. What history of Sandinista actions supports the idea that negotiations without military pressure are going to work? Perhaps the problem is that we see different goals for negotiations. The goal I see for negotiations is a Nicaraguan Government that fulfills the promises made to the Organization of American States in 1979. A government that seeks reconciliation among the Nicaraguan people, a government that is not a threat to its neighbors, a government that does not support terrorism and drug trafficking, a government that operates in a pluralistic society in which freedoms and human rights are respected.

I get the uneasy feeling that those opposed to military aid are resigned to the Sandinistas running Nicaragua as a totalitarian police state, let them have Nicaragua. World public opinion will keep them in their own country.

My only response to that is world public opinion hasn't kept the Soviet Union out of Afghanistan or Vietnam or out of Cambodia.

I have even heard some people say that the Soviets have no interest in establishing another Cuba on the North American mainland. Why do they think the Soviet Union, Cuba, and Libya have been investing hundreds of millions of dollars in military hardware, training, and construction in Nicaragua? To build a vacation resort?

And while the United States Congress repeatedly debates the same issues and refuses to face the issue squarely, what is happening in Nicaragua?

In January of this year, Cardinal Obando y Bravo wrote to the Secretary General of the United Nations outlining the government's attacks on the Catholic Church and stating the Nicaraguan bishops' belief that the purposes of these activities is to, among other things, reduce it to a church of silence. This is the same Obando y Bravo who was an active opponent of the Somoza regime. We listened to him then, and I believe we should listen to him now.

There are no easy answers to the situation in Nicaragua. We have to look at alternatives and judge which offers the best opportunity for protecting the security interests of the United States and of our Central American neighbors, and which offers the best hope for a free and peaceful future for the Nicaraguan people. Military aid is the only alternative offered that has any real hope of achieving these goals.

The Nicaraguan resistance seeks no territorial gain. These people are seeking an end to bloodshed in their country.

All they want is leverage to get to the bargaining table.

The least we can do is to provide them that leverage. I urge your support of this resolution.

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to speak in support of the proposed $100 million aid package for the Contras in Nicaragua.

The civil war in Nicaragua has presented this country with a foreign policy dilemma. This issue has invoked a wide disparity in public opinion which runs the gambit from protecting our national interests to the outcries of American interventionism. Unfortunately those who advocate a laissez-faire approach and oppose the Contra cause have closed their eyes to the overriding issues of a democratic balance in Central America and the long term security interests of the United States.

The Sandinista government led by Daniel Ortega have been masquerading as a model for democracy in Central America while in reality they have pursued a course which embraces the communist ideology permeating from the Kremlin.

Their open alliance with the Soviet Union along with a propensity to export subversion in the region demonstrates a clear and present danger to hemispheric stability.

Although the Contras possess some misgivings they do represent the only legitimate deterrent to Sandinista adventurism and Soviet expansion in Central America. To refuse to support this option will only lead to increased subversive activities in the region, and the realization that the only viable alternative left will be the presence of American soldiers. The revolution may not succeed with U.S. help, but it will certainly be destined to failure without it. Anyone who is fearful of a direct U.S. military move in Nicaragua should be eager to assist in bolstering the Contra movement.

The danger of escalated civil unrest in Central America is only heightened by the lack of commitment to the Contras who seek only to finalize the democratic revolution that the Ortega government repressed. In fact the Contras are no more guilty of human rights violations than are the Sandinistas who are violating the basic freedoms of the entire population. Moreover the reports of Contra atrocities are fradulently manufactured by the Sandinistas for the edification of the international media. Their principal goal is to disseminate false information about the nature of their own system so as to convince the world community that they are really not Communists.

Opponents of Contra aid will continue to cite the glaring errors of the Vietnam era and the potential ramifications that may occur in Nicaragua. Those errors and the loss of American lives may in fact occur if we abandon the goals of the Contras, whose purpose is to bring about a democratic sharing of government through an honestly elected government. A goal that the Sandinistas paid lip service to during the overthrow of General Somoza.

If the Contra objective is not eventually reached we will have a Soviet satellite similar to that of East Germany, Hungary, and Cuba at the doorsteps of this country.

In security terms, Central America is of considerable importance to the United States. An unstable Central America presents a grave threat to both the Panama Canal and Mexico. A militarily powerful Nicaragua committed to the interests of Moscow will eventually force the United States to divert more and more resources to protecting neighboring democracies in the region. In time of war, the Sandinistas could provide bases for Soviet planes and ships that would endanger vital American shipping interests through the Panama Canal.

If the United States abandons the Contras, it will be tantamount to an open invitation to the Soviets, who have already supplied the Ortega regime with an array of economic and military aid. Failure on our part to assist in the democrative revolution will allow the Warsaw Pact to build a second beachhead on the North American Continent.

There are some who may argue that Nicaragua is a developing democratic entity which is devoid of any outside influence. If that is the case how can these same people justify the presence of Cubans, Bulgarians, Libyans, Czechs, North Koreans, East Germans, Vietnamese, and elements of the PLO operating in various capacities within the borders of Nicaragua. The hands of international communism are clearly outstretched to Daniel Ortega.

Congress must decide now whether it will stifle international communism in Central America or let it spread like a cancer through the democracies of North America. Unfortunately in Nicaragua today there can be no self-determination as long as the Soviet Union and its clientele are allowed to nurture and grow on our back doorstep.

If we choose to deny these friends of democracy a real chance at self-determination we will be condemning the Nicaraguan people and very possibly our Latin American neighbors to a turbulent period of Communist domination that someday may reach our shores.

Mr. FAWELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to express my thoughts in reference to this most difficult question of "aid to the Contras."

LEGITIMATE, NEW REVOLUTION IN NICARAGUA

First, I believe there is a new revolution going on in Nicaragua. There are 16,000 to 20,000 young men, ages 17 to 24, mostly compesinos, farmers, who have volunteered, without pay, to fight in this new revolution. There were only 6,000 Sandinistas who fought the revolution against Somoza. It is difficult for me to assume that these young men, many of whom are Sandinista army deserters, will volunteer for rugged battlefield duty unless, indeed, there is significant disenchantment with what the Government of Nicaragua is doing to its people. I believe that disenchantment is now widespread throughout Nicaragua. A successful Contra revolution is possible if the United States will lead the way to a unity of all anti-Sandinista forces including the FDN, the Southern Opposition Bloc [BOS] led by Eden Pastora and Alfredo Cesar and Brooklyn Rivera's Misurasata Miskito Indians.

NICARAGUA—A MILITARY POWER

Second, knowledgeable estimates are that Nicaragua today has 145,000 trained men under arms.[1] They are professionally trained under Soviet and Cuban military advisers. They are well equipped with modern weapons, including 154 Soviet tanks and, just recently, Soviet helicopter gunships. Nicaragua has reportedly received more than $500 million in military aid from the Soviets alone. There has been an escalation of the military buildup by the Sandinistas during the past 2 years. Most of the military buildup came as a result of weapons' deliveries from the Soviets, Cubans and most of the Communist world while the United States maintained a policy of no arms shipments to the Contras.

NICARAGUA—A TOTALITARIAN STATE

Third, the promises of the Sandinistas to the Organization of American States to form a democracy, a pluralistic society and one which is not aligned with the East or West has been openly broken. Nicaragua is today a totalitarian state. It exports terrorism and revolution. There is no freedom of the press in Nicaragua. There are no trade unions. The right to strike by labor is outlawed. The church is persecuted and censored. Open-air Masses are prohibited, the Catholic radio station has been shut down, its newspaper suppressed, its printing press confiscated, its social welfare office seized; seminarians have been illegally drafted into military service and imprisoned and priests deported. Civil rights have been taken from the people. The International League of Human Rights estimates that there are now between 3,500 and 7,000 political soners in Nicaragua, not including the 2,500 National Guardsmen. The deterioration of civil rights began soon after the Sandinistas took power, while the United States was given $100 million in economic aid to Nicaragua and before the Contras were ever heard of.

Robert Leiken, in a recent edition of the New Republic, sums it up as follows:

> The once enormously popular support for the Sandinistas has virtually vanished, and their power now depends on a military and security apparatus built by Moscow and Havana.

CONTRAS CAN WIN

It is said that the Contras cannot win such a revolution against the superior military strength of the Sandinistas. But then revolutions never do seem to have much of a chance in Marxist-Leninist nations. And to be sure, if we give the Sandinistas and their Soviet and Cuban allies much more time, Nicaragua may well be molded in a permanent Communist form. But I don't believe it is too late. I don't believe, at this time, the conscript army of the Sandinistas has the will to defend

[1] That total is made up of about 63,000 regular army troops, 22,000 reserves and a 60,000 man militia. (Source, Chicago Tribune, March 15, 1986, Vincent J. Schodolski)

a system in which they basically do not believe. Nor do I believe that the Contras' winning is the whole name of the game.

WITHOUT AID, NO SERIOUS NEGOTIATIONS

I believe it is naive to assume, given the military power now in the hands of the government of Nicaragua, that the Sandinistas would seriously negotiate for democracy and freedom in Nicaragua once the challenge of the new revolution is snuffed out. And I believe the new revolution will be snuffed out if America will not give it military and humanitarian aid.

WILL AID DRAW UNITED STATES INTO WARS

Will aid to the Contras draw the United States into war? I think the reply to that question has been eloquently answered by the editors of the New Republic:

Nothing is more likely to force American military intervention than the consolidation of an aggressive, highly militarized, pro-Soviet regime in the area. The Contras want to do their own fighting. Cut them off, and the only body in the hemisphere able to restrain the Sandinistas will be the U.S. Army. Of course, American military involvement can never be ruled out. But destroying the only indigenous armed opposition to the Nicaraguans hardly seems the way to prevent it.

SALIENT QUESTION

I believe the salient question before this Congress is not over the respective morals of today's, admittedly ill-trained Contras, and the conscripted young men who form the Sandinista army. It is a tragedy that a civil war pits these young men against each other. But the division is there. And it is real. The question before this Congress is which group, today's Contras, or the government of Nicaragua, better represents the possibilities of freedom and democracy for Nicaraguans and Central Americans and which group offers the greatest hope for stability in Central America.

I do not mean to imply by these words that I endorse all that the administration has done in Central America. I would prefer to hear the administration talk more about how it is attempting to implement the development and economic aid recommendations of the Kissinger Commission so that what has happened in Nicaragua will not happen in other Central American nations. We now know that abject poverty, injustices and closed political systems have been the genesis of the people's problems in Central America. We have much to do also in promoting a broad national movement within the resistance forces for a democratics solution to the Nicaraguan crisis.

But exchanging the totalitarian state, run by Somoza, for another one, run by the Sandinistas and ignoring the Contras' revolution, as though it has no significance, is no solution. Again, allow me to quote the editors of The New Republic:

Those who advocate dramatic American intervention in pro-American dictatorships should not be suddenly stricken with scrupulousness about the sanctity of sovereignty when intervention is proposed in states ruled by pro-Soviet Leninists.

NO EASY VOTE

It's not an easy vote to cast. There are no guarantees, no certainties. But I cannot vote down military aid and face what I feel will be the inevitable consequences—both for Nicaragua and eventually for Central America, Mexico, and the United States—of a consolidated, Soviet-backed expansionist Sandinista regime.

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Chairman, after all the hours spent debating aid to the Contras, one question remains: What will the gift of $100 million accomplish?

Will it accomplish a military victory for the Contras? All the evidence indicates that $100 million is far too little to materially change the military balance between the two sides. That judgment was supported recently by the Acting Director of the CIA, who said the majority of experts in our own intelligence community believe the Contras cannot win this war without massive outside help.

Will it cause the Sandinistas to bargain with us about the nature of their regime? This is as much a fiction as the notion that the Contras only need $100 million more to win. The Sandinistas have shown that under Contra pressure, they will dig in deeper and force Nicaraguans to bear greater hardships in order to maintain the fundamental character of their regime.

Do we hope to prevent the Sandinistas from intimidating or even invading their neighbors? This is a worthy objective, yet not an argument for Contra aid. The Sandinistas know nothing would be more likely to bring outside intervention, including that of the United States, than turning their army against their neighbors. We must enunciate a firm and clear position that Sandinista pressure against its neighbors is totally unacceptable to us and will be repelled.

Finally, will this prevent, as some have suggested, the establishment of Soviet bases or missile silos in our hemisphere? That is another worthy objective, but one to which Contra aid is peripheral. The United States and the Soviet Union—not Nicaragua—are the two nations that will decide whether Soviet bases are established in Nicaragua. This requires that the Soviets know what we will and will not tolerate in this area, and that we make that stick; it does not depend on an ill-fated band of insurgents.

No, Mr. Chairman, aid to the Contras will accomplish none of these things I have mentioned. But it will accomplish some others:

It will accomplish the killing and maiming of many people. Many of whom will be ordinary Nicaraguans trying to simply live their lives.

It will accomplish the destruction of much property and economic infrastructure, which in a country as desperately poor as Nicaragua amounts to terrible tragedy.

And finally, it will assuage the consciences of many people who want to be able to say: "I'm doing something about communism," even if they know in their heart it will not change a thing.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that if we really want to "do something about communism," we not wait until communism has come to a country to take an interest in that country. If we really want to prevent communism in Nicaragua's neighbors, we should commit our prestige and energy to attacking the problems that breed it: Poverty, inequality, hopelessness. Many Members have referred to Contra aid as "an ounce of prevention"; the real prevention is policies that help Central Americans gain a stake in the present system.

Finally, let me say a word about the so-called compromise coming from the White House today. This does not change the merits of the question one bit. The administration offers to spend $25 million in nonlethal aid over the first 90 days. This of course permits air defense weapons, logistics, and communications gear. After a mild 3-month delay, the Contras would begin buying everything else. Twenty-five million dollars in the first 90 days exceeds the rate at which the overall $100 million could be spent, as it is an 18-month appropriation. So what are they giving up?

In short, Mr. Chairman, I believe that this $100 million will be simply an expensive way of expressing our dislike of the Nicaraguan regime, not a prescription for change. It will serve merely as an irritant to the Sandinistas—one that is cruel, and ultimately, ineffectual.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, today we are faced with the responsibility of making an important decision. Should we support or oppose our President's request for aid to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua?

I support the President's proposal. I realize there is strong opposition to this proposal. However, there should be strong consensus on another issue, that is, the values that we as Americans cherish—opportunity, justice, and freedom. Furthermore, I believe that we cherish these values not only for ourselves, but for all people of the world.

In our own hemisphere, in Nicaragua, we see others who have lost the freedoms we have fought for: freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of worship, and a constitution full of other freedoms. The freedom fighters are fighting for these principles, and I believe the United States has the responsibility to help; to help them build democratic institutions, to bring peace to their long-suffering people, and to help them transform the principle of freedom into the practice of freedom.

Of course, the Sandinistas, along with the Cubans, Soviets, and other Marxist-Leninists in Nicaragua, have their own values, chief of which is the establishment of another Soviet-allied state and the export of revolution throughout Central America, and training and weapons have been supplied by the Soviets for this task. From January 1981 until late 1985, the Sandinistas received over $500 million in military hardware from the Soviets. Some 10,000 Soviet, Cuban, East German, and Libyian "advisors" assist the Sandinistas.

By supporting an American aid package to the freedom fighters, we are supporting our unwavering commitment to peace and freedom. We are giving the Nicaraguan freedom fighters support in their struggle for a representative government.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, in 1964, President Johnson gave a memorable speech in which he appealed to the United States Congress to approve a request for more military assistance to the Government of South Vietnam so that "American boys won't be sent to fight Asian wars." Today you could substitute "Central American" for "Asian" and you would get a sense of where this policy is going. It is going to bring our country deeper into a war in Central America, a war that we have already spent $250 million on.

Maybe some of my colleagues would like to think that the United States can blindly continue spending in hundreds of millions of dollars on military bases in Honduras, on naval maneuvers off Nicaragua's coast and ground-to-air missiles for the Contras and all the while not really getting involved in this messy guerrilla war. Maybe there are some who still believe the United States can throw its money and its national prestige into the Contra coffers and still maintain a certain detachment from the kidnaping, from the raping, and from the killing. Maybe, just maybe, there are some who can convince themselves that America can finance, direct and manage a rebel army to fight a bloody battle and keep American troops out of it. I am sure there are still some who believe that the United States can topple a government on the cheap, like we did in Guatemala in 1954. But history shows us otherwise. It shows us that a little bit of covert aid leads to a lot of covert aid and that a lot of covert aid leads to advisers and advisers lead to open aid and open aid inevitably leads, in the end, to the critical investment of our Nation's integrity. And when that point is reached, it becomes, we all know, tremendously difficult to pull back, even if the side you are on is not worth what you stand to lose in credibility, in integrity and in the end, lives.

And that is the precipice we are poised on at this moment because it is abundantly clear that the Contras are not cutting it even after 5 years and $250 million, and if that is what our policy is based on, our policy is not working. So, the question now is: Do you throw another $100 million at a failed policy or do you stop and consider what your options are before those options are lost? I would opt for the latter.

The real lesson of Vietnam is that there must be public support for a policy in order for it to be sustainable. That is not the case with this policy. The American people, in poll after poll, have clearly stated their opposition to U.S. funding for the Contras.

The real lesson of the Bay of Pigs invasion is that military actions and a policy of isolation does not further American interests nor does it induce our adversaries to become more democratic.

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to this resolution providing the Contras with $100 million. My opposition to this aid, however, is not a sign of patriotic weakness or support for the spread of communism. The Nicaraguan people should determine their own destiny without worrying about their small impoverished nation becoming the focal point of an East-West conflict and for this reason I oppose the Contra aid.

During the 20th century there have been numerous instances of American military intervention in Central America to halt the spread of revolution or oppose governments we dislike. In these instances the result of our intervention was to put us on the side of those who used violence and repression to maintain or gain power. Our intervention aggravated the situation giving the Soviets and others the opportunity to turn the region's revolutionary ferment toward their own purposes.

Supporters of the President's aid package have gone around shouting and intimidating the American public into thinking that if we do not help the Contras, Nicaragua and the whole of Central America and Mexico will fall prey to communism, jeopardizing the security of our great Nation. Yet, the reality of the situation is that by funding the Contras we will only exacerbate the situation.

Providing the Contras with funding will be a confrontational response to a delicate situation. We will only perpetuate the "Yankee imperialist" image and force the Nicaraguan Government to accept aid from wherever offered to counter American intervention. Instead of bringing peace the United States will prolong strife and bring our Nation that much closer to direct intervention.

American interests can best be served by channeling the revolutionary aspirations of Latin Americans toward the democratic goals we espouse instead of providing military aid which can only prolong the agony of the Nicaraguan people.

The real threat to U.S. security is the instability of Central America resulting from the decades of poverty and injustice those nations continue to experience. Unless these root causes are addressed no amount of U.S. military aid or arms will resolve the turmoil of Central America. I urge my colleagues to oppose this resolution.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, the harsh reality is that there is no middle ground.

In war—and that is what Communist aggression around the world and in our hemisphere is—in war, if one does not support one side, one supports the other. There is no middle ground.

Our 10-hour debate is like the 60-second TV auto filter ad. The mechanic says, "Pay me a small amount now for the filter or a larger amount later for the engine repair." The choice is pay me now or pay me later. There is no middle ground.

We cannot escape the fact that if we do not support the Contras, we are supporting the Sandinistas. There is no middle ground.

If we vote against the side of freedom, we are voting for Communist tyranny. There is no middle ground.

I ask, whose side are you on?

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Chairman, it is pure myth to suggest that the Sandinistas are just well meaning revolutionaries who were driven to communism by American insensitivity and support for the democratic opposition in Nicaragua.

The current Government of Nicaragua came to power in 1979 when a broad based coalition pledging genuine democracy, respect for human rights, a mixed economy, and a nonaligned foreign policy overthrew the Somoza regime. After the revolution, the leaders of the Sandinistas quickly took over the coalition government, purging its more democratic members. Prior to American aid to the anti-Sandinista forces, the Sandinistas began their violations of human rights and intensified the campaign of repression against internal groups such as the Catholic Church, political parties, the private sector, and the opposition press.

When the Sandinistas took power after the fall of the Somoza dictatorship in 1979, President Carter attempted to promote good relations through a foreign aid program of over $100 million. This aid was ultimately discontinued due to Sandinista animosity and support for the Communist guerrillas in El Salvador. By the first anniversary of the Sandinista accession to power, the U.S. delegation was obliged to leave the ceremonies because the Sandinistas, in the national anthem, denounced Americans as enemies of humanity. It is therefore clear that immediately after the Sandinista Revolution, the United States made a sincere effort to aid Nicaragua and use peaceful means to encourage the development of a pluralistic, democratic society.

It was well before the United States supported the Contras that the Sandinistas [FSLN] began building the largest army in the history of Central America. The buildup, at that time, was unprovoked and far exceeded defensive needs. It threatens Nicaragua's neighbors and provides an unprecedented instrument of force for suppression of domestic opposition. The Sandinista military buildup began at a time when the United States was providing significant amounts of economic assistance to Nicaragua.

Many opponents of President Reagan's proposals also argue that the United States has refused to negotiate with the Sandinistas. This portrayal of events is grossly misleading. President Carter tried to negotiate, but was rebuffed. When President Reagan assumed office, he sent an Assistant Secretary of State to Managua in 1981. If the Sandinistas would halt their military buildup, follow through on their earlier promises of democracy, and temper ties with Cuba and the Soviet Union, they could count on American aid and Washington would not support anti-Sandinistas in exile. Repeatedly, the Sandinistas have refused to negotiate with their democratic opposition.

What the Democrats in Congress apparently do not understand is that the Sandinistas use prolonged negotiations to further consolidate their power over the economy, church, schools, press, military—and all other aspects of Nicaraguan society.

Nicaragua's exiled democratic political parties and other groups, incuding trade union councils, have recently unified behind the CON banner. CON recently addressed a letter to the foreign ministers of the Contadora countries in which they pointed out that by prolonging negotiations the Sandinistas give themselves time for definitive consolidation of power. Their letter states that "every day that they—Sandinistas—acquire at the expense of your good intentions is a day that our country loses in its struggle to achieve its independence and liberty."

SOVIET INTERVENTION AND EXPANSION

Many opponents of the anti-Sandinistas both here and in Nicaragua argue that the Soviets have no plans to put a permanent military base in Nicaragua. But then again, that is what some people said about Grenada. But when the Marxist regime and the Cubans were tossed out, the Grenadian opposition discovered a bunch of secret military treaties with the Communist bloc. The Cubans and Soviets already have a significant presence in Nicaragua. Only a very foolish contingency planner would rule out the possibility of something more.

Today, FSLN troops number 119,000, with 65,000 men on active duty. The Sandinistas say they will expand the army even further. The government has mentioned figures as high as 250,000. Somoza's National Guard numbered 14,000 men at its height. Nicaragua also receives personnel and military equipment from the Soviet Union and Cuba. Cuba has approximately 3,000 military advisors in the country, while the U.S.S.R. has sent over $500 million in military aid since 1981. Since August 1979, the Sandinistas have shipped arms and ammunition to the Communist guerrillas in El Salvador and operated bases for training Salvadorans in terrorist tactics. (State Department Report 1986.) It is apparent that the Soviet Union has long range plans for Nicaragua and may only be waiting until it is not so risky to make a move to gain access to Nicaragua military facilities.

NICARAGUAN ATROCITIES AND THE "SANDINISTA LOBBY"

According to an article by Fred Barnes, which appeared in the New Republic on January 20, Alvaro Jose Baldizon Aviles, the chief of the special investigations commission of Nicaragua's Ministry of Interior, escaped into Honduras on July 1. Citing specific names, dates, and locations, Baldizon disclosed hundreds of murders of peasants, prisoners, Indians, businessmen, and opponents of the Sandinista regime, all of them carried out by Nicaraguan soldiers or police.

Even by Latin American standards this was quite an indictment—exactly the kind of firsthand account likely to trigger outrage by groups that monitor human rights in Central America. Barnes argues, however, that the indifference to Baldizon and his accusations by various "Human Rights" organizations such as the Washington Office on Latin America [WOLA] and America's Watch, was not merely an oversight. On the contrary, the indifference reflects the selective moral indignation of the group of organizations in Washington that regularly criticize the Reagan administration's Nicaraguan policy. Barnes effectively argues that while these groups are quick to judge the human rights abuses in all other Central American countries, the abuses in Nicaragua, with its increasingly repressive Sandinista regime, are explained away or ignored. As the Sandinistas are legitimized by the human rights community, the Contras are demonized. Dissenting opinions are not tolerated on this point. When Bruce Cameron of the American Civil Liberties Union decided that support of the Contras would promote human rights in Nicaragua, he was no longer welcome in the pro-Sandinista human rights community.

Many critics of President Reagan's policy claim that former members of Somoza's hated National Guard dominate the anti-Sandinista forces and that the Contra forces enjoy no popular support for their insurgency. Fred Barnes argues that while this may have been true 5 years ago, since then the Contras have been transformed from a small band of ex-National Guardsmen to a 15,000 man force that has won the support of such anti-Somoza leaders as Alfonso Robelo, Arturo Cruz, and Eden Pastora. Mass defections to the Contras, plus their ability to operate in large areas of Nicaragua, evidence the surge in popularity of the Contras and the growing disenchantment with the Sandinistas.

INTERNAL DISSENT

The Sandinista sympathizers continue to insist that political pluralism is the general rule in Nicaragua. America's Watch, for example, proclaimed in July 1985 that "While prior censorship has been imposed by emergency legislation, debate on major social and political questions is robust"—New Republic—in Nicaragua. In fact, just as under Somoza's regime, debate is allowed so long as it doesn't threaten the authorities. The censorship of the only opposition paper, La Prensa, and the closing of all opposition radio stations give ample evidence to this charge.

BREAKING INDEPENDENT TRADE UNIONS

In their "Nicaragua Update," the Friends of the Democratic Center in Central America report that as of February 1, 1986, 12 of Nicaragua's major trade unions have failed to meet government registration requirements, and can no longer function legally. All are affiliates of the Conferacion de Unificacion Sindical [CUS], a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and one of Nicaragua's two remaining independent union federations. Alvin Guthrie, of the CUS, explained that leaders of nongovernment unions are refusing to provide the Sandinistas with union membership lists, on the grounds that their members are being harassed. He also protested that the CUS journal, Soldaridad, has been prevented from publishing.

EXPORTING REVOLUTION

Nicaragua is using its military to intimidate neighboring countries while pursuing the much safer course of subversion and support for insurgencies in those countries. Documents captured on April 18, 1985, in El Salvador's San Vicente Province outline Sandinista plans to increase coordination with guerrilla factions throughout Central America. (CRS December 18/Washington Post, April 29, 1985). In fact, several Sandinista leaders have stated openly that their government intends to support revolutions to other countries. (Tomas Borge and Bayard Arce/April 18, 1984) We must not let these international terrorists spread their oppressive system throughout Central America and Mexico.

COMPROMISE

In February 1985, the internal unarmed opposition called for a national dialog involving all parties in the conflict—including the armed opposition—to be mediated by the Catholic Church. In March 1985, the principal groups of the armed opposition declared they would accept a cease-fire and allow the Sandinistas to stay in power until free elections could be held. The Sandinistas completely rejected this peaceful compromise proposal. In June 1985, the principal groups of the democratic resistance formed the United Nicaraguan Opposition [UNO].

The President of the United States has requested to the Congress that they approve of the transfer of already appropriated Department of Defense funds to the anti-Sandinista forces in Nicaragua. I strongly support this request. The key to the continued success of our policies in Central America is adequate assistance for those who seek a democratic rather than a dictatorial future for their country.

ANTI-SEMITISM IN NICARAGUA

For almost a century before the Sandinista Revolution in 1979, Nicaragua's Jewish community lived in peaceful coexistence in Nicaragua. Within a few months of the revolution, however, the systematic, anti-Semitic policies of the leftwing Sandinista government forced the Jewish community into exile. One Friday evening in 1978, Managua's synagogue was fire-bombed and set aflame by Sandinista gunmen. The synagogue was subsequently confiscated by the Sandinista government and adorned with pro-PLO and anti-Zionist propaganda posters.

The Sandinistas are closely aligned with PLO terrorists. A Sandinista press spokesman has been quoted as saying,

> There is a longstanding blood unity between us and the Palestinians. Many of the units belonging to the Sandinista movements were at Palestinian Revolutionary bases in Jordan.

Only Nicaragua and Cuba allow the PLO to maintain a fully accredited embassy in Managua. In July 1980 Yasser Arafat made a 4-day state visit to Nicaragua where he praised "the strategic and military ties between the Sandinista and Palestinian Revolutions." A Sandinista Junta member stated, "We say to our brother Arafat that Nicaragua is his land and the PLO cause is our cause."

A TURNING POINT

In the last few months, the Sandinista government has gradually shed its mask of revolutionary respectability to reveal its frightening inner character. Promises of political and religious freedoms are replaced with broad suspensions of civil liberties. Increased censorship seeks to silence an already crippled independent press. Propaganda campaigns are geared to manipulate information Soviet-style. Meanwhile, Cuban and Soviet advisers manage the Nicaraguan Armed Forces and train other Central American nationals in terrorist techniques. As each day passes, earlier promises of a free Nicaragua become disappointing memories. Increasingly, the Sandinistas' true agenda becomes apparent.

The failure to support the anti-Sandinista forces would be a travesty for the people of Central America and American foreign policy in the region. We must not back away from this Communist threat and hide behind a wall of isolationism. We must not listen to those who ignore Nicaraguan atrocities and wish to normalize relations with the Communist regime. Such a policy would be a travesty since it would significantly hamper American efforts to restore peace and freedom to the Nicaraguan people.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of U.S. military and humanitarian aid to the democratic resistance forces in Nicaragua. We are witnessing the growth of a Communist cancer in Managua which threatens to spread throughout our hemisphere in the form of terrorism and subversion. We must not ignore this totalitarian regime which deprives its own people of the freedom they fought for, which openly seeks to undermine the development of democracy in neighboring countries, and which is engaged in an unprecedented military buildup in Central America with the assistance of the Soviet Union and its allies. I therefore urge my colleagues to support those who fight for peace and democracy in Nicaragua.

It has been almost 2 years since the Congress in June 1984 suspended military aid to the resistance forces which continue their struggle for freedom. During this time the Communist government has continued its policies of internal repression, including censorship, arbitrary confiscation of property, and arrest and interrogation of persons opposing the government's policies. The consolidation of a totalitarian state modeled after the Soviet Union is clearly reflected in the Communist defense committees which control ration cards and provide information to state security forces.

Censorship has become a way of life in Nicaragua. In the words of Tomas Borge, the Minister of Interior who is responsible for state security, "Only constructive criticism is acceptable in a revolutionary process." The censors usually object to about 80 percent of the material contained in the one opposition newspaper, La Prensa. Similarly, the Permanent Commission on Human Rights must submit all of its letters, communiques and reports for censorship review. Nonetheless, in the past 90 days the Commission reported 13 substantiated cases of political murder committed by government forces.

Religious persecution by a Communist government is nothing new and the Nicaraguan regime is no exception. The Catholic Church has been an outspoken advocate for freedom in Nicaragua and has been rewarded with: prohibition of outdoor masses, mandatory Marxist-Leninist indoctrination of Church-run schools, forced draft of Nicaraguans studying for the priesthood, continuing threats to expell foreign priests, interrogation and detention of priests and Catholic lay workers, prohibition of certain church services, prohibition of the Catholic newspaper, and closure of Radio Catolica. The protestant evangelical community has also suffered arrest and detention of its members and the prohibition of prayer meetings under the 1985 State of Emergency Act. The one Jewish synagogue was confiscated shortly after the overthrow of the Somoza government. Most of the Jewish population has left Nicaragua.

In the past 2 years any semblance of freedom and democracy has vanished in Nicaragua. Limited access to the media, interference with campaigns and harassment led the six major opposition parties to withdraw from the 1984 elections. Last October the Communists declared a state of emergency and suspended all civil rights; 20,000 Miskito Indians and 60,000 peasants were forcibly removed from their homes in northern Nicaragua in 1985. Today over 7,000 political dissidents imprisoned under the Somoza government remain in detention. The players have changed, but the oppression continues.

The Nicaraguan Government received its first shipment of advanced attack helicopters from the Soviet Union a few months after the congressional ban on aid to the resistance. Nicaragua now has the largest army every assembled in Central America. It is in fact larger than any possible combination of its neighbors' armed forces. Literally tens of thousands of young men have been conscripted and are serving in the Communist army. They are heavily armed and well-equipped, thanks to the Soviet Union and Cuba which have provided $500 million in military supplies such as tanks, artillery pieces, and helicopter gunships. There are also thousands of Cubans fighting the resistance on Nicaraguan soil to support a Communist state the people never asked for and continue to oppose. It is the Cubans who are piloting the Soviet helicopter gunships which fly over Nicaragua. The Nicaraguan people challenged Somoza in the hope for freedom and democracy. The struggle continues. This time against a Communist totalitarian state.

The Communist leadership in Managua has declared a revolution without borders. Nicaragua fulfills this pledge by supplying arms, military training, safe haven, transit and false documentation to revolutionaries in Central and Latin America. Nicaragua supplied the guns seized from the M19 terrorists who stormed the Palace of Justice in Colombia killing several Supreme Court Justices. In Managua the Communists held a mass to honor the M19 terrorists who participated in the attack. Nicaragua has established a terrorist base which demonstrates its commitment to continue to support terrorism and revolution beyond its borders. The Communist regime, which maintains ties with European and Middle Eastern terrorists, receives advice from 50 Libyan and PLO advisers. These activities are partially financed by illegal drug proceeds. There is documented evidence, including photographs, of high government officials participating in international drug trafficking.

When we fail to provide support for the democratic resistance, the Soviet Union is quick to fill the vacuum with increased military aid to the Communists. After the last prohibition on U.S. military aid it was not long before Daniel Ortega traveled to Moscow and the advanced Soviet attack helicopters began arriving in Nicaragua. The Communist regime has succeeded in consolidating a totalitarian state, while failing to demonstrate serious interest in a comprehensive and verifiable regional settlement along the lines of the 1983 Contadora declaration. In contrast, Managua has proved its commitment to a revolution without borders through the support of terrorism and insurgency in Central and Latin America.

The resistance has remained steadfast in its quest for freedom and democracy in Nicaragua. Today the Congress must decide if it supports freedom for the people of Nicaragua. The resistance cannot be expected to face advanced Soviet weaponry with humanitarian assistance alone. The United States cannot reasonably expect the Communist government to discontinue its support for a revolution beyond its borders in the absence of effective resistance. We must not allow Nicaraguan support for terrorism and subversion to turn back the tide of democracy which has swept across Central America. The Soviet Union is on the verge of establishing a foothold on the North American continent. If we fail to act, they will win by default. Today it is a question of supporting the democratic resistance in a conflict within Nicaragua's borders. Tomorrow the stakes will be much higher.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Chairman, the current debate and the upcoming vote on President Reagan's request for aid to the democratic resistance forces in Nicaragua is a historic and weighty moment for the American people.

I used "American" deliberately because this decision by the U.S. Congress is vital to the future of all of the American nations and all of the American people. The people of the New World, the Western Hemisphere—of America—have been moving decisively to seize control of their own destiny and to provide for their own liberty and justice. The Jeffersonian ideals of individual freedom, justice, and opportunity for all and a pluralistic political society have been long suppressed in many parts of the American Continents.

Today, people are no longer willing to accept business as usual and submit to repression and injustice at the hands of tyranny and totalitarianism from the right or from the left. The people of Argentina and Brazil have chosen moderate political leaders and firmly rebuffed military rule. The people of El Salvador have braved Communist gunfire and threats of reprisals to elect a Social Democrat government. The people of Grenada cried out with their joy at the removal of their oppressive Communist regime and have since elected a Democratic government that is prepared to work for the interests of its own people instead of the interests of the Kremlin. In Haiti, the people rose up after many years and forced a powerful dictator to flee. Now the struggle has triumphed in Honduras and Guatemala while Costa Rica has reconfirmed its own tradition of freedom and democracy.

Mr. Chairman, we are all proud of the people and the nations of America who have worked so hard to join the United States as open and pluralistic societies. But the task is not complete. The people of Chile even today are wrestling with an attempt to keep them from returning to their democratic ideals. And the real trial is going on in Nicaragua. The people have spoken in Nicaragua. They spoke in 1979 when they joined together in a crusade to overthrow the corrupt Somoza autocracy and proclaim themselves free.

The people of Nicaragua have now recognized that their dreams and aspirations have been stolen from them. The cadre of dedicated Communists that have gained control of Nicaragua have embarked on a course of aggression, oppression, and subservience to the ideals of international revolution that is far worse than anything experienced under the former regime. The democrats who were originally included in the government of the Sandinistas have been jailed, exiled, or forced out of the government. All personal rights have been suspended, the Catholic Church and other religious faiths are increasingly suppressed, more than $500 million in guns and bombs have been received from the Soviet Union along with "advisers" from North Korea, East Germany, Bulgaria, Hungary, and most of all from Cuba. The people of Nicaragua are aware that all of these "advisers" are not in their country to promote peace, liberty, justice, and democracy.

The Nicaraguan revolution and the future of the people have been stolen and subverted as a tool of the Marxist slave masters of the Kremlin. The people of Nicaragua know this and I continue to be amazed at the number of Members of this great democratic body who refuse to open their own eyes and see the same things that the people of Nicaragua see. The people have seen all they need to see, they have made their decision and when they were not allowed a free and fair vote at the ballot box they voted with their feet. Over 400,000 people have fled the Nicaragua of the Sandinistas. That is more than 12 percent of the total population and would be comparable to 30 million people fleeing from the United States.

Ever since the end of the Second World War, we have seen exactly the same actions all over the world where communism is able to install itself in power. The exodus from eastern Europe is a sight that still chills the soul of those of us old enough to remember it. The Berlin Wall was built solely to stop the people of Soviet-occupied East Germany from fleeing for their lives and their future. Many thousands of people were able to leave Cuba before Castro closed the ports and the beaches and shut off the flight of his people by force. Who can possibly forget or fail to be moved by the sight of the "boat people" of Vietnam who risked starvation, drowning, or attack by pirates to escape from the Communists in leaky sailboats and overloaded barges by the thousands. The refugee camps of the Cambodians fleeing the Vietnamese invaders would make the strongest man in this room cry in anquish. The brave people of Afghanistan are fighting back, but even they cannot stand fast against the massive power and brutality of the Soviet Army and 3 million have had to cross the border into Pakistan while the strong and the brave remain behind to resist and to fight for their homeland.

This is exactly what is occurring in Nicaragua. Why is there even a debate about whether or not we should help the people of Nicaragua reclaim their country and their future? The truth is there for everyone to see in the refugee camps in Honduras and Costa Rica. The proof is in the military camps of the resistance forces where more than 14,000 Nicaraguans have chosen to take up arms and risk their lives to take back their nation from the Communist thieves who stole their revolution and their destiny. The resistance forces do not ask for U.S. troops. They do not ask for tanks or fighter planes. They do not even ask for trainers and advisers like the Sandinistas did in having Cuban and even Soviet military support in 1978 and 1979.

The resistance forces in Nicaragua know how to fight. They fought Somoza. And now they are fighting the Sandinistas. We cannot turn our back on these people again. We cannot refuse to assist people who cry out against injustice and oppression. We cannot hold our heads high and claim that we are proud not only to be United States' citizens but American citizens if we refuse to help our fellow Americans who want to be free and who are willing to die for that freedom.

Mr. Chairman, I support President Reagan's request for aid for the democractic resistance forces in Nicaragua. I am proud to be an American and I am proud to give my support to the people of Nicaragua who are willing to die to share in the American ideals of liberty and justice for all and a political system that allows all opinions and beliefs to be expressed and pursued.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, the irony could not be more apparent. On the eve of the downfall of Ferdinand Marcos, when the Philippine people displayed the robust power of democracy and diplomacy, the Reagan administration proposed to meet the social and political crisis in Nicaragua with guns and bullets.

The administration has asked Congress to appropriate $100 million—including $70 million in military aid—to the Nicaraguan Contras. That represents a dramatic increase of almost 300 percent over last year's level of aid, which did not include military assistance.

More important, the administration's request represents a sharp repudiation of regional diplomatic efforts—efforts that seek to resolve Nicaragua's crisis without massive bloodshed and without destroying whatever remains of the Nicaraguan people's hopes for an end to a deepening cycle of violence and destruction.

In late January, the foreign ministers of our key Latin American allies—Colombia, Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, Argentina, Peru, Brazil, and Uruguay—agreed to accelerate negotiations aimed at a regional diplomatic settlement. As a basis for reaching that settlement, the foreign ministers called for a "termination of external support to the irregular forces operating in the region."

Their agreement, known as the Carabelleda Statement, was also endorsed by the foreign ministers of five Central American countries, including Costa Rica and newly democratic Guatemala. The Contradora negotiating process, which was initially the work of only four Latin American countries, has grown into a hemispheric movement for diplomacy, stability, and peace.

By making its request for military aid, the administration has ignored this powerful movement for diplomacy. It continues to pass by a potentially historic opportunity to join together with our regional allies, negotiate a binding agreement and jointly enforce it.

There is no excuse for America not to seize the diplomatic initiative—it is in our self-interest and the interest of our neighbors. As a newspaper in my district recently editorialized:

The countries in (Latin America) understand the day-to-day effects of the Communist boot upon the people of their region. The U.S. Government should listen to the recommendations, give them high credence and stop playing the role of outside agitator.

I have no use for the Sandinistas when they suspend the civil liberties of Nicaraguans and abuse their minority populations. I deplore their increasingly repressive methods of government. But what grounds do we have for assailing their behavior so long as we fuel the Contras' war?

Our undeclared war against Nicaragua has strengthened the hand of Daniel Ortega, giving him an excuse to expand the army, repress his people and fortify his dependence on the Soviet Union and Cuba. Our policy has boomeranged.

Just ask the recently elected president of Costa Rica, Oscar Arias, who said:

The result with the aid to the Contras has been a more dictatorial, more totalitarian government in (Nicaragua). They abolished • • • individual liberties because they have an excuse: the aid of the U.S. Congress to the Contras. So you won't get a more open society in Nicaragua, you won't get a negotiation with the anti-Sandinistas giving more money to the Contras."

This from this leader of a country which shares a long border with Nicaragua. His crystal clear warning to the administration is that its foreign policy is achieving the opposite of its intention. It is entrenching the Sandinista regime without creating a democratic opposition. The administration itself has acknowledged that the Contras would collapse without the crutch of American aid. The Contras' military campaign has alienated, rather than attracted, indigenous support.

Despite the failure of its policy, the administration apparently feels that we have no alternative to the military overthrow of the Sandinista. It has not cooperated with the Contadora countries and has not spent any of the funds appropriated by Congress last year to advance the negotiating process. It has shut down bilateral talks with Nicaragua. Last fall, the administration announced that we cannot negotiate with the Sandinistas because they cannot be trusted.

This is truly a new idea in foreign affairs. We negotiate every day with the Soviets. We negotiated with Hanoi and Beijing in the 1970's. And we did so not because we trusted those adversaries, but because negotiation was the best way to end conflicts or other rifts in our international relations.

The intelligent alternative to the administration's policy—and its refusal to negotiate—is to pursue a diplomatic settlement with the help of our friends in the hemisphere. I am a firm believer, and so are the American people, that negotiations should be tried before confirmation. To further this policy, I have consistently voted against aid to the Contras and for financial and diplomatic support of the Contadora process.

My policy steers a middle course between those who favor counterproductive military aid and those who advocate total disengagement from the region. To return to the Philippines example, my policy mirrors our approach to the recent turmoil in that troubled country. It recognizes that the United States has legitimate strategic and political interests in the region. It also recognizes that there is a window of diplomatic opportunity, this time in the form of the Contadora talks. The Contadora process, with the backing of our allies in the region, can isolate Nicaragua and guarantee the security interests of our country and the countries in closest proximity to that tragic country.

In the Philippines, the Reagan administration eventually grasped the potential for peace and diplomacy in the popular candidacy of Corazon Aquino. The administration had the wisdom to listen to the Filipino people's call for a peaceful transition to new government. The result: A ringing blow for democracy, a reaffirmation of United States strategic and political ties with the Philippines, and a devastating setback for the nation's Communist insurgents. All of this was achieved because our policymakers took heed of the people most affected by our decisions.

Now, ironically, the White House turns a deaf ear to the chorus of Latin-American governments—those with a direct stake in Nicaragua's future—who endorse diplomacy and the Contadora process.

It is time for America to pay attention to our democratic allies' concerns—which are nearly identical to ours. It is time for us to adopt a policy that advances democracy and continues our well-proven emphasis on human rights in Latin America. We can do that by joining our allies in suspending aid to the Contras, isolating the Sandinistas, and pressuring them into beginning a process of reform to meet the original goals of the broad-based Nicaraguan revolution.

As our handling of the Philippines crisis amply demonstrated, given the opportunity, we have the skill to diplomatically achieve peace and reform in regions of strategic importance to our country. We cannot let this lesson elude us in Central America.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to House Joint Resolution 540, to provide further United States aid to the Contras in Nicaragua. This resolution would authorize the transfer of $100 million in fiscal year 1986 from Defense Department funds to the President to assist the Contras. The President would reportedly commit $30 million of these funds to continue the existing so-called humanitarian, or nonlethal aid and the remaining $70 million would be used to provide direct military aid to the Contras. This military aid would include supplying the primary Contra force with antiaircraft and antitank weapons, small arms and ammunition, and providing more United States Army advisers to train Contra soldiers in Honduras.

The President also asks that Congress repeal all existing restrictions on U.S. intelligence agencies and the Defense Department in aiding the Contras. Under current law, the Central Intelligence Agency [CIA], other intelligence agencies, and the Department of Defense have restrictions on their relations with the Contras. Although they may share intelligence with the Contras, they may not train the Contras, participate directly in combat, or give them aid that has not been explicitly approved by Congress. The President now proposes that all of these restrictions be repealed.

Mr. Chairman, let us be absolutely clear what it is that the President is asking us to do today. The Contras are commited to the violent overthrow of the Sandinista government of Nicaragua. The President is, in effect, asking that the United States become a party to this war.

The President tells us that we have exhausted the possibilities of reaching a political solution to the problems in Nicaragua and the problems between Nicaragua and its neighbors in Central America and that the only alternative available is to support the Contras. The fact is, however, that this administration has dropped the ball in pursuing a political settlement to these problems. In January 1985 the Reagan administration broke off the only direct talks that it has ever conducted with the Sandinistas. The President insists that the United States has worked constructively with the Contadora countries in the search for a political settlement. Unfortunately, however, the administration's actions are at odds with its record. The administration has supported and helped to direct the Contra war effort by directing military intervention from Honduras while simultaneously seeking to strengthen the rationale for direct United States military action against Nicaragua. These actions are contradictory—not compatible—with the goals of the Contadora countries of Latin America: Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama.

The basic terms of the Contadora proposal for peace in Central America are multilateral: Control and reduction in armaments and personnel; a halt to all external support for insurgent movements; the elimination of foreign military bases and advisors—including Cuban advisors in Nicaragua—as well as international military maneuvers; and national reconciliation which would insure equal access for all political parties to the political process. These are laudable goals which deserve our vigorous support. But the Reagan administration's actions speak louder than its words. Just 2 months ago, in February, the foreign ministers of Brazil, Peru, Argentina, and Uruguay came to Washington to urge President Reagan not to resume aid to the Contras but instead to become an active supporter of the efforts of the Contadora countries. The President rebuffed these Latin American foreign ministers. Lately, the President has even suggested that the political leaders of Latin America really don't mean what they say when they call on the United States to stop supporting the Contras. Despite the fact that there is overwhelming evidence to the contrary, the administration insists that these leaders are saying one thing in public and something else in private. This is an insult to the Contadora leaders and will ultimately do serious damage to our credibility with the people of Latin America.

Similarly, the President belatedly recognizes that the Contras are responsible for human rights violations. But instead of facing facts, he alleges that these are really Sandinistas disguised as Contras. Without offering any evidence or documentation to support his claim, the charge rings hollow.

The President tells us that if we do not approve this $100 million aid package for the Contras that they will be defeated and that communism will triumph not only in Nicaragua but throughout all of Latin America. Lately President Reagan has said that he will hold up the military aid in this package for 90 days while further negotiations are pursued. This is a gimmick to gather political support rather than a good faith effort at negotiations. Under this formula, all of the existing safeguards, limited as they are, would be abandoned and President Reagan would have an absolutely free hand to exercise his policy without adequate congressional input or oversight.

In 1979, the Sandinistas, with only 5,000 lightly armed, poorly trained fighters and with no outside aid of any kind, were able to overthrow the Somoza regime and its heavily armed National Guard which had been built up over years with U.S. aid. Today, Nicaragua's Contras control less territory than ever. The Contras do not control a single town or village in Nicaragua and operate primarily from bases outside of Nicaragua, in Honduras and Costa Rica. The Contras have not brought their war directly to the Sandinistas who they seek to overthrow, but have instead inflicted pain and suffering upon the civilian population of Nicaragua. They have been implicated in gross violations of human rights by Amnesty International and Americas Watch and other groups. They have been involved in attacks on buses, villages, agricultural cooperative workers, and various other civilian targets. In some other country, the President might describe such activities as acts of terrorism. But in Nicaragua, President Reagan embraces the Contras as freedom fighters and the moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers.

Over the past 5 years, the United States has spent over $250 million for the Contras' cause. Five years and $250 million later, the Contras control less territory today than ever before. The Contras have not failed for lack of U.S. support. They have failed because they have not won the popular support of the people within Nicaragua.

I am deeply disturbed about the implications of continued United States support for a covert war which is waged from Honduras and Costa Rica. The administration has established a massive, permanent military presence in Honduras, with upgraded military air bases that provide support for the Contras. Our confused policy risks exposing Honduras and Costa Rica to Nicaraguan retaliation if this conflict expands further.

Mr. Chairman, this House and the American people are frustrated by this issue. We beg for a rational, understandable Central American policy; not the polarized vision offered by the President, but a policy that reflects fairness, common sense, and the values of our Nation.

I deplore the restrictions on basic civil liberties which have been imposed by the Sandinista government of Nicaragua. Certainly Nicaragua should not be used as a base to project Soviet military power into this hemisphere. Clearly, the Sandinistas see their country as being under siege from the United States. While it cannot be condoned, it should not come as a surprise that the Sandinistas have become more repressive and less tolerant of their political opposition because of the continuing counterrevolutionary forces of the Contras, supported in large measure by the United States. We must do all that we can to encourage a peaceful political settlement of the problems in Nicaragua. I hope that my colleagues will join me in voting "no" on further aid to the Contras and will instead support a creative, intelligent policy which values diplomacy over military confrontation. The escalation of conflict hasn't worked in the past 5 years and will not succeed in the future.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, in 12 years I've never had a vote as difficult to cast as the vote on the President's $100 million request for humanitarian and military aid to the Contra force fighting in Nicaragua.

When Somoza fled Nicaragua and the Sandinistas came to power, President Carter asked Congress for $75 million to reconstruct that country. I supported the request, hoping this was the way to encourage the Sandinistas to align themselves with the Western democracies.

President Carter subsequently cut off these funds—which reached $100 million—when he found that the Sandinistas were accepting arms and aid from the Soviet Union. Additionally, they were not honoring their promises of free elections, civil liberties, and human rights for their people.

I never previously supported any military aid to the Contras, because I did not think we should be involved in covert activity in Nicaragua. I was set against the $70 million in military aid which was part of this package until I heard Congressman FOLEY and Senator SASSER respond to the President over the weekend. Both gentlemen said that if negotiations do not progress, American boys could be fighting there. The President said he needed the aid to force negotiations to take place.

I certainly don't want American boys in Nicaragua and therefore a group of us decided to try to forge a compromise which would foster negotiations.

We had a good bipartisan effort. Unfortunately, Speaker O'NEILL's only interest was to make sure he defeated the President. He pressured many Democrats to vote against the plan, and promised them an opportunity to present alternatives on April 18. I suppose these alternatives will be similar to those we negotiated with the White House.

Our compromise would allow $25 million in humanitarian aid and some defensive aid to be sent. The remaining $75 million could not be used for 90 days while we try negotiations once again. The leaders of both parties in Congress are to nominate a five member commission which will be appointed by the President and which will determine with him the state of the negotiations. At the end of 90 days, Congress will have an additional opportunity to stop the flow of military aid to the Contras.

I've served on the Foreign Affairs Committee, the Intelligence Committee, and the Mexican-American Interparliamentary Congress, and I'm very well aware that we've done everything we've been asked to further the goals of the Contadora process.

Unfortunately, with the Contadora group, we're asking nations with overwhelming internal problems to solve those of other peoples. There is no way these countries can force the Sandinistas to abide by their verbal agreements, and no way they can force them to sign any either.

My decision making process was clouded further by the large volume of phone calls from the 19th District. In fact, we had 1,238 calls in favor of aid and 653 calls opposed.

Overall, the problems we fact in Nicaragua will not disappear. Unless we aid Central and South America in promoting the economic and social welfare of all their inhabitants, their problems will increasingly become ours.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the President's request to furnish Nicaraguan rebels, known as Contras, with some $100 million in aid, 70 percent of which would be for military supplies and equipment.

Like many of my colleagues, I have tried to listen to our President with an open mind. Under the Constitution, he is our Commander in Chief and responsible for the conduct of U.S. foreign affiars. He has placed the full weight of his office behind this request, and his views demand the fullest consideration.

By the same token, the Congress also has constitutional responsibilites, particularly where it involves the expenditure of public funds in ways that have tremendous long-term consequences.

It is unfortunate that the debate on aid to the Contras has been misconstrued by some as a partisan debate. To the contrary, in my judgment, it respresents a classic demonstration of the system of checks and balances evisioned by the framers of our Constitution. The President may want to furnish military equipment and supplies to rebels in Nicaragua, but it is Congress that must provide the funds. There are Republicans who feel that the President is wrong on Nicaragua, and Democrats who feel that he is right. It is not a partisan issue, and it should not be a test of party loyalty for any Member. I regret that some have made it such.

I'm a Democrat, but I supported the President's decision to use military force in Granada. I believe his action saved American lives from a clear and present danger while toppling a bloodthirsty regime. I applaud the skilled diplomacy demonstrated by the Reagan administration which has brought new democratic leadership to Haiti and the Philippines. The President deserves much credit for those successes.

When the President has a success in foreign affairs, it is a success for all Americans—not just those of his party. But when he fails, as occurred in Lebanon, it is a failure for all of us and we all suffer the consequences. I felt it was a mistake to base our marines at the airport in Beirut and I said so at the time. They were sitting ducks at the low-lying airport. Our role in the Congress is to support the President when he is right, and try to develop constructive alternatives and guidance when he is wrong.

I agree with the President that it is important for the United States to support democacy in our hemisphere, and oppose those regimes which attempt to export Marxism and revolution to the rest of Latin America. I have little regard for Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega, and deplore the abuses which have occurred within Nicaragua at the hands of the Sandinistas.

However, to temper the excesses of the Sandinista regime, the President proposes to furnish military aid to the Contras, a varied group of Nicaraguan revolutionaries numbering not more than 20,000, and probably less. It seems to me that, as prerequisites to approval of that policy, it should first be shown to have a reasonable chance of success, and second, be able to attract the support of at least a few of our allies. The Contra aid package fails on both counts.

The United States is alone among all our allies in favoring military action. While we are concerned that Communist Nicaragua might try to subvert its democratic neighbors, those same neighbors oppose our program and instead favor a different solution—the Contadora process—a regional diplomatic, political and economic approach towards getting greater cooperation in Central America. They know that continued arming of the Contras will probably result in a wider war, particularly since many of the Contras are based just over the border in Honduras.

We have been told that these nations privately support aiding the Contras but cannot say so publicly. Support that can't be voiced publicly is not support worth having. What good is it? If our policy fails, these nations will just walk away from us and claim that they never in fact supported our actions. I certainly am not going to vote to commit the United States to a policy of armed insurgency on the basis of purported whispers of support from other nations in the Americas.

It is of equal importance to note that the relatively small Contras force is not regarded by most experts as capable of overthrowing the Nicaraguan Governmant. Notwithstanding many of the claims that have been made, the Sandinistas came to power through a broad-based revolution that cut across all classes in Nicaragua. In fact, it appears that the current Government of Nicaragua, which replaced the corrupt and hated Samoza regime, enjoys far more popular support than do the Contras, many of whom are Somoza loyalists.

It is true that the Contras can serve as a thorn in the side of the ruling Sandinistas, but with over 100,000 men under arms and Soviet and Cuban military support, the current government is not going to be ousted by the insurgents, unless—and this is a very important "unless"—there is a direct military intervention by the United States.

Are we prepared to make a military commitment when it becomes clear that the Contras are unable to dislodge the Government or modify its policies? Are we ready to take that first step down the slippery slope of growing involvement in a no-win war?

Throughout this debate, there has been a great deal of effort to distinguish the situation in Nicaragua from the situation that existed in Vietnam in the 1960's. Certainly there are important differences, but there are also important parallels that should not be overlooked.

Our goal was to contain communism, so we furnished aid and supplies to pro-Western forces, but that was not enough. U.S. advisers were needed. Then Green Berets were needed. Then the North Vietnam purportedly fired on several U.S. ships—an alleged provocation that justified the adoption of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. And so on and so on until over half a million American soldiers were committed to battle in an undeclared war. Over 50,000 died and hundreds of thousands were wounded. And who can ever forget the light at the end of the tunnel?

There are most certainly parallels that we should not overlook.

We are told that, if we do not stand firm in Nicaragua, all of the nations of Central America will fall like dominoes to the Communists. We were told tne same about Southeast Asia.

We are told that all we need do is furnish military supplies and equipment to pro-Western forces in Nicaragua, and that direct United States involvement will not be necessary. We were told the same about Vietnam.

Our involvement in Vietnam did not have the strong support of the American people. Neither does our involvement in Nicaragua.

And finally, those who are questioning the wisdom of growing United States involvement in Nicaragua are having their patriotism questioned. The same was true of those who questioned our growing involvement in Indochina.

If we recall nothing else from our Vietnam experience, let us remember this: America should not get involved in an undeclared, no-win war that does not have the overwhelming support of the American people.

Mr. Chairman, the last time Contra aid came before the Congress, I stated that the issue is not whether we have serious differences with the Sandinista government. We most certainly do.

The issue then, and the issue now, is whether those differences should be settled through military action. I believe that military action is futile, dangerous and unnecessary.

Instead of embarking upon a costly proxy war that has little chance of success, I believe our differences should be resolved through diplomatic, economic and other means. If the Sandinistas take any actions that directly threaten our national security, we are more than capable of making a direct response.

I believe that Nicaragua ought to be given an opportunity to show that it is willing to act peacefully toward its neighbors, lower the number of troops and outside advisers, allow greater freedom of the press, and broaden democratic participation. It is not reasonable to expect the Sandinistas to lower their guard when the President of the United States is publicly committed to the overthrow of their Government.

To the contrary, the threat of U.S. intervention has helped the Sandinistas to solidify their popular support despite some very serious economic and political difficulties. They have exploited this threat to justify a large military buildup, suppressing human rights and freedom of the press, and maintaining a large Cuban-Soviet presence. In other words, our policy may just strengthen, not weaken, the Sandinista grip on Nicaragua. It is counterproductive.

Let us join with the other nations of our hemisphere including Canada, who have made it clear they do not support aid to the Contras, and instead favor the Contadora process as the best way of avoiding a wider war in Central America and pressuring the Sandinistas to cease its abuses.

We have not seriously and steadfastly pursued a negotiated settlement with our friends and neighbors in this hemisphere before turning to a military option. That is not in America's interest, and I must accordingly vote most reluctantly against this aid package for the Contras. However, I will be watching the Contadora process carefully and will continue to reexamine this option should it appear that it can avert a serious threat to the Americas.

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Chairman Speaker, today this House is being asked to support the President's request to provide aid to Contras who are in their fifth year of fighting the Sandinista government. We are once again faced with a decision to help the Contras and, in the President's own words, "deny the Soviet Union a beachhead in North America."

I agree with the President that the presence of Soviet and Cuban advisers in Nicaragua is a cause for national concern. The fact that human rights abuses are committed by both sides against innocent civilians concerns me a great deal and is something that we should seek to end. However, giving the Contras in Nicaragua $70 million in military aid contradicts the administration's stated objectives for revolving the problems in Central America.

According to the administration, the United States objectives in Central America center around "support for a political solution to the conflicts in Central America, via peaceful dialog within and among the countries of the region, and renewal of economic development and growth to address the root cause of turmoil and conflict." It seems to me that if the United States is serious about resolving the civil unrest in Central America, then the United States ought to commit its resources and energy toward the goals of "peaceful dialog" with the Contadora nations.

Then, on Sunday the President appeared on national television to sell his aid request to the American people and to Congress. He tried to convey to the American people the need to act now before the "malignancy" in Nicaragua spreads to our "southern frontier." Well Mr. President, your plea worked. As a result of over 300 phone calls and telegrams I received in response to your speech, I will vote against the request for aid to the Contras. Over 62 percent of my constituents who contacted me since Sunday have told me they are strongly against any aid to the Contas. They told me that they want to see this country push for peace negotiations. They have said they are scared that we are repeating the course of history they and their children experienced in Vietnam. Moreover, they have asked me why we are giving the Contras $100 million when this Nation faces a bloated deficit and when domestic programs they need are being eliminated. I share their concerns and I will vote accordingly.

Finally, I have read with outrage several articles dealing with this issue which label those of us who are representing their constituents and voting against the President's request as supporting the spread of Marxism. Since when does voting in accordance with the views of the majority of my district mean that my patriotism and support for the country I love should be called into question. It is regrettable that debate on this issue has been lowered to this level. These attacks have only served to confirm my long held views on this subject.

In July 1983, when this body voted to end all covert aid to the Contras, I addressed the House and said "the only way the United States can truly achieve the President's objective of fostering democracy for the people of Central America is to help them establish the basis for a positive future." I believe now, as I did then, that this can best be accomplished by helping the countries of Central America resolve their differences peacefully, and formulating a realistic long-term policy which promotes economic development and eradicates widespread poverty and illiteracy.

I urge my colleagues and this administration to put our support behind the eight Latin American countries who have strongly advised this Nation against a self-defeating policy of blindly sending money to groups we cannot identify or hold accountable.

Mr. CHAPPELL. Mr. Chairman, when the distinction between freedom and freedom's denial dims in the perspective of a free people, so dims the chances of those denied freedom to acquire it. We, as free Americans, should see clearly that distinction in Nicaragua and lend a helping hand to the Contras struggling to gain freedom—God's greatest gift to man.

I support humanitarian assistance and military aid to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance.

At one time a few years ago, the debate in Congress was centered around the question, "Who are the Sandinistas?"

Were they antitotalitarian reformers?

Were they democratic reformers who would improve the daily lives of the Nicaraguan people?

People asked, "How much aid should we give them?"

Well, now we all know who the Sandinistas are.

They betrayed the revolution that overthrew the Somoza dictatorship.

We see clearly who they are by the company they keep.

The presence in Nicaragua of Cubans, Soviets, East Germans, North Koreans, terrorists from the P.L.O. and members of the Red Brigade gives eloquent testimony to the question, "Who are the Sandinistas?"

As others have pointed out, for the first time in history a Marxist/Leninist regime is now physically on the land mass of the Western Hemisphere. In my view, the long run implications of this fact are rather ominous.

In Nicaragua we now have a government which views Cuba as the appropriate model for behavior in terms of: internal repression; freedom of speech; freedom of press and religion; and in terms of subverting its neighbors.

Somehow, many have put the debate regarding humanitarian assistance to Nicaragua in the following terms:

They say, "If you vote against the aid, you are in favor of peace and diplomatic negotiations."

To me, that simply is not the case.

If assistance to Nicaragua is defeated, violence, subversion, and terrorism will spread throughout Central America.

If such aid is denied we will be broadcasting to the people of the world that the Soviet's can provide massive amounts of armaments to a Marxist government on the land mass of the Western Hemisphere, and we won't even provide support to an active resistance movement which opposes that Marxist government.

The Sandanistas are arming themselves to the teeth with Soviet HIND helicopters, automatic weapons, and massive amounts of armaments. We are providing our allies in Nicaragua with toothbrushes, blankets, boots, and medical supplies. Now, I'm sure those medical supplies will come in handy when the Contras are wounded by fire from a Soviet helicopter or AK–47.

But it seems to me they should be given the means to shoot down that Soviet helicopter gunship or given the means to effectively fight against Sandanista troops equipped with AK-

47's furnished by Cuba and the Soviet Union. Secretary of State, George Shultz, recently put forward the U.S. objectives in Nicaragua. He stated,

Our objectives in Nicaragua, and the objectives of our friends and allies, are straightforward. We want the Nicaraguan regime to: Reverse its military buildup; send its foreign advisers home; and stop oppressing its citizens and subverting its neighbors.

He made two additional points very germane to this debate in the House. He stated,

The United States and its friends have sought these objectives through diplomacy. But all serious efforts at negotiation have been blocked by the Nicaraguan Communists.

Mr. Chairman, the real purpose of providing military aid to the Contras is to give the Sandanista government an incentive to negotiate. Also, the aid should help in bringing a peace in Central America satisfactory to the interests of the United States. The forces of freedom are on the rise in many countries of the world. Let us make sure those forces of freedom stay viable in Nicaragua.

I support humanitarian assistance and military aid for Nicaragua. Lets brighten the distinction between freedom and freedom's denial in Nicaragua and give those denied freedom a better chance to acquire it.

Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to providing funds for the Contras. I do so because I am convinced that our continued efforts to force a military solution to the complicated problems that face our neighbors in Central America are doomed to failure. Overthrowinig the Sandinistas will only result in continued resentment throughout the hemisphere against heavy handed U.S. interference.

As I have listened to my colleagues during the debate over the past 2 days, I have heard charges and countercharges regarding the Sandinistas and the Contras; I have heard every possible position attributed to the heads of Latin American governments; I have heard charges of drug dealing, terrorism, and brutal human rights violations attributed with equal vehemence to Contras and Sandinistas alike. Mr. Speaker, it may not be the case that truth is the first casualty of war, but it certainly has been battered into unrecognizability on the floor of the House.

What these many opposing truths, spoken by my honorable colleagues, convey to me is that this is not a problem that can be solved with a 100 million dollars' worth of arms. The issue cannot be boiled down into a simple matter of "us" versus "them." Nicaragua is a country that has been torn by civil war for years and, preceding that, governed by a dictator who chose to bomb urban areas in a last desperate attempt to maintain power. It is a country that was devastated by an earthquake in 1972 and never completely rebuilt. It is a country where poverty, lack of basic public health, and illiteracy have been rampant. It is a country whose Sandinista government has made undeniable advances in literacy and health care, and a country that has allied itself with governments that we vigorously oppose. I don't see how we can expect to improve this unstable situation by providing $100 million in arms to a loose confederation of rebels who seem no more dedicated to democracy than the Sandinistas.

The amount of assistance requested—$100 million—has been tossed about as though it is an insignificant sum. But $100 million is not insignificant—some estimate that it would provide $20,000 and $30,000 per Contra combatant. This, in a country where the per capita income is less than $900 per year. In our own country we have unmet social and educational needs that have forced us to contemplate significant budget cuts; $100 million is four times as much as we spent to prevent child abuse last year and twice as much as we spend on immunizations. At a time when every domestic program is threatened, $100 million for any of a number of programs would be a godsend.

More important than the money is our approach to the problem. No one accepts that there should be Soviet or Cuban military influence in Central America. The heads of state of the region have pushed for a regional solution to the security problems posed by the Sandinista government. I feel that we have not made full use of the Contadora process to negotiate with the Sandinistas—a sentiment that is shared by the authors of the Contadora agreement. I am convinced that we will not get lasting democracy in Nicaragua from the barrel of a gun. We should abandon this folly and seek a solution that is more in keeping with the ideals of our Founding Fathers.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to share with my colleagues the following statements by two prominent Jewish leaders in the United States who wish to make us aware of the Sandinista's repressive treatment of the Jewish community in Nicaragua.

Chris Gersten, executive director of the National Jewish Coalition, and Fred Luft, secretary of the Jewish Nicaraguan Community in Exile, are aware of the evidence that has been presented to prove that the Jewish community in Nicaragua has not been singled out for abuse and mistreatment because of their religious beliefs.

These two leaders, actively involved with this region, have quite a different opinion. I urge my colleagues to give their comments serious attention.

STATEMENT ON NICARAGUAN ANTI-SEMITISM

Last night, the CBS eveining news allowed New York Rabbi, Balfour Brickner, to state without challenge, that there was no anti-semitism in Nicaragua, either official or unofficial. According to Brickner, there is no evidence to support the President's claims that Nicaragua's Jewish community was forced out of the country by a systematic government policy of anti-semitism.

I have long been aware, though, that the facts, tell a different story, a story that bears out the President's statements. The National Jewish Coalition has worked tirelessly over the past year, but especially in recent weeks, to bring to light the abuses committed by the Sandinistas against Nicaragua's Jews. The coalition has also worked to make America aware of what Sandinista anti-semitism means for others in Nicaragua and beyond. Despite what Balfour Brickner may believe, today, there are no Jews in Nicaragua. The coalition has mounted a major effort to tell America that, while it is too late to save the Nicaraguan Jewish community, it is not yet too late to save Catholics, Protestants, Miskito Indians and others from the totalitarian net that the Sandinistas are tightening around Nicaragua.

I first became aware of the systematic persecution of Jews by the Sandinista government over a year ago, when I saw documentary evidence of the events that took place.

I say to those who doubt that the Sandinistas are the anti-semites, the President said them to be that:

"It is a substantiated fact that in 1978, the synagogue which Brickner said had been abandoned by the Jewish community was firebombed by Sandinista gunmen while members of the community were inside. When those Jews attempted to flee the building, the gunmen tried to force them back into the burning building.

It is a substantiated fact that Jews received death threats warning them to "get out of the country."

It is a substantiated fact that Jews were singled out for arrest and imprisonment on false charges, that individual Jews were followed, that their homes were searched, their businesses confiscated, their cars burned.

And, lest anyone doubt that these acts of persecution were specifically aimed at Jews, let me refer you to the Sandinista-sanctioned newspaper, Nuevo Diario, which in July 1982 ran articles which referred to "Synagogues of Satan," which accused the Jews of using "the myth of God's chosen people to massacre the Palestinian people without mercy," and which resurrected the charge that "the world's money, banking and finance are in the hands of descendents of Jews," a charge which has for centuries been used by anti-semites to slander Jews.

There are no Jews today in Nicaragua. There are no Jews because the Sandinista regime drove them out with acts of violence and threats of death. Who are the Jews that Brickner claims remain in the country? They are people with Jewish names whose ancestors may, generations ago, have been Jewish. Today, though, the Jews Brickner refers to are Roman Catholics or atheists who have never had any ties to Jews, Judaism or to Nicaragua's former Jewish community.

Let there by no doubt that the Sandinistas are precisely the anti-Semites described by the President. The special zeal reserved by the Sandinistas for persecution of Nicaragua's Jews is well documented.

The Anti-Defamation League of B'Nai Brith has spent five years investigating this persecution, documenting reports by victims of these outrages and by some of the former Sandinistas who had helped carry them out. Yesterday, the ADL released a white paper reaffirming that these incidents did take place. The statements made in this paper have been corroborated by the State Department.

And, most importantly, they have been corroborated by the Nicaraguan Jews who were in the synagogue when it was firebombed, who were falsely arrested and imprisoned, whose cars were burned and property confiscated, and whose lives were threatened by agents of the Sandinista government.

And who was it that assured Rabbi Brickner that no anti-semitism had occurred? Why, it was Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega and his representatives, people who, I suggest, have more than a passing interest in denying their own brutality.

Apart from Brickner and the few of his friends whose first loyalty is to the Ortega regime, the many American Jews whom I have heard from recognize the hostility and violence visited upon their Nicaraguan coreligionists by the Sandinistas.

Thankfully, those Jews are wise enough to recognize Mr. Ortega's denial for the self-serving disinformation that it is. Through the efforts of the National Jewish Coalition, America and American Jews are now aware that the Sandinistas have enthusiastically imitated the anti-semitism of their Soviet mentors.

This week, I and many of my colleagues received a letter from several prominent members of the American Jewish community, including three former chairmen of the umbrella organization of the Jewish community, several rabbis, and many others. These individuals recognize what Rabbi Brickner, and many of my colleagues across the aisle do not: that the Sandinistas are a threat, not only to Jews, but to all those in Nicaragua and beyond who cherish democracy and strive for freedom.

STATEMENT OF FRED S. LUFT, SECRETARY OF THE JEWISH NICARAGUAN COMMUNITY IN EXILE

Ladies and Gentlemen: I am here today as a member of the Exiled Jewish Nicaraguan Community.

I have invited you for the purpose of setting the record straight on Sandinista Anti-Semitism and the Jews in Nicaragua.

Today, there is no Jewish Community or Jewish Congregation or Jewish Life in Nicaragua. Only two Nicaraguan Jews who were members of our Congregation still work in Managua. The rest of our small Community left the country because of fears for our personal safety. This fear was stimulated by the fire bombing of our Synagogue by the Sandinistas while we were worshipping inside, by repeated telephone threats and graffiti on the walls of our businesses, warning us that after their take over we will suffer at their hands the "Sandinista Justice." The graffiti said: "Zionism, Judaism and Somozism are all the same thing." Other graffiti said "Jewish pigs, gun sellers, we will apply the Sandinista justice to you."

This reflected the fact that the Sandinistas have long been virulently anti-Israeli, anti-Zionists and closed collaborators with the PLO and other enemies of Israel. They even planned to kill the President of the Community and other members who they believed were helping Israel in selling the weapons to Somoza, something which was totally absurd.

Although they did not kill the President of the Jewish Congregation, a 70 year old gentleman, he was jailed and forced to sweep the streets and his property was summarily confiscated.

President Reagan has in various occasion made mention of Sandinista anti-semitism. Unfortunately, many individuals who opposed the President's policy in Central America, have repeatedly attempted to distort the facts of Sandinistas state induced anti-semitism. Most recently this was done by Rabbi Balfour Brickner in a statement which appears in the New York Times today.

Because this is a direct challenge to the credibility of President Reagan, and due to the fact that when such false statements have appeared in print in the past, we have written letters to the editors of the newspapers including the New York Times, The Washington Post, and our letters to the editors have never been printed.

Therefore, we have concluded that only by means of this Press Conference to which we have invited you, hoping this will be a more effective way to set the record straight, we can obtain a fair acknowledgement of our plight. Thank you.

With me, today, is Mr. Oscar Kellerman and his wife Mrs. Sarita Beer Kellerman.

Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Chairman, the situation in Central America is a complex and difficult one. Certainly, I am concerned about any overinvolvement of the United States in the region or any inappropriate United States intrusion into the internal policies of legitimate governments in Nicaragua or elsewhere.

This having been said, our security interests in Central America are substantial and compelling, and dictate continued pressure on Nicaragua's Communist regime to desist from its avowed policy of exporting Marxist revolution to neighboring countries. The Sandinista regime is not democratic, and its violations of human rights are gross and pervasive. The regime perpetuates itself in power by military aid from the Soviets, Cuba, North Korea, Bulgaria, Libya and others. This military aid has transformed a small Nicaraguan Army into the largest in the region. A clear threat to its neighbors whose borders it periodically violates.

Mr. Chairman, the Sandinista regime has betrayed the Nicaraguan revolution which overthrew Somoza, and has consistently refused to live up to its agreement with the Organization of American States to hold free and fair elections and respect human rights and the freedoms of speech, the press, and religion, in return for diplomatic recognition of their right to govern. Surely, it must be obvious to the opponents of this aid to the freedom fighters that the Sandinista regime lacks the legitimacy which can only be conferred on it by adherence this agreement.

With full knowledge of these developments, some of the opponents of this assistance to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua argue that this package is simply not enough to aid those freedom fighters to effectively force political concessions from the Sandinistas. This argument is an obvious smoke screen. These are largely the same members who rejected military aid in toto in 1984 and since. It is frivolous to hear them argue now that this is not enough. I would be interested to know what those who claim that this is not enough would propose. Do they urge we do more?

Some of the opponents of this aid package say that we should withhold the aid while we seek a solution through negotiations and diplomacy. However, since this House began rejecting military aid in May 1984, the Sandinistas have been more intransigent and they have consistently rejected the Contadora efforts toward reconciliation. In the meantime, with Soviet bloc arms they are increasing their effort to eradicate their opposition, and forward other Soviet arms to Communist insurgencies in other Latin American countries. An example of this was the weapons they provided to the revolutionary M-19 movement in Colombia, a leading Contadora nation, which then used these weapons to assault that country's supreme court and subsequently kill its members.

Other opponents of aid to the freedom fighters claim that if we send weapons now, we will become involved in a quagmire and end up sending U.S. troops later on. This argument is absurd. This may be our last best hope to prevent Marxist regime from consolidating its power by force of arms, which is certain to lead to continued attempts to destabilize the region by their policy of a revolution without borders. My greatest concern, Mr. Speaker, is that if today we refuse to help those who want to help themselves in Nicaragua, the likelihood of United States military force being required in a massive way is enhanced not reduced.

Mr. Chairman, for all of these reasons I believe the United States should continue to apply pressure to the communist Nicaraguan regime to promote political pluralism in Nicaragua and to desist from exporting Marxist revolution to neighboring countries. My support for the democratic opposition to the Sandinista regime will not end until that regime permits liberty to exist within its borders and ceases its efforts to undermine democratic governments in the region. So long as Nicaragua's ruling junta follows its present policies, America must oppose that regime and aid those within Nicaragua who fight for their freedom.

Mr. Chairman, we in the Congress cannot, as a 535 Member committee, articulate and direct a coherent and effective foreign policy. We can thwart the President, acting as the Commander in Chief and as the constitutional architect of our foreign policy from any meaningful policy that protects our vital national security interests in Central and South America. But we should not allow ourselves to paralyze our Nation's policy in this vital area. If those who would deny this military assistance prevail, the responsibility for a Soviet colony on the mainland of the Western Hemisphere will be theirs. Are they willing to accept that responsibility?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to a great American, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I rise in support of this resolution because I believe it is in the best interests of our beloved America.

I believe most Americans will agree that one of the worst mistakes ever made by our Government was to allow Castro to come to power. I remember in those early days when he lied to the American press and to the American people in denying that he was a Communist.

A little while later, he ridiculed our American people and said "of course he'd been a Communist all the time." We should have known that he participated in the Communist violence in Bogota, Columbia, and what his commitment to communism was; but we did nothing.

What happened? In a little while, he had become the minion of the Soviet Union, both preserving and aggressing communism in the Western Hemisphere; and he and Khrushchev formed a cabal to make Cuba a citadel of military power, buttressed by nuclear weapons, installed in Cuba, 90 miles from my beloved State of Florida.

President Kennedy had to risk nuclear war to get those nuclear weapons out of Cuba. We had to stop Russian ships on the high seas, prepare to board them, if they had not turned back.

Do we want to risk that situation again? Would Gorbachev yield as did Khrushchev? What might be the outcome of it, if we had another confrontration?

"Oh," they say, "this is not a Communist government in Nicaragua." Well, I think everybody will agree that while all of the government is not, the dominant part of the government is.

□ 1405

There must be some interesting data to be observed from three things: First, is today the Communist government of the Government of Nicaragua has formally taken the position and the place of the Communist Party of Nicaragua at all of the conferences on communism all over the world. Second thing: Every time one of the Communist leaders dies, they have a 3-day mourning proclaimed by the Government of Nicaragua, with all the effusive declarations of regret and sorrow that they experience.

Another little item that may be not so insignificant, go into the bookstalls and newsstands in Nicaragua and you will hardly see anything but Communist propaganda. Now they say, "Well, all we got to do is entreat these people to negotiate." They are in power. They control the Government. They have got the help of the Soviet Union furnishing them war materiel. In addition to that 7,500 Cubans, 3,000 of them identified with the military group, are in Nicaragua. What American, what Member of this House who loves our country, as all do, would be sure that if we allow this Government to continue in power with only moral suasion attempted against them that there may not come a time when Gorbachev and whoever is the head of that Government may plant some more nuclear weapons down there in Nicaragua? And what are we going to do this time? They say we should negotiate. The President says, and he knows better than I do, he has negotiated nine times or tried to. I think the President's proposal is fair. I have opposed the President about as much as any Member of this House but I think he is right on this issue today and I think he has been fair. In the morning paper the President is quoted as saying that he will not use the power that we may give him today, if there is an affirmative vote, as I hope there will be, for 90 days, to see if they do want to come to the negotiating table. I am sure the President will agree with us to have a condition subsequent that if this expenditure begins but then we find that the Government of Nicaragua adopts a constitution that the Contadora say is a fair constitution and if they have fair elections and they preserve human rights, we will not spend another dollar.

I am sure there is no doubt in anybody's mind that the President would agree to that. But we are entertaining a dream if we think that by doing nothing we can bring these people into negotiation with us.

My dear colleagues, too many times American Government, American opinion have been divided on crucial foreign policy issues. Today this House of the people is speaking for the people. We are talking about the character of our hemisphere. We are saying we do have an objective. We will not tolerate communism to be the dominant character of the state in any part of the Western Hemisphere, that is what we are saying. We are saying we still believe in the principles of the Monroe Doctrine which are incorporated in the Rio Treaty. Yes, there is a better way than the President has proposed. What is it? For the nations of the Western Hemisphere to join us in throwing these Communists out but until they do let us speak for ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has 4 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield all remaining time to the Honorable Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to speak only briefly today.

This vote that we are about to take is not a matter of partisanship. As far as I am concerned, partisanship ends at the water's edge. All of you know that I have stood with the President on some tough foreign policy questions such as Beirut. I have also opposed him, as I do on our proper role in Nicaragua.

Today's vote is a matter not of politics, but of conscience. I have told Members with whom I have spoken how I feel about the issue and I have made it clear that it is a matter for them to weigh as heavily as I have.

It is my view that a policy of providing military weapons for the war in Nicaragua takes us in the wrong direction. It takes us further down the road, further toward a situation where our country's own troops become involved. Just as covert aid has become overt, just as humanitarian aid has now become lethal, just as we have moved from a role of arms supplier to that of trainer and adviser, I see the pattern continuing. I see us becoming engaged, step by step, in a military situation that brings us directly into the fighting.

I don't believe that we can have it both ways, that we can arm and train the Contras, that we can send U.S. weapons and U.S.-trained and U.S.-directed soldiers into the field without feeling some ultimate responsibility for their safety. When it comes to the crunch, we will find ourselves with only two options: either to go in ourselves or see our trained contingents face a bloodbath.

I don't like those options. I want to avoid them and that is why I oppose the new escalation of the war that could be triggered by today's vote.

That is my position, but I recognize there are others in this Chamber who sincerely support the rebel forces in Nicaragua and are willing to accept the risks of becoming their supporters in the field. I do not approve of this view. I would not vote for it, but neither would I question the patriotism of those who take such a position.

I said that today's vote is a matter of conscience, not of politics. What disturbs me as Speaker is not the positions some Members have taken but the tactics that have been used by those outside this body.

I was elected to the Congress in 1952. As some of you will recall, that was not a good time for our country. Fingers were being pointed, reputations were being destroyed. People were frightened not by an enemy abroad but by accusations made by their own countrymen. It was a time when lists were drawn up of who was loyal and who was not.

That dark era of fear in our country did not end because one political party blew the whistle on this sort of conduct, but because both parties agreed that our democracy can and must allow for the free expression of views, that Americans had not only the right but also the duty to speak their minds on questions of national policy without fear, without the dread that their motives and purposes will be questioned.

I am proud that this House of Representatives has been able to engage in strong and hard debate over foreign policy matters in recent years. I am proud that we have been able to weigh the consequences of administration policies. That is our duty. That is what people elect us to do, to weigh the consequences of various policies.

There is a difference between debating the effects of policy and questioning the motives of those who advocate those policies. In recent days, we have seen newpaper advertisements questioning the loyalty of Members of the Congress. There has been a drumbeat of such attacks, some of them directed and voiced by administration staff people. The message has been crystal clear: Oppose the $100 million and you are somehow un-American; you are acting to help our country's enemies.

What is really un-American is the charge that we, the elected representatives of the people, do not have the right to do the job we were elected to do: To represent the good sense of our own constituents and their justified conclusion that more U.S. weapons will simply mean more bloodshed; that the $100 million will not be the end but simply the downpayment; that we should never again get into a war for which our best hope is a bloody and dangerous stalemate, when there are other alternatives.

My conscience dictates that I vote "nay," not only to the policy but to its tactics as well.

Mr Speaker, let me read just two communications that I have received:

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
London SWIA OAA, February 26, 1986.

Mr. TIP O'NEILL,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC, USA.

MY DEAR TIP: I am writing, as Foreign Affairs Spokesman of the Labour Party, to convey my concern at the requests made by the Reagan Administration to Congress to increase humanitarian aid, and provide military assistance, to the Contra forces in Nicaragua. There is great concern in Europe at this proposal and at the announcement of help for UNITA. In the opinion of many of us these actions will seriously jeopardise the prospects for regional stability in these areas.

I have to say that the policy of the U.S. Administration toward Nicaragua continues to place a heavy strain on the Western alliance. The rejection of the Corabelleda declaration and allegations that the U.S. government has violated the Boland amendment have fueled the belief that the American government has no serious interest in a negotiated solution to the problems of Central America. Such an approach not only jeopardizses the prospect of a negotiated solution but impedes those forces within Nicaragua who most strongly support the development of a more pluralist society.

I urge you and your colleagues to reject the requests of the administration.

With best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

DENIS HEALEY.

[From the Associated Press, March 20, 1986]

While the House debated, the eight-member Contadora group of Latin American countries made a fresh appeal to avoid the use of force in Central America.

Speaking at a meeting of the Political Council of the Organization of American States in Washington, Venezuelan Ambassador Edilberto Moreno said it was necessary to reiterate the obligation of all member states of the OAS "to solve their controversies exclusively by peaceful means and to abstain from the use of force directly or indirectly."

Moreno said he was speaking for Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Mexico, Panama, Peru, Uruguay, and Venezuela.

Chile's new ambassador to the OAS, Javier Illanes, declared his country's "decided support for the Contadora peace efforts."

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman in the well, the distinguished Republican leader, be granted such additional time as he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. BADHAM].

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday, I received a copy of the Democratic Caucus' report "Peace, Democracy, and Development in Central America: A Democratic Alternative." This report attacks President Reagan's policy toward Central America and states that the administration seeks only a military solution. However, the report ignores the fact that the current United States policy toward Nicaragua's Sandinistas was charted during the last months of the Carter administration. Indeed, I am sure that you are aware that Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's National Security Adviser fully supports the $100 million aid to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

Further, the Democratic report states that the United States should negotiate with the Sandinistas about their aggressive external policies, but forget about the Sandinista's internal policies simply because they are Communists and will not negotiate about such things. This is very strange logic. Why would the Sandinistas want to talk about anything? They have everything to lose. Absolute totalitarians cannot talk about power-sharing nor of coexistence with their democratic neighbors.

Meanwhile, while we cannot pressure the Sandinistas for internal reforms, the Democrats wish to use military pressure to force President Duarte to continue peace talks with the Communist guerrillas in El Salvador. If Duarte doesn't talk, no military aid. But, it was Duarte who has sought talks all along. I don't understand how some of my distinguished colleagues believe that they can have this both ways. Abandon the Nicaraguan freedom fighters because the Sandinista's will not negotiate, and abandon El Salvador if the legitimate Government cannot bring the Communist guerrillas back to the negotiating table.

We must stand up to totalitarian Communist aggression and we must do it now. I strongly urge my colleagues to support the $100 million in aid for the Nicaraguan freedom fighters.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, to close debate, I yield the balance of my time to the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] and I hope he may proceed for 3 long minutes.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, several years ago when I was elected the Republican leader, I said in very brief remarks before presenting the Speaker that there would be occasions when there would be no center aisle and the issue itself would transcend partisanship.

This is one of those occasions.

Mr. Chairman, I would say to the Speaker he may very well take a little heart from the fact that I cannot give you a unanimous vote in support of our resolution from my side; similarly, the Speaker cannot do that on his side today.

Mr. Chairman, I am every so grateful for those of you, JACK MURTHA particularly, DANTE FASCELL, CLAUDE PEPPER, who frankly said it all a few moments ago. I probably would not have to say anything aften what they have done today to help elevate the quality of the debate.

Mr. Chairman, as we conclude these 10 hours of debate, there have been four major arguments against the bipartisan resolution.

It is said that if we aid the Contras, this is the first step toward sending American troops to Central America.

My cosponsor, JACK MURTHA, and I, both of whom have been through this thing called war at its worst level, would consider that the last thing either one of us would ever want to do. I submit that precisely the opposite is the case. This is a step away from sending American boys to do what the Nicaraguan freedom fighters want to do for themselves, if we will only give them the chance.

Those opposing this bill say we have not exhausted negotiations. If it is exhaustion you want, it is exhaustion you will get for the next 90 days. There will be a veritable deluge of diplomacy in Central America. I am not going to bet the mortgage money that the Sandinistas will change their minds and meet the Contras at the bargaining table. But no one can then say that diplomacy has not been given a chance, and that is what will take place under this compromise.

It has been said that our Latin American neighbors are against our policies. As I understand it, the Contadora nations want internal reconciliation in Nicaragua. Is that not what we want? That is what the Roman Catholic bishops want in Nicaragua.

The Latin American nations look at our on-again, off-again actions here in the House and, quite naturally, they fear we will abandon the Contras. Who would not feel like that, seeing that uncertainty that we display from time to time around here?

If we provide effective assistance today, we will then see these Latin American countries coming aboard to support our policy.

Fourth, it is said that Nicaragua poses no military threat to us, but if the Soviet military presence in Central America becomes a serious threat, those opposed to providing aid now will make the hard decision later, even if it means sending American troops. I have heard that bellicose sound coming from a few time to time.

In other words, you are not willing to put out a fire in Nicaragua now, but you will march into hell in Central America later. Oh, I wonder if that is really true. My colleague CLAUDE PEPPER put his finger on it when he made the analogy to Cuba, and I recall those days all too well. I happened to be here at that time. Yes, depose Batista on the right, we said. Get rid of him. For what? We did not know, and we ended up with someone worse on the left.

How many times do we have to go through this thing before it finally soaks in as to what this thing is all about down there? Yes, it is a confrontation between East and West, and do not ever forget it.

As for me, I say why not get the job done while it is still manageable, and without American troops.

To those of you gazing longingly at the April 15 vote—the escape hatch offered by the Speaker—let me tell you what a national security expert told me yesterday. He said, "BOB, if you lose that vote tomorrow, Nicaragua is gone. A month from now will be too late, because the Communists are even now mobilizing for an offensive."

So forget that tantalizing image of some kind of compromise vote a month from now on a supplemental appropriation bill that, quite frankly, is not going to go anywhere.

In moments of great crisis, we do not remain in the same condition; either we rise or we fall; either we transend the crisis or it crushes us. That is as true for institutions and nations as it is for human beings.

So the question is: Do we rise or do we fall? Are we going to avoid the tough questions and some day see Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Honduras go the way of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania? Or do we act like a great power with great responsibilities, like we ought to?

I urge each of you to rise to the occasion, join with those of us on both sides of the aisle who support this resolution, and, in my judgment, we will write one of the proudest chapters in the history of this House.

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the overwhelming majority of Members on my side of the aisle who support the resolution, recognizing that for some it is a very difficult decision for you. We all have to make those decisions from time to time.

Again, I am especially appreciative of the work of my cosponsor JACK MURTHA and those roughly 50 Members that I can see on that side of the aisle, good Members of the majority party, who are also supporting our bipartisan resolution.

Mr. Chairman may I finally say to the Speaker, I love him. We are great friends. I respect his sincerity. I know what an emotional issue this is with him. I think I know something special about that and will not spell it out here. But I just have to say, today, our Speaker is wrong. He is wrong, wrong, wrong. I would say that I hope a majority, of this House will feel as strongly as we do about this resolution and support this bipartisan resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. All time for general debate has expired.

The text of House Joint Resolution 540 is as follows:

H.J. RES. 540

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress hereby approves the additional authority and assistance for the Nicaraguan democratic resistance that the President requested pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985, notwithstanding section 10 of Public Law 91-672.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to section 722(n), Public Law 99-83, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WHITLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 540) relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985, he reported the joint resolution back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to section 722(n), Public Law 99-83, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 210, nays 222, not voting 3, as follows:

So the joint resolution was not passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RESIGNATION AS MEMBER AND APPOINTMENT AS MEMBER OF UNITED STATES-MEXICO INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Honorable PATRICIA SCHROEDER, Member of Congress:

MARCH 20, 1986.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER, I am willing to accede to the wishes of the chairman of the U.S.-Mexican Interparliamentary delegation that 2 serve in a capacity as ex officio hostess instead of as a member of the delegation.

PAT SCHROEDER.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COLEMAN] to fill the vacancy.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 534, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, 1986

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 534) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so to ask the gentleman from Mississippi the question: Is my understanding that the resolution that we have before us has been stripped now of the language that was the nonconferenceable language that brought up a problem in the House previously? Is that correct?

Mr. WHITTEN. If the gentleman will yield, that has been satisfactorily settled with conferees on both sides.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the conference report.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of March 19, 1986.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOAKLEY). The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN].

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, may I say the only item in disagreement between the House and Senate has been settled. That is amendment No. 1, which has been resolved. The Senate has already passed this conference report.

The following language is that agreed on by conferees on both sides, and I quote:

It is agreed that at least $1.7 billion is available for the Insured Operating Loan Program of the Farmer's Home Administration. Therefore, the Secretary shall proceed immediately to make loans to farmers and farmowners. If these funds should prove to be insufficient, other funds should be made available to meet emergency credit needs of the American farmers and ranchers.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to insert the full text of the agreed upon resolution:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

For the operations of the Commodity Credit Corporation, not to exceed $5,000,000,000 for capital restoration, to enable the Corporation to use the authority authorized by the Charter of the Corporation and other laws to carry out programs handled by the Corporation: Provided, That Corporation programs shall retain the goal of sufficient production to meet domestic needs, maintain the supply line, and provide for our share of exports at competitive prices: Provided further, That after fiscal year 1987, funds available to the Corporation may be used to carry out section 1241(a)(1) of the Food Security Act of 1985, only to such extent or in such amounts as provided in advance in appropriations Acts. The sign-up agreement should not reduce total production below levels needed to meet domestic needs, maintain the supply line, and provide for an adequate supply for export by either the Commodity Credit Corporation or private corporations or individuals at competitive prices; since by law the proceeds from sales become available for use by the Commodity Credit Corporation, such sales should reduce future appropriations: Provided further, That the conservation reserve program shall not replace or reduce any existing conservation program.

It is agreed that at least $1,700,000,000 is available for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration. Therefore the Secretary shall proceed immediately to make loans to farmers and farmowners. If these funds should prove to be insufficient, other funds should be made available to meet emergency credit needs of American farmers and ranchers.

Mr. WHITTEN. May I say there is no dissention among the conferees on this report. I urge the Members' support.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the chairman of the subcommittee for his diligent work on this most urgent matter and rise in support of House Joint Resolution 534, a supplemental appropriation of $5 billion for the CCC.

This urgent supplemental is crucial in the agricultural sectors of this country. Our farmers are waiting for us to pass this bill so that provisions in the 1985 farm bill can be fully funded in timely fashion. Among other things, this will enable them to receive 40 percent of advanced deficiency payments from their local ASCS offices. You know, for a lot of farmers, this will also help ease the credit crunch, for spring planting.

Although this supplemental will not be adequate to fund CCC programs through the rest of the year, it will help them function through the summer. This will allow a better assessment of CCC needs to complete the year. I also would again like to point out that it is extremely difficult to estimate future needs due to the fluctuations in participation and weather.

Also most important, this supplemental points out that at least $1.7 billion is available for insured FmHA operating loans in 1986. This will not even begin to reach the $4 billion level reached in 1985, but instruct the Secretary of Agriculture to immediately make loans to farmers and farm owners. If this amount proves to be insufficient, other funds should be made available to meet these emergency credit needs.

I urge a yes vote on House Joint Resolution 534.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report that your conferees have finally reached agreement on this further conference report for the urgent CCC supplemental. It is one which I understand is acceptable to the administration, so I hope we can finally dispense with it.

To summarize the contents of the current agreement, let me point out that it does contain the $5 billion which each of us have sought all along for the Commodity Credit Corporation. It also contains the language in the House-passed version restating the Corporation's goals. We have included language affirming our existing commitment to the Conservation Reserve by striking House language which would have required advance appropriations, and we have retained the House provision indicating our continued support for existing conservation programs.

Finally, we have agreed to delete the language which I opposed and the other body struck on a point of order with regard to the Farmers Home Administration insured operating loan levels. The conference agreement emphasized the availability of $1.7 billion for this program, the level authorized in the 1985 Farm Bill. It directs the Secretary to proceed making loans, and contains some long-awaited compromise language which states that other funds should be made available to meet the credit needs of American farmers and ranchers if the fiscal year 1986 ceiling on loan authority is insufficient.

Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this report. And, as I understand, the administration does not object. No new or hidden budget-busting provisions are contained in this agreement. Should there be a proven need for additional FmHA lending authority, the House will be able to address it through the normal channels on another appropriations bill or through approval of requested transfers and reprogrammings. The extra billion dollars is not in this further conference report. I repeat, it is not in this report.

In closing, I would like to take this opportunity to say to my colleagues that this year, as we've found out, it ain't gonna be easy. The history of the conference report before us proves, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that the heyday is over. Whether or not the Supreme Court strikes down the automatic sequestrations, we are still going to have to live with the facts of the Gramm-Rudman life.

In a decisive 61–33 vote taken in the other body, it was shown that there will be no new increases in outlays without offsets in other accounts. If we want more farm loans, there are going to be less units of housing for the elderly, less student aid, less security for our embassies abroad, less biomedical research, and less medical care for the veterans. These are the clearcut tradeoffs we will have to make.

The lessons that we have learned in this urgent supplemental have been costly—we have kept the CCC closed for 2 weeks and the Crop Insurance Corporation closed for 3 days. The farmers and businessmen and women who have had their payments held up should know that the money due them under the law has been held hostage to a few efforts to rewrite the farm bill and Gramm-Rudman, and to send some sort of poison pen letter to the new Secretary.

I hope that this lesson will not have to be repeated. I hope that we will stop toying around with the Federal agencies and corporations we're supposed to oversee, and the people who elected us to represent them.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of our conference report.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COLEMAN].

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this conference report and want to clarify a previous vote on this bill when it passed the House, I believe it was last week; rollcall No. 50.

I either inadvertently hit the wrong button or the electronic device did not capture my correct vote. In any event, I was supportive of the bill then; I am supportive of the bill now.

We in the Midwest have a great need for this direct loan moneys, and we hope that this bill will provide much assistance to farmers as they go into their spring planting.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlemen from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON].

Mr. GUNDERSON. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I just simply want to rise once again to call upon the Appropriations Committee and our distinguished chairman: Please do not do this to us. Year after year we are going through this process. We have now been over a month without money in the CCC because we refuse to fully fund the Commodity Credit Corporation on an annual basis.

As the distinguished lady has said, this is not going to do it. We are going to be back here again, and I know you mean well and I know you think you are helping agriculture, but let me tell you, our colleagues are getting very fed up. They think supplementals are spending additional money above and beyond the normal appropriation.

So the longer we play this game the more we are hurting agriculture rather than helping them. Let us pass the necessary funds in the Commodity Credit Corporation. We all know what that is.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. DAUB].

Mr. DAUB. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment and follow on with what our colleagues, Mr. GUNDERSON, said to us. The problem maybe is not so much that we nickel and dime the CCC, I say to my good friend and chairman of the committee, because I know he has to manage the money of this country and we appreciate the effort he makes.

The bankers in the Midwest tell me that they cannot make their loans because they do not have an understanding of what the cash flows will be as they look at that asset called the CCC relative to the help that it does give to our growers and producers all across the country in a variety of kinds of agriculture.

May I ask this question of either Mrs. SMITH or Mr. WHITTEN: Do we know yet whether Gramm-Rudman and its 4.3 reduction as of March 1 will affect the second payment that will be made on this crop signup that will be paid in fiscal 1987?

Could someone answer that question?

□ 1455

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

In my opinion, they could have gone ahead with a whole lot of things that perhaps they have not. I think we have had kind of a breakdown at the county level for one reason or another to where they just have not filed applications or where they have filed applications, they have not operated under them.

I met with the head of the Farmers Home Administration last Friday, I believe it was, and I think they have a different attitude and they are ready to move, but I do understand that the payment will be made.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, if you sign up with funds now being made available by this particular appropriation, and that farmer says, "I'm going to sign up and I'm going to draw down my 40 percent," that the second part or the remaining 60 percent, although not in the 1986 year, but to be paid after harvest in the 1987 year, will essentially have a sanctity of contract and not be cut more than 4.3 percent?

Mr. WHITTEN. I have been assured that it will be carried out, but may I say it will depend on the terms of the contract.

Let me direct my attention to the Commodity Credit Corporation. The budget request this year was that we take all controls off for the Commodity Credit Corporation—take off all controls. We have not done that, but we do, in Government, give more and more jobs to the Commodity Credit Corporation. Of course, our committee can only do what we are asked to do and that is to keep the Corporation where it can handle its business.

Mr. DAUB. I am trying to get a yes or no from the chairman.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to point out that the administration delayed the signup on purpose so they would have that option available to them to make that reduction if they want to. I do not think it is legal under the language we had in the Gramm-Rudman bill. It is not legal for them to do it, but they say that it is legal for them to do it; so the question cannot be answered here.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, will the chairman yield for a further clarification?

Mr. WHITTEN. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. DAUB. Notwithstanding the comment that it could or could not be true that my colleague, the gentleman from Iowa, has stated, I am trying to find out, if you sign up and if Gramm-Rudman in effect did reduce that first 40 percent of CCC deficiency payments by 4.3 percent, will the remaining 60 percent also be reduced be 4.3 percent, but no more than that?

Mr. WHITTEN. May I say to my colleague that the administration of this comes under the executive branch. I have so much difficulty trying to find out from the Department and from the local offices what the facts are, that I cannot answer. They are supposed to handle this, but they have been mighty slow moving into it, so I cannot tell the gentleman what they will do. I can tell the gentleman what they should do.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman very much.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I thank our friend, the gentlewoman from Nebraska, for yielding the time.

Here we go again. It seems like every time your Appropriations Committee has been on this floor, which has been too frequently in the last 90 days, we get criticized for being here.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON] I guess has left the floor. I am sorry the gentleman has left; but again the gentleman beats this drum that it is the Appropriations Committee's fault that we do not ask for enough money.

Oh, there the gentleman is. Will the gentleman come on over so I can talk to him.

If the gentleman will check the RECORD back on December 19, 1985, this Congress passed the appropriation bill containing $2.7 billion for insured operating loans for the Farmers Home Administration.

The next day a different bill passed in the authorization, authorizing only $1.7 billion, which is in this particular provision here.

Through an interpretation by the Department of Agriculture, they say they have only $1.7 billion available for operating loans, those which are critical.

Now, we feel there is $2.7 billion because the appropriations passed, but because the authorizing bill passed a day later, the attorneys in the Department of Agriculture interpreted that the latest bill, the latter bill shall prevail.

Now, if the gentleman recalls, a couple weeks ago we passed an appropriation bill here containing $2.7 billion. We did not really pass another appropriations bill, because it had already been appropriated; but we identified that $2.7 billion as being available for operating loans.

We went to conference with the other body and in conference we passed the $2.7 billion and that it should remain available.

The interpretation by the other body was that that exceeded the budget limitation, so we had to drop back to the $1.7 billion; but in the language here, if the gentleman will notice, if these funds should prove to be insufficient, which many people feel they probably will and likely are to be, but no one knows at this point whether they will or will not be. This is an uncertain business we are in, as we all know; and yet the gentleman is critical of the Appropriations Committee because we cannot anticipate. The administration admits that it cannot anticipate, either. No one knows how much is going to be the demand out here.

But here is the important part: Other funds should be made available to meet emergency credit needs of American farmers and ranchers.

Now, if I were writing the report, and I did not write this language, in the last part of that sentence I would have said, "Other funds shall be made available from previously appropriated funds." Instead of other funds would be made available.

But nevertheless, the intent of this body is that $1.7 billion we know is available and should be loaned. If more is needed, it is the intent of this language on this body that available funds previously appropriated should be available to loan. I think that extra billion dollars would probably be enough.

But do not shoot the messenger. We are only dealing first with the other body, with the rules of the Budget procedure, as well as the administration.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman yielding and I appreciate his remarks.

I am sure the gentleman heard the distinguished ranking member of the subcommittee, the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH], who indicated earlier that the amount of money that is in this bill will only carry the Commodity Credit Corporation through the summer, which means that we will need more money before we complete the fiscal year on October 1st.

My concern is not with the gentleman from Indiana or the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN] or the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH]. All of you I know are committed to agriculture.

The gentleman and I both now that we have colleagues on both sides of the aisle who when we come back to get more money that we are always asking for more money for agriculture.

Our problem is that our other colleagues are coming up to us and saying, "There you are asking for more money for agriculture. How many times are we going to have supplementals for agriculture?"

We do have estimates and we know right now what the estimates are, what we are going to need between now and the end of the fiscal year.

The distinguished gentlewoman has said why do we not appropriate that much now and be done with it? Then if as the gentleman indicated prices change, the crops surplus changes, and we have got to come back and get a true honest supplemental that is fine. That is beyond the gentleman's control, and I recognize and understand that.

My only concern is that we are getting a bad name for agriculture by doing this piecemeal.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. I would not disagree with the gentleman. We do not like it either, because it is taking our time and the time of the gentleman. We have to come back and beat this again because the rules of the House prohibit it; but if the gentleman will look at the RECORD, he will find why we are here because of what happened in the other body. I cannot of course refer to a particular vote in the other body because of the rules of the House, but if the gentleman will check the RECORD, the gentleman will see that we were forced to go this way.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time. I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 352, nays 71, not voting 11, as follows:

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO HAVE UNTIL MIDNIGHT, TUESDAY, MARCH 25, 1986, TO FILE REPORT ON A BILL MAKING SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1986

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight, Tuesday, March 25, 1986, to file a privileged report on a bill making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONTE reserved all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

IMMEDIATE MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

(Mr. WHITTEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the announcement that the Committee on Appropriations will meet immediately on the supplemental appropriations bill in its full committee room.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. LOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask to address the House at this time so that Members may be advised of the schedule for the balance of the day and the week. I will be glad to yield to the distinguished majority leader for that purpose.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for giving us this opportunity to discuss exactly where we are at this moment.

It is our purpose at this time to proceed with special orders pending a possible resolution of the elements involved in the reconciliation bill. It is our understanding that the leadership on the Senate side has agreed to certain elements on a settlement that they want to be considered on our side. In order that our principals have the opportunity to consider those and evaluate them, we would like for Members to be advised that we will go into special orders and proceed on special orders, pending such time as it is able to be determined whether or not there is a settlement with regard to reconciliation. We would hope that might occur within a couple of hours.

This we expect would conclude the business for this week. Agreement has been reached by the principals on both sides of the issue to postpone consideration of the gun control legislation until the Wednesday after the Easter recess. That will be the 9th day of April, Wednesday, April 9.

On that day, we expect to take up the rule and begin debate on the gun control legislation. It will not be considered this week.

Mr. LOTT. If the gentleman will yield at that point, I understand the gentleman will ask unanimous consent at the appropriate time that we come in at 10 o'clock on that Wednesday, April 9, to consider the gun bill. I would like to advise the leader that we would have no objection to that.

HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1986

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Tuesday, April 8, 1986, we adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock on Wednesday, April 9, 1986.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the gentleman will yield further, the further information we need to give is that if we conclude this business this evening, we will have only a pro forma session tomorrow, and only pro forma sessions on Monday and Tuesday. But that depends upon our being able to conclude the matter of reconciliation this evening.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman for that information. If I may repeat it just so Members will understand, we will not take up the gun bill or even the rule on the gun bill today; is that correct?

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. LOTT. They will be brought up instead on Wednesday, April 9, at 10 a.m.

We are still working now to try to get a resolution of the reconciliation package. There are meetings occurring at this time, and the Members should be on notice that we hope to get something this afternoon, as soon as possible. Now that may be minutes or that may be hours or more, but we will proceed in the meantime with special orders while we await action in that regard; is that corect?

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. LOTT. Does the gentleman expect a pro forma session on Tuesday, April 8, or do we expect to have legislative business and defer votes until Wednesday? What would be the situation?

Mr. WRIGHT. We expect to have a pro forma session on Monday, April 7, and on Tuesday, April 8, to take up suspensions, debate, and vote on them by voice vote, but to postpone any recorded votes on those suspensions until the following day, Wednesday, April 9.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman for that information. Now we can go to work on reconciliation.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will accept 1-minute speeches before embarking on special orders.

WORLDWIDE EXPRESSION OF BROTHERHOOD COOPERATION AND PEACE

(Mr. DARDEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, March 28, Rome, GA, will be the center of a worldwide expression of brotherhood, cooperation, and peace—all centered around the simultaneous broadcast by more than 8,000 radio stations in 35 nations of the song, "We Are the World."

This is the second year in which Rome Radio Station WROM-AM/WKCX-FM is organizing a simulcast of this song, calling mankind's attention to the need for cooperation in solving our common problems. Last year's simulcast—prompted by the plight of famine victims in Africa—was carried on 7,000 radio stations in 27 nations.

I call attention to the contribution of disc jockey Bob Wolfe, organizer of both simulcasts. Bob Wolfe has proven that one person can make a difference—that one man's love and concern for other human beings truly can be a light to the rest of the world.

At 10:50 a.m. eastern time on March 28, I urge my colleagues to join 7,000 schoolchildren in Rome's Barron Stadium—and millions more listening to their radios—in singing "We Are the World"—a message of peace and good will to all the people of the earth.

MYTHS AND FACTS ABOUT RED MEAT

(Mr. ROBERTS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, today has been declared "American Meat Out Day" by several organizations who lay claim to be guardians of public health.

The theme is for consumers to eat less meat in order to become more healthy. Mr. Speaker, this is a disservice to our livestock and red meat industry. More to the point, the argument is based upon myth, not fact. I do not quarrel with individual preference of those who choose not to eat meat but in order to make that choice, the consumer's decision should be based upon fact. Let us set the record straight.

Red meat production is the largest segment of American agriculture, accounting for more than a fifth of all farm marketings. And every dollar that this $30 billion a-year industry generates is multiplied five or six times in related industries. Furthermore, for every job created on the farm or ranch, there are six jobs created in related industries. The beef industry is indeed an essential part of this country's economy, and it saddens me to hear of such activities as the "Meat-Out."

I think it is time to stand up for beef, pork, and lamb producers and their products. And it is time to dispel some of the myths and half-truths used to malign this great industry.

Myth: Red meat has no place in a healthy diet.

Fact: Balance and moderation are the keys to good diet. About 50 separate nutrients are essential to health, and no single food contains all of these. For example, beef is an excellent source of vitamin B-12, but is not a source of vitamin C. Oranges contain vitamin C, but virtually no protein. That's why it's important to eat a varied diet.

So what nutrients does beef contribute? Beef offers a substantial amount of protein—nutritionally complete protein containing all eight essential amino acids in the ideal proportions for human nutrition. A 3-ounce portion of cooked sirloin trimmed of fat contributes 40 percent of the U.S. recommended daily allowance for vitamin B-12, 37 percent of the zinc RDA, 18 percent of the niacin, 57 percent of the protein, and 16 percent of the iron. Furthermore, that is heme [heem] iron, which is three to five times more easily absorbed by the body and actually serves as a catalyst for the absorption of other types of iron. Since iron deficiency is one of the most common dietary deficiencies among women in the United States today, it makes sense to include beef in the diet.

Myth: Red meat is high in cholesterol and fat.

Fact: Three ounces of cooked lean pork contain only 79 milligrams of cholesterol. By comparison, the same amount of roast chicken contains 76 milligrams; cheddar cheese 90 milligrams; and shrimp 130 milligrams.

Cattlemen have been steadily improving their product—using new breeding and feeding technologies—so that it is 10 percent-leaner today than it was 20 years ago. Three ounces of cooked lean beef contain only nine grams of fat, and less than half of that is saturated. Of all the fat in the U.S. food supply, only 36 percent comes from meat and fish. The increase in fat consumption which we have seen in recent years is the result of an increase in the use of vegetable fats.

Myth: Americans eat too much red meat.

Fact: The American Heart Association says that a healthy person can eat up to seven ounces of lean red meat, poultry, and seafood per day. Presently, for example Americans consume an average of only 2 ounces of cooked lean beef per day—considerably less than the recommended daily intake of foods from the meat group.

Myth: Government agencies recommend that Americans not eat red meat.

Fact: Government agencies recommend moderation in the diet, and they often caution against "too much" fat, saturated fat and cholesterol. In fact, most agencies now say that lean meat can be an appropriate part of restrictive diets as well as more conventional diets. The problem is that people interpreting diet recommendations—including some people in the media—automatically assume, and state, that red meat is a fatty food and that its intake should be cut back. Unfortunately, the sources for such stories have not assumed responsibility for seeing that their advice is properly interpreted. If Government agencies and organizations are going to issue dietary guidance, they should be obligated to see that health professionals, the news media and the public get all the facts. They should be obligated to help see that their diet recommendations are correctly interpreted.

Myth: Red meat is too expensive.

Fact: While average meat prices have changed little in the past 6 years, other food prices have increased. Americans now spend an average of 1.7 percent of their disposable income for beef and, in view of its contribution to the diet, beef is a particularly good value.

Myth: Livestock graze on valuable land and consume grain that could be used to feed the world's hungry.

Fact: About 1 billion acres of the Nation's 2.2 billion acres of land are used for pasture and grazing. The vast majority of this land is too rugged, too arid, too wet or too high to cultivate crops of any kind. If it were not for grazing ruminants such as cattle and sheep, this 1 billion acres of land would have no productive use. These animals are able to convert otherwise unusable cellulose in grass and shrubs into nutritious food.

For example: Grain fed to beef cattle represents only 15 percent of the total feed for cattle. This grain is mostly feed grain, for which there is little or no demand as human food. So feeding less grain, which is already in oversupply, would do nothing to help the hungry.

Red meat is an important industry for our Nation, and an important source of nutrition for Americans. Rather than a "Meat-Out" we should have a "Meat-In" to recognize how the majority of Americans feel about the red meat industry.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

(Mr. DE LA GARZA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, today is National Agriculture Day, and I want to take this opportunity to spell out, for all Americans, what this observance means to all the people of our country.

Congress passed the law calling for this observance because we want to continue a tradition of honoring the men and women whose hard work and sacrifices give us, every day, our daily bread. But while we pay tribute to the farmers of America, I want to remind the House that in recognizing the contributions of American agriculture, we are also honoring the work of millions of other workers.

When we call on the country to take note of what agriculture does, we are certainly talking about farmers. But we are also talking about the men and women who manufacture farm machinery, fertilizers, farm chemicals, and agricultural supplies of all kinds. We are talking about the people who move the farmers' crops, livestock, and milk from the farm and ranch to processing plants or consumers. We are talking about the farm workers who cultivate the crops, pick the vegetables and care for the cattle, hogs, and chickens. We are talking about the people who take wheat and turn it into bread, or who convert raw foods into packaged complete dinners ready for use in today's homes.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on for a long time listing all the people who are part of modern agriculture—the groups that handle marketing in this country and overseas, the wholesalers and retailers who bring food to consumers in the greatest variety and with the highest quality available anywhere in the world—and at the lowest real cost in the world. But I think the point is clear. Agriculture is not only our most basic industry, it is our largest industry. It involves about 21 million jobs—about one out of every five private enterprise jobs in this country.

Not many of us are farmers, Mr. Speaker, but every one of us in this Nation has a stake in what happens on the farm and in the entire agricultural industry. Some Americans have that stake because they make a living in one of the segments of agriculture that operates off the farm. But whether you work in some phase of agriculture or not, you are affected by what happens to agriculture.

What it boils down to is this:

A healthy agricultural industry is good news for America because it means long-term assurance of continued adequate food and fiber supplies at reasonable and stable prices—and because it contributes to the strength of the whole national economy.

But an agricultural industry that is struggling through a depression is bad news for America. That is because a depressed agriculture will be less able to meet the needs of American consumers over the long run—and because a depressed agriculture weakens the entire national economy.

I hope this message can be brought to all parts of the country and all groups today as we celebrate the annual observance of National Agriculture Day. This observance is coordinated each year by the Agriculture Council of America, a non-partisan, non-profit organization that devotes itself to promoting progress in agriculture and a national understanding of agriculture.

I would be very happy if I could come to you today to tell you that the outlook for our farm economy this year is good. It would be nice to predict that all efficient farmers are going to earn good incomes in 1986. I would love to be able to say that our only problem will be in keeping up with the demand for farm products.

The fact is, however, that we are going through what amounts to a depression in some agricultural areas. Not all parts of the country and not all segments of agriculture have been hit to the same degree. But even in areas that have so far escaped the worst of the squeeze, we are beginning to see problems ahead.

If I look far enough into the future, I can be an optimist about agriculture. Population and food demand are going to grow in the years ahead. By sometime in the next century, we could be concerned again about whether we can produce enough to meet the world's needs. But for the present, and for the next few years, our problem is farm income.

American agriculture today can produce more of many commodities than we can sell at prices good enough to keep the farm economy healthy. There are no quick, clean and easy solutions to this problem. What we can do, and what we must do, is to find a way to help efficient farmers hold on until the economic situation improves.

This is one of the reasons Congress was willing to pass the 1985 farm bill by an overwhelming margin. Four years ago, when we adopted the 1981 farm bill, it passed in the House by a margin of just two votes. The 1985 farm bill passed in the House by a margin of 325 to 96—better than 3 to 1.

I think this shows that urban America now agrees it has a stake in trying to do something to help rural America. This is good news. It doesn't solve our problems. But it gives us a chance to find solutions—and it gives us added reasons to take some time on this agriculture day to bring the message of American agriculture to all of the people of our country.

One of the things we should be thinking about today is the issue of rebuilding our agricultural export markets.

One of the major factors behind today's trouble in the farm economy has been the decline in export sales for some of our major commodities in recent years. In passing the 1985 farm bill, Congress acted to regain those lost markets, partly by making support loan rates more competitive for major crops and partly by beefing up some of our export promotion programs. As my colleagues know, we were forced to modify some of the new export promotion features of the law recently in order to get other needed changes in the farm bill. But this has not changed the fact that export policy remains one of the key elements in any future agricultural recovery.

With this in mind, I believe we should try to call the importance of the problem to the attention of the Nation at large. And to help in this effort, I am today introducing a bill to proclaim the week of June 16th as National Agricultural Export Week. Passage of this legislation, which I introduced with Congressman EDWARD R. MADIGAN of Illinois, the ranking minority member of the Agriculture Committee, should help get national attention for the significance of export markets to the agricultural and total national economies.

I hope that all Members of the House will join us as cosponsors on the legislation to create a National Agricultural Export Week Observance.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as we share in the bounty of this great country of ours, at least for today, let us thank God for those who till the land and say a special prayer for them—for without them, there is no life.

EAT MORE BEEF

(Mr. ROBERT F. SMITH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROBERT F. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleague from Kansas [Mr. ROBERTS] in his remarks regarding the so-called meat-out on next Thursday. The red meat industry and beef industry are honorable industries. They take no subsidy from this Government, nor the taxpayers of this country. They do not need at this time of almost desperation and recession an additional onslaught on this product which is nutritious to people and has never been found by any medical interests to be a disaster to health or future or longevity in life.

So I am asking my colleagues and those listening to understand that meat is not injurious to your health. In fact, meat is cheap.

Eat more beef.

NONDEDUCTIBILITY OF FEDERAL EXCISE TAXES

(Mr. CHAPMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask my colleagues to support House Resolution 404 which I introduced last evening.

Over in the other body of this institution, there has been proposed a tax reform bill that includes a revenue proposal that would eliminate the deductibility of Federal excise taxes from the cost of doing business. I oppose this proposal for at least six reasons.

First, deductibility of excise taxes is not a loophole. Federal excise taxes are a legitimate cost of doing business.

Second, to eliminate the deductibility of the excise taxes results in a regressive tax and has the effect of raising each Federal excise tax by 54 percent, and this will fall most heavily on those of low- or moderate-income.

Third, nondeductibility results in a disruptive tax increase.

Fourth, nondeductibility is an arbitrary consumption tax.

Fifth, nondeductibility penalizes taxpayers who have acted as Government agents. It would penalize those taxpayers who traditionally have helped our Government as the collectors of this Federal excise tax.

Lastly, nondeductibility is probably unconstitutional and may violate the 16th amendment.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of House Resolution 404 which is a sense-of-the-House resolution that we should maintain the deductibility of the Federal excise taxes.

GUN LEGISLATION WILL IMPROVE SECOND AMENDMENT RIGHTS

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat disappointed to see that the so-called gun bills were taken off of the calendar this afternoon, but I can understand, with the emotion and the pressing of the last issue that was before this House on the matter of Nicaragua and with the oncoming recess, that we were quite possibly going to lose some Members, and this was an issue that has generated a lot of interest, and I think one for which all the Members should be here.

There is also a lot of disinformation floating about this House with regard to both of these bills. I am referring to the one that came out of the Committee on the Judiciary and I am also talking about the one that has been refiled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VOLKMER], who will probably have something to say about it this afternoon.

I believe that both of these bills for those of us who are concerned about the preservation of second amendment rights, are a substantial improvement over existing law. Both of these bills can be improved with some amendments, but I would like to urge all of my colleagues to support at least one of these bills. They are good bills, and they will do a lot to protect the rights of the American people as framed in the second amendment of the Constitution.

RED MEAT HAS RECEIVED A BUM RAP

(Mr. STENHOLM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to echo Mr. ROBERTS' sentiments. Red meat has received a bum rap, not only regarding nutrition but regarding safety, as well. What we too often forget is that our meat supply is the most regulated, the most inspected, and the safest meat supply in the world.

Despite this, we continue to hear scare stories about drugs used in red meat production. I'd like to clear the air on some of these issues.

Before any drug can be used in food production, it must undergo extensive testing. The manufacturer must show that it is not only safe, but that a reliable test exists for detecting residues. Then, and only then, does the Food and Drug Administration approve it's use.

Once the drug is approved, its use is regulated by State and Federal officials who inspect feed mixing facilities and randomly sample animal feed to ensure that the approved levels of the drug are not exceeded.

USDA, through its Food Safety and Inspection Service, oversees the slaughter and processing of all livestock and poultry to insure that the animals are healthy and that all appropriate sanitation measures are taken. They also sample for drug residues.

Once again, meat is randomly inspected when it reaches the retail store—this time by FDA. But because of the precautions taken prior to delivery to the retail store, these residue tests have repeatedly demonstrated that beef is safe and unadulterated.

Despite this, consumers have voiced concern about antibiotic use, and the beef industry has responded. Penicillin is not used at all for beef production, and tetracyclines are not frequently used for growth promotion. Nonetheless, to reassure consumers, the National Cattlemen's Association has recommended to their members that any subtherapeutic use of antibiotics for growth promotion be discontinued until the issue is resolved.

Criticism of the use of growth promotants has also been leveled at the beef industry. But this needs to be put into perspective. The amount of estrogen in 1 gram of meat from a hormone-implanted steer is 22 picograms. That's equivalent to one grain of wheat in a shipment of 65,000 metric tons. And compared to the estrogen in other foods, it is actually very small. For instance, wheat germ contains 4,000 picograms per gram, and soybean oil contains 2 million picograms! So, in a meal containing potatoes, whole wheat bread, green salad, green peas, and ground round steak from estrogen-treated cattle, the food containing the least estrogen is the steak.

But none of these foods present a hazard when you consider how much estrogen the human body produces. Men produce 39,700 times the amount of estrogen that is in hormone-treated beef, women produce 466,000 times that amount, and pregnant women produce 18,750,000 times that amount.

But the whole beef safety issue is best summed up in a statement made by Gilbert Leveille, then of the Department of Food Science and Human Nutrition at Michigan State University. Dr. Leveille said:

> It is ironic that such effort is directed at faulting the diet of the United States, when there is little doubt that this is the most abundant, most varied, and the safest food supply in the world.

PROGRESS OF THE FIREARMS OWNERS PROTECTION ACT

(Mr. VOLKMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I just want to make it clear that the Firearms Owners Protection Act, the legislation that was scheduled to be taken up today and finished up tomorrow, was pulled not at my request. I did not request that the legislation be pulled; in fact, I requested that we continue with the legislation.

However, with matters as they were presented, I finally determined that we were not going to finish it any way we looked at it, and we would have to come back after Easter, and knowing that, I then insisted that we not take up the rule. The Speaker and the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and everyone agreed to do that, and then we agreed to take it up on Wednesday, the 9th.

I want Members to know that I did not instigate the putting off of the consideration of the legislation. I, for one, was prepared, and wanted to proceed with finishing up today and tomorrow.

In a few minutes, I will be taking a 5-minute special order to discuss some of the past abuses of BATF that brought about the reason for the legislation.

REVISED RESCISSION PROPOSALS AND NEW DEFERRALS OF BUDGET AUTHORITY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-186)

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CHAPMAN) laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Thursday, March 20, 1986.)

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call for special orders at this time, but will return to legislative business later in the day.

GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, next Tuesday marks another anniversary of Greek Independence Day. That is not a well-known item, perhaps, in American history books, but for those who are members of the Greek Orthodox Church and those people who have a Greek heritage of which they can speak proudly, as I do, it is a very momentous occasion.

When I was a youngster, and attending church, and learned about the significance of March 25, I learned for the first time that it was a combination of an ethnic celebration and a religious celebration. The religious celebration being the Day of Evangelismou, or the day on which the message of Christiandom was spread throughout the world.

I also learned that, on that day it was in 1821 when a cleric, a priest in a small village in Greece raised the flag of independence. Up to that time, for almost 500 years, that little country of Greece was under the heel of the Ottoman Empire—almost 500 years of total suppression, total dominance by that fearsome regime known as the Ottoman Empire.

Yet on that day, March 25, 1821, this Pater Germanos raised the flag of independence and ignited a flame that lasted throughout the revolution that began on that day and lasted until 1830, finally ending in the independence of Greece from the Ottoman Empire.

During that time, the whole world learned of the beautiful poetry of Lord Byron of England who, when he observed what was happening in Greece, himself went to Greece, and on the battlefield of Missolonghi, on that battlefield on the side of Greek revolutionaries, Lord Byron—the great poet, great general, great leader—died on land of a country for which he had great admiration and about which he wrote some of his richest poetry.

So we who learned and were born into the history and tradition of the Greek religion and history, began to learn even more as the years progressed.

□ 1545

What we learned was that that did not go unnoticed in the United States of America. In those years when President Monroe was advocating and pronouncing the Monroe Doctrine, which ironically came into the very debate which we have concluded here today on Nicaragua, that Monroe Doctrine was one which will live forever, of course, in American history. But at the same time he took pains to proclaim the right of the Greek nation to be independent from the Ottoman Empire and Member after Member stood up on the floor of the House, where I am privileged today to occupy a small part, and gave support to that Greek revolution, citing that 500 years of repression and slavery, outright slavery, I might say, which characterized the heel of the Ottoman Empire.

So it was that the American Government and the American people in various ways, by collecting moneys, by collecting support of materiel and having their elected representatives on the floor of the House of Representatives evince that support for the Greek nation, in total were able to create such a momentum that in that blessed day in 1830 the last vestige of the Ottoman Empire was removed from the nation we now know as Greece.

So it is fitting that the cradle of democracy, where democracy was born, where the principles were first announced which Thomas Jefferson adopted for utilization in this country, the benefit of which we now exercise here on the floor of the House, was again reemphasized in the 1820's when this Nation stood side by side with that small country to rekindle the spirit of liberty and democracy which Greece first presented to the American Nation through its classical history and, then in the mid-19th century, to reconfirm with the rhetoric and the purpose and the esteem of the President of the United States and the Members of Congress of that era.

So it is a part of American history. It is more than just with ethnic pride that I stand here and repeat some of the themes of this occasion. It is now, or should be, regarded as part of American history.

I thank the Speaker.

THE NEED FOR THE FIREARMS OWNERS PROTECTION ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VOLKMER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. VOLKMER. As announced, Mr. Speaker, I would like to review some of the matters that have given rise to the need for the legislation which I have entitled the Firearms Owners Protection Act which I have worked on for 6½ years.

Mr. Speaker, for reasons known to some of us, there have been no real hearings in this House on the civil liberties abuses which inspired the substitute and its Senate counterpart. I therefore want to stress that need for the substitute is not based upon hypotheticals, but upon abuses—some might call them atrocities—perpetrated against real people. These abuses were documented in 6 years of hearings before two different committees, and deserve mention here.

The first sets of hearings were held in Senate Appropriations and were chaired by DENNIS DECONCINI. The first witness was David Moorhead, a decorated and disabled Vietnam veteran from New Hampshire. The Tet offensive had left Moorhead with eight major wounds. Told he would never walk again, he persevered and left the wheelchair behind. Moorhead's gunshop, located in a small New Hampshire town, was one day visited by an undercover agent who casually asked if Moorhead would make an illegal sale. Moorhead instead noted his auto license plate and called BATF to turn the man in and urge his arrest. He was that type of person. The informant had, however, seen in Moorhead's shop an M-14, which Moorhead had bought from a Boy Scout leader and kept as a memento of his service. Although the gun was semiautomatic, BATF's experts felt it was originally designed to work, if fitted with extra parts, as a machinegun. BATF sent a team of agents to raid his shop and take him into custody on felony charges. When his wife, a nurse, sought to accompany him, she was told to stay with the search party or be arrested. Following their policy of involving local officials in a search party, the agents had taken the county sheriff with them. To their chagrin the sheriff immediately agreed to become a character witness for Moorhead.

At trial, the prosecution argued that good faith was no defense: Moorhead should be subject to 10 years' imprisonment for an honest act. Judge Bownes—since elevated to the circuit—had the courage to dismiss the case. From the bench he asked Moorhead to stand and the judge apologized to him on behalf of the United States, calling the case a travesty. Moorhead, who at this point was indigent, was still being sued by BATF for license revocation and forfeiture of the rifle. Under these pressures, he finally gave up the shop.

Another dealer, H.W. Phillips of Virginia, had a related experience. He was approached by an undercover agent who had proper identification and was legally entitled to purchase a firearm. However, since the agent claimed he had muttered a statement about desiring to transfer the firearm to his girlfriend who resided in another State, the prosecution sought to convict Phillips of aiding an interstate sale. The case fell apart so completely that the judge directed a verdict of acquittal. The agency had seized some 44 firearms from Phillips' shop—and it took two court orders to get them returned. The Bureau also withheld Phillips' license for over a year after his acquittal. Although ultimately vindicated, the experience left Phillips out of pocket some $7,000 in legal fees. Senator MCCLURE, sitting on the committee, read into a record a Justice Department memorandum complaining that BATF's mass seizures of all of a dealer's guns were sometimes so blatantly illegal as to enrage judges hearing of it and jeopardize the prosecution.

A third witness documented a different abuse. R. C. Lindsey of Florida, like many collectors, held a dealer's license in order to purchase for himself and close friends. BATF sought to revoke it, not upon the grounds that he had ever done wrong, but upon the ground that he was not selling enough guns to merit it. He had sold three—at a time when the Bureau was prosecuting unlicensed persons selling three or four guns for dealing without a license. The agent inspecting his rather limited books told him to resign the license; upon his refusing, the agent said he would see to it that Lindsey had to hire a lawyer to keep it. He kept that promise; it cost Lindsey some $4,000 in legal fees. The Bureau granted Lindsey the revocation hearing required by law, and appointed one J.E. McDevitt hearing officer. Not surprisingly, McDevitt ruled against Lindsey. Lindsey's breakthrough came after he made a Freedom of Information request. Although the Administrative Procedure Act requires hearing officers to be unbiased and prohibits appointing one who has had anything to do with the case, Lindsey discovered a memorandum from McDevitt, dated only a few months before the hearing, in which McDevitt, took a part in pressing the case against him and indicated how his superiors in the Bureau should handle it, together with his suggestion as to why the license should be revoked. Upon being confronted with the document, the Bureau promptly reversed its position and issued the license.

GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY (MARCH 25)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BILIRAKIS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, in just a few days, on March 25, the people of Greece will celebrate an anniversary, and I would like to take a moment to extend my heartfelt congratulations and admiration to them.

Mr. Speaker on March 25, 1821, the Greeks embarked on their long and just struggle to escape the grasp of their Turkish oppressors, I think it important that we take a moment to reflect upon this momentous historic event, for it holds many parallels to current political situations throughout the world. March 25 commemorates the 165th anniversary of the beginning of Greece's struggle for independence from over 400 years of foreign domination. On that historic day, the Greek people began a series of uprisings against their Turkish oppressors which soon turned into a revolution taking successes from the empire almost from the beginning.

The Greek resistance, small battle-weary groups of guerillas known as "klephtes," was ill-clad, ill-fed, and ill-equipped, but they valiantly fought for their right to a national identity. The justice of their cause soon spread and encouraged a movement throughout Europe, as well as the United States, to assist the Greeks in their heroic struggle. The valiant fight lasted through many long, difficult years, until the blood and labor of the Greeks was finally rewarded when the sultan was forced to concede national political independence to the Greek revolutionaries after the Battle of Navarino on October 20, 1827.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the legacy of the Greek people to the free world. By the example of the sacrifices of these patriots, they have, hopefully, given others the strength to defend the principles founded by our ancestors. It was precisely this Greek legacy and spirit that prompted President Harry S. Truman, among others, to note in the post World War II era that: "The valor of Greece . . . convinces me that the Greek people are equal to the task."

This weekend, the events of March 25 will be marked in countless schools and Greek Orthodox parishes throughout the United States and Greece. The kindred will and spirit that would not tolerate domination should, and must, be celebrated, for it has battled countless other just causes throughout the centuries that appeared unreachable and lost, and has not only emerged victorious, but rekindled and revived in its righteousness.

The Hellenic spirit and ideal must not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, nor should it be remembered only on momentous occasions like March 25 and October 28—Greek "OHI" Day. It must continuously be kept alive for future generations to learn from, just as it has taught those of the past.

The lessons of history are, indeed, invaluable ones, and no history can parallel the richness of the Greek. It is a full and exemplary history that must not only be preserved, but shared. It is one colored with strife and victory, pride and honor, love, and passion for all things Greek, and, above all, an abiding sense of patriotism that has carried the Greek people through centuries of strong, sometimes violent, social and political winds to make a mark upon civilization that is not, and cannot be, paralleled.

There is no doubt but that the Hellenic tradition has shaped and molded every one of us, whether we are Greek American or not. It has influenced almost every facet of the composition of the great Nation we live in and has thereby touched every one of us as its citizens. Hellenism is ever present, and our lives are the richer for it! Whether it be in the political values we are so proud of, the language we speak, the buildings we work in, or the literature, art, and music which soothes us, the Greek influence is real and present and it must be acknowledged and celebrated.

As Greek Americans, we are obligated to hold out our lamp of experience for our neighbors and countrymen who may be searching for the road to those values we cherish so much. There are, today, people thoughout the world who are struggling for their independence and right to a national identity. Let all of us, Mr. Speaker, lend the influence of this great body to their causes wherever they are appropriate and just!

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GONZALEZ. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I simply want to add my voice to that of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BILIRAKIS] and to say that in my district in San Antonio we have a very deep and historical association with our fellow Americans of Greek descent. And I also want to say that it has been a tremendously rich contribution to the community and it has made us, those of us not of Greek heritage, very much aware and appreciative of the richness of the Greek heritage.

Again I thank the gentleman for yielding, my colleague from Florida, and also the previous speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS].

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday evening, March 18, 1986, I was regrettably absent for the vote on rollcall 60 that agreed to the conference report on H.R. 2453, amending the Older Americans Act of 1965 by increasing authorized appropriations for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987. Had I been present, of couse I would have voted "aye."

On Wednesday, morning, March 19, 1986, I was conducting a hearing on "Catastrophic Health Insurance: The Home Care Benefit" at the time of rollcall 61, when a vote was taken approving the Journal of March 18, 1986. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAZZOLI] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent for votes on Tuesday, March 18. Had I been present, I would have voted:

"No" on roll No. 58, the Walker amendment to H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Antiterrorism Act of 1986, which sought to change the proposed compensation program from an entitlement program to one subject to the appropriations process;

INTEGRITY OF LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Missouri just addressed the House and went through a litany of abuses by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. I am not going to stand up here and defend the abuses by any law enforcement agency. I think if my colleague had indicated the dates of those abuses, they go back many, many years and, in many instances, back to the Reagan administration, to the Nixon administration and the Carter administration, in many, many instances.

The views that were alluded to have not occurred in a number of years.

I want to say that I spent some 25 years in one way or another in law enforcement, and I can honestly say that I have received more complaints directed at other law enforcement agencies than I have at the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime, it is our responsibility to oversee the operations of the Drug Enforcement Administration. It is also our responsibility to oversee the operations of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, which has major responsibility for arson, firearms, and explosives in particular.

In the full committee we oversee the operations of the FBI, and so it is with a whole host of other law enforcement agencies that we come in contact with every day.

For years, I worked with the New Jersey State Police and the various municipal police departments. I was never proud to see any abuses which occurred when police officers exceeded their authority or overzealous in the discharge of their duties. But I can honestly say that, over the years, I did not see a disproportionate number of those abuses on the part of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

The vast majority of police officers in this country are decent, honest, committed people. The people who committed abuses—unfortunately they do—are in the minority. It is just like the youngsters that in fact do not make us proud. They are in the minority. We hear about the youngsters that are into narcotic substances of all kinds, and they give young people a bad name. But they are in the minority. They do not represent the vast majority of youngsters. So it is with police departments.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take just this minute to say that I am very proud myself, and I am sure my colleagues are, of the work performed by the police throughtout this country. They are our first line of defense. They are underpaid. Unfortunately, they have to work on their days off. They are called back from vacations. They are not always appreciated. They have to become philosophers. They have to be ministers. They have to be able to listen to the stories. They have to be able to solve problems on the spot.

So I think we are fortunate to have the caliber of police officers we do. I am just sorry that I have to take this time to defend an agency that has had a surpurb record in law enforcement.

Look at the record of convictions of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms; one of the finest of any law enforcement agency. Look at the number of reversals on appeal and you will find that it is very little in reversals. That tells the story about the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. It is a professional organization, and I am proud of the work they do.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES. I would be happy to yield to my colleague from Texas.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and also for taking this time for the purposes the gentleman has so eloquently explained. I want to join you.

I had a stint of working earlier in my life in which I ended up being named chief juvenile probation officer for my county, right after the war, where we had registered a 400-percent increase in juvenile deliquency in that county. San Antonio was a war impact area.

But I came to know law enforcement from another perspective. I was not a police officer, but I worked in close joinder with the police and I became very appreciative of the tasks that we in our social development have given the law enforcement official.

We thrust on our law enforcement officials all of the problems of social disruptive situations. We expect them to be psychoanalysts. We expect them to be doctors in an emergency. And then we do not pay them anywhere near what they should receive.

Mr. HUGHES. The gentleman is right.

The reason I take the time is because when we come back from recess, we are going to have a major bill before this Congress that puts our police officers at risk. I just hope my colleagues take the time to read the legislation, both the committee legislation, the firearms legislation, that came out of the Judiciary Committee 35 to 0, out of my Subcommittee on Crime 10 to 0; and take a look also at the so-called Volkmer substitute. I think you will find that the committee has endeavored to balance the interests of society and the interests of hunters and sportsmen and is worthy of the Members' support.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY] be allowed to take his special order at this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

MINIMUM WAGE REQUIREMENTS OF THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY], is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY] for yielding her time and helping Mr. RUDD and myself proceed in a manner that will facilitiate his getting back to his committee work.

Mr. Speaker, I take this special order to discuss the issue of the minimum wage. Mr. RUDD and myself have spent a good deal of time studying this issue, and we are submitting legislation concerning the issue.

Mr. RUDD, my distinguished colleague from Arizona, who has been very helpful to advise a relative newcomer to the House in the ways of drafting and supporting legislation, has agreed to give time from his busy committee work schedule to come down and open this discussion.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I will yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD].

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that rarely has anyone made such an impact on this Congress as a first-term Member as my distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. ARMEY]. The gentleman is a great credit to that almost sovereign State and to his district and to the people of this country.

Today my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY] is introducing legislation to repeal both the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I say that I am pleased to sign as an original cosponsor of this measure.

This year marks the 48th anniversary of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, which established a nationwide restriction on the amount of wages an American worker is allowed to accept for his work, and a similar restriction on the number of hours he is allowed to work.

The good intentions of the Fair Labor Standards Act has been with us for nearly half a century, and that is ample time for the present Congress to consider its results.

Very regretfully, the well-being of the American poor, for whom the act was enacted, has not improved as a result of this legislation. Instead of providing employment opportunities, the minimum wage has discouraged employers from hiring additional help where help could have been hired. Our Nation's entitlement rolls continue to grow while we prevent employers from hiring those who receive those funds.

For this reason, I encourage my colleagues to reconsider the impact of the mimimum wage and overtime requirements of the act on those it is supposed to help.

Mr. Speaker, this year is the 48th anniversary of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 which established a nationwide restriction on the amount of wages an American worker is allowed to accept for his work, and a similar restriction on the hours he is allowed to work.

For nearly two generations the good intentions of the 75th Congress have been with us in the form of these restrictions, ample time for the present Congress, the 99th, to consider the results and take the necessary action to reform this law.

The need for reform is evident, judging by the most basic indicator of American life: the well-being of the American family. As the decades have passed, the United States has entered and concluded wars, and traveled to the Moon on behalf of all mankind. We have built the most prosperous and free society in history. But these achievements are plainly more and more at risk from misguided attempts to help our poor along, attempts many of which seem to have begun in the same spirit that originated the minimum wage laws. We have watched the results of these efforts gather destructive force over the years, becoming a social whirlwind crashing into the very foundation of our well-being: the American family.

Today our poorest families suffer the most, and a large part of that suffering has been caused by the minimum wage. It erodes their economic life, a subversion which has grown worse, and become endemic to our national life in many other forms.

I invite the Congress today to reconsider these laws on the basis of our long experience, and take this opportunity to resolve to pass a bill we here propose to repeal the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. The evidence is in, and must be heeded. It is to be found in the scholarship of such nationally recognized economists and social analysts as Walter Williams and Milton Friedman, where I urge all of you to go and look at the record. Dr. Williams is especially eloquent in his denunciation of the effects of minimum wage laws on our urban minority communities. He calls them a result of, "maximum demagoguery and folly."

Minimum wage laws, Dr. Williams has shown, actually encourage racism in employment practices. They do not, on balance, put more money in the pockets of poor workers.

In spite of the evidence, I recognize that this bill is not likely to pass the Congress, this session, because the facts of this case have not been publicly understood. They do not accord with our hopes or our common assumptions. I bring this to the attention of you, my colleagues, for the less well-off who have suffered under this law for so long. I at least hope to speak for them in the gathering public policy debate which is now reconsidering so many of the fixed public policy landmarks of recent American life. We have many new lessons to recognize and act on. But our action should begin and be carried out in the name of the many millions whose lives and families have been unintentionally stunted, even destroyed by the instruments of our unfulfilled hopes for them.

In 1938, the minimum wage was a daring breakthrough in social policy. As the proud new labor bureaucracy was being installed, one of its first acts was to forbid American workers to accept any job for less than 25 cents an hour. Today, their successor bureaucrats, still firmly gripping our poorer workers by the collar, allow Americans to work only if they can get at least $3.35 an hour. This amounts to a significant temporary increase above the buying power of 1938's minimum wage. Of course, this is only a temporary increase. Time and inflation will erode this so-called minimum too, until political pressure causes it to be raised again. However, the political pressure which raises the minimum wage next time will not come from the poor. It will come from elsewhere, it will come from the nonpoor who, as Walter Williams points out, receive the only practical benefit of any minimum wage. Since the minimum wage limits competition and keeps up middle-class wages and salaries.

A full-time employee working for minimum wage earns nearly $8,000, before Federal, State and local taxes are deducted from the paycheck. It is an amount well below the poverty line, which we currently draw at around $11,000 a year. It is not much money, yet we tax people far below the minimum wage of course.

They must pay taxes below the minimum wage, but we will not let them deliberately earn that much. It seems like they catch our ruthlessness both going and coming.

This, of course, is barely a subsistent living, less than we would like anyone to have to live on. But the small amount of money is what people usually focus their attention on. I suggest we look elsewhere, however, for the real meaning of the minimum wage.

Leon Dash is a reporter from the Washington Post who spent the last year or so investigating the difficult lives of some of the least fortunate citizens of Washington, D.C. He says it took him 6 months to gain the trust of people in the neighborhoods he visited. And as he did so he came to notice the less obvious but important things about them.

Entering homes he had not visited before, Dash learned that he could tell who was employed and who was not, just from the faces and expressions. And he came to notice the consequences for their home life, the way it affected their personal lives to be unemployed, or to be employed even at a low salary.

People with jobs, Dash found, had some purpose in life and could be happy, and people without were not. It was not first of all a question of who had a good job. Even a poor job made the difference.

A home with people employed was a happy one, a home with unemployed probably was not. It was a simple observation, but a striking one, I think. Leon Dash learned to respect and love the people of those difficult neighborhoods. And he came to testify that having a job was to them the difference between having self-respect and having none. He went so far as to say, that having a job was enough for basic peace and happiness in a family. Having a job kept away the worst of the bitterness and defeat to which all our lives are subject. It made him come to value more than ever his own professional position as a respected reporter on one of the Nations most important newspapers.

But we should notice that it was the difference between having a job and having none that was important. Even a very poor job might keep an adult or grown child going for the time being, and allow the family to function, to carry out the role we know it is made for. The family is the cradle of our hopes as well as our ability for self-sacrifice and self-discipline. The family doesn't need much to give human shape to our lives, to open our hearts to love one another, to care for each other. But even the family cannot easily help adults who are in despair. Desperate and unhappy adults find everything difficult.

In such circumstances, even a poor job can make the difference between a successful functioning family and one that collapses under the load.

The chief effect of the minimum wage is to destroy the poor jobs of precisely the people who find themselves in such desperate circumstances. We may not like to admit that such poorly paying jobs can be a necessity to anyone. But they can be. They are. In the faces of those he visited, Leon Dash began to be able to see instantly the bitterness and despair of people with no job, and the relative hope and peace of those with even a poor job.

We must face the fact that the poor people on the difficult periphery of our society are in need of exactly the low-paying jobs that are diminished by the minimum wage. Research indicates that for every 10 percent rise in the minimum wage, there is about 3 percent less employment among workers covered by the Fair Labor and Standards Act. That means, if seven workers get their wages raised by, say, 34 cents an hour three workers either get fired or can't find any work.

Which three? It may well be three workers who contribute to the support of a family. It may be young people on their first job. It may be new immigrants just learning English. It may be an urban minority adult who has just decided to get started and make something of himself, to help support children or put someone through school. Whoever it may be, 3 in 10 will have the pay-window slammed in their faces because of the minimum wage.

There are about 6 million such workers today, 6 million out of about 100 million working Americans. Three percent of them is 180,000 American workers, 180,000 of the poorest among us. When the minimum rises every few years, almost 200,000 workers are denied work, many of them in needy areas of our big cities.

What has been the cumulative total over the decades of marginal workers who have been discouraged into nonworking status by these laws: it must be huge, it is certainly monstrous. Imagine how it contributes to our national problems.

To some, who look only at the income, it might seem a small loss to any one individual. It seems to be a loss welfare will make up. Isn't that what welfare is for? But welfare cannot provide dignity and self-respect. It cannot sustain an intact family. The family, it turns out, is the chief victim of both welfare, and the minimum wage laws. It is also the chief road out of poverty for ordinary Americans.

A family with three adults working at the minimum wage can earn over $20,000 a year. When one family member begins to make more, the lesser jobs are still a major stabilizing asset. With a strong family to make efficient use of even very poor wages, money can be saved, small businesses started, school completed. After a time, homes can be bought, professional jobs trained for.

This cycle of opportunity used to be a hard but sure road to success in America. It still works fairly well for many, especially new immigrants who stay away from the welfare system and depend upon the self-reliant support of family and friends. Their story used to be more common in this country, when there were places to work hard at very low wages and in conditions far from ideal.

Factories used to be places where even the most needy family could get a toehold in our society. Like mountain climbers scaling a vertical face in a high cold wind, such jobs provided a hard testing ground. Families emerging from that test have gone on to give American society some of her most accomplished leaders, and multitudes of our most solid and worthwhile ordinary citizens.

I am very sure many now sitting in this 99th Congress were raised by parents and among relatives and friends who suffered and surmounted that same challenge. You, and those of us who know of the difficulties faced in that life, would like to insist that there is an alternative, some other way for families at the bottom to make their way up.

But the minimum wage is not the way, however much we might wish it were.

It only eliminates the refuge of the poorest. The minimum wage closes off their opportunity by making it too expensive.

The truth is, we have no better way to offer, and it is empty boasting to claim that all our welfare and job-fare and psychological innovations are a humane substitute for the sweatshop. We who are well off can live by such illusions. But it is unconscionable any longer to force poor people to try to do so. Let us allow them to find sustenance in the patterns of strong family attachments, attachments which are made stronger by adversity.

But in our cities today we have something worse than poverty. We have a growing underclass: people who are not only poor, but who have no hope. Whose families have been broken, or lost, or prevented.

There are large numbers of Americans now so trapped by circumstances that they have practically no opportunity at all, and we do not know what to do for them.

We do know where these suffering multitudes came from, however. This new class of permanent poor has been created by ill-conceived efforts to help the needy. We seem inadvertently to have caused something much worse than what we intended to cure. And we don't know what to do. Shouldn't we at least set them free to do the best for themselves that they can, by allowing them to work for the best wages they can get, instead of no wages at all?

Considering all the other things we allow consenting adults to do nowadays, it doesn't seem too much to ask.

But won't the jobs created be very low-paying ones? Yes they will. They will be low-paying jobs that support the integrity and self-respect of our neediest families, something which the minimum wage and welfare have simply failed to do.

Everything we have come to know about the problems of poverty tells us that families do not stay poor permanently. Families mobilize their members and work their way out of poverty, often in a few years of great effort.

That is why other solutions do not help very much. Most of our other efforts have the effect of splitting families or preventing their formation, freezing people in poverty. And of course we now know too that the face of this new poverty is increasingly the face of single or abandoned women with children. And it isn't only poor families who suffer. Small business suffers, entrepreneurship suffers, the middle class suffers because the wealth created by new businesses is less likely to be a support to their families.

I call today for an act of realistic compassion: repeal the minimum wage.

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments. I appreciate the gentleman taking time out of his busy schedule to come down and help me kick off this discussion.

□ 1610

Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that we reflect back on the title given the legislation that established the minimum wage in America. If you go back and look at that, you see the title is "The Fair Labor Standards Act." And I have no doubt in my mind that those people who were in this body at that time and in the other body and perhaps, certainly, in the White House, those people who worked so hard to develop and pass that legislation and make it become the law of the land did indeed have fairness in their minds and in their hearts at that time.

I really believe that we need to understand that. This is not really an ill-intention or ill-feeling body. I think we saw that earlier today. Certainly we saw Members of the body on different sides of a very important issue argue their arguments with an enormous amount of passion at times, but always with an understanding and a respect of the fact that all persons who bring legislation to the floor of this House or speak on behalf or perhaps even in opposition to legislation do so with a sincere regard for concepts such as fairness and human rights. Certainly no one could dispute the fact that the minimum wage was born out of an effort to establish fair labor standards and to bring fairness to the world of work.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I, as a professional economist, am accustomed to understanding that past actions must be evaluated in terms of their result and their impact and that actions taken in the present for purposes of the future must always be evaluated with your best understanding of potential impact.

In that regard, I would like to spend a moment examining the impact of the legislation that was passed. Did it fulfill the objections of fairness that those folks most certainly hoped to achieve?

And then, if indeed we see reason to believe that perhaps that fairness has not been the case and the result, is it possible for us to take an alternative course of action that may help us to restore fairness?

One always has to be very careful to appreciate that the best of intentions can result in behavior that can lead to the worst of results.

I have had an opportunity over the years to watch the impact of the minimum wage on individuals with whom I have worked and I want to relate one story, in particular, perhaps a little lengthy story, but it is a real story born out of my experience.

Before coming to this body I was a professor in a major university in Texas and, in a manner consistent with my duties as department chairman, I found myself, for a 5-year period of time, teaching a night class, and in that night class experienced being on campus outside of normal university hours for from 3 to 4 hours every evening.

During that time I developed a friendship as I came and went from my evening duties and during that break that my students always insisted on having in the middle of a 3- or 4-hour lecture, I became friends with the fellow who was the night janitor. Let me call him Charlie.

Charlie and I became fast friends. Charlie was a rather interesting fellow in the sense that he was extremely friendly. I suppose a psychologist or someone trained in these things might have some kind of a label, but suffice it to say that Charlie did have an intellectual handicap, and I suppose he was not a particularly intelligent person in a conventional sense of the word, but at the same time he was a person of tremendous pride, dignity, and sensitivity, and he saw the building during the hours that he had it as his building and he cared for that building with an enormous amount of concern and care and took a great deal of pride in his work. He kept the building meticulous.

He was also a person who was friendly to those of us who were coming in, friendly to us when we were there, and very much concerned about the safety and security of people who came and went from his building. It was not uncommon for Charles at the time the classes let out or at other times, particularly when the young women were coming and going, to be there by the door, just standing a sort of silent vigil as they walked across that lonely, always too dark, parking lot, just to see that they got to their cars and on their way safely. It was not something that was in his job description but something that he felt very sincerely concerned that people going from his building should be safe.

I became fast friends with Charlie. He had many of the same problems that I did. We were both trying to support our families. We were both very proud of our children. Charlie and his wife had a new baby one winter, and he was extremely proud of his youngster, just like I guess all of us fathers and mothers are. I remember seeing him and his wife at the grocery store, very proudly showing me his youngster, and I became quite accustomed to visiting with him.

One evening I came to work, and I had two observations that upset me. One, the building was a mess. This was very unusual. And, two, Charlie was not there. This condition persisted. I could understand, perhaps, that he might have been ill and had a night off, but it persisted. And as it persisted, I talked to a friend of mine in administration who was responsible for hiring the maintenance personnel. I asked him what happened to Charlie, and he explained to me that the university had to let Charlie go, the reason being that there had been an increase in the minimum wage and, given the budget of the university, they could not afford to continue Charlie on the payroll.

Now, here was a law and an effort made, I am sure, in this body that was certainly designed to help people like my friend Charlie, but it resulted in effectively legislating away his right to work. Charlie went on unemployment and subsequently on welfare.

Now, as if to add insult to injury, because I was injured in having lost my good friend and seeing him suffer a deprivation of employment and the pride that he took with it, a few weeks later I found a young man sitting on the third floor hallway, listening to a loud radio, in a janitor's uniform and doing nothing in the middle of a filthy hallway, showing no concern for his work. This condition persisted.

Now, after a while I called my friend in the administration, and I said, "Who is this young man, and what does he do up there?" He explained to me that the young man was a CETA trainee. Now, a CETA trainee is provided to the university by another Government program designed to help somebody. And the university actually had the young man's salary and everything paid for as they took him on as a trainee. I said, "Well, if he is a CETA trainee, why do we not train him?"

And he said, "We are so understaffed that we cannot find someone to send over to train the fellow."

Reflecting on that, I saw two pieces of legislation, both of which were designed to help somebody and to do good, one legislated away Charlie's right to earn his income and the other provided income to somebody who did not earn it.

In neither case did I see any contribution to fairness or human dignity.

Another case in point: One of the things you have to understand is something we call the law of downward sloping demand. If the price of some commodity goes up, the quantity consumed goes down. Indeed, if the price of labor goes up, the quantity of labor consumed will go down and machines will be substituted in its place.

Now, a few years ago we had a song that my teenagers enjoyed. It was called, "Working at the Car Wash Blues." There can be no doubt that the car wash must be a blue place to make a living. I myself started on my trek up the occupational ladder shoveling coal in North Dakota at temperatures as low as 30 degrees below zero for 50 cents an hour. I learned two things doing that at the age of 14, one, that if I went to work, took a job, I had to be there, I had to do the job and, two, and probably most importantly, I did not want to spend the rest of my life doing that. So I immediately then, having placed my foot on the first rung of the ladder, did everything I could to scramble up that ladder so that I could find a job with better working conditions and better salary.

That is pretty much the kind of job that I suppose working in a car wash is. But working in a car wash as a young person is a place to begin to learn these two fundamental lessons. I saw that same time period when they raised the minimum wage and Charlie lost his job. I saw my favorite car wash where the youngsters worked change. The youngsters were not working there any more. I could still get my car washed there, but that 40 or so young people who were working there and on that first rung of the occupational ladder were not there any more. Where they were I do not know. Perhaps in a CETA training program. But what was there was an automated car wash, exactly what anybody would predict: As we raised the wage arbitrarily, the quantity demanded of the labor went away, went down. And there was substituted machines for men. And that will always be the case.

Now, what does all that mean as we translate the impact of this into our dilemmas, our social problems?

The first thing you have to understand is that as you look at the statistics—and let us understand, through no fault of their own, the young are inexperienced, and sometimes in a very wonderful way irresponsible, certainly irrepressible. They are easily distracted. Quite frankly, they are learning what Thorstein Bunde Veblen called the spirit of workmanship. In order to do that, you must recognize that, more often than not, the employer is taking a risk that they will be somewhat frivolous, certainly inexperienced, less productive on the job, and that of course if that experience is productive for them at all, they will most likely move along.

So he is not willing to pay them as much to do a job, not because they are not good people—certainly they are. But they are in that place in their life. I certainly have my own youngsters in that place. And getting them to clean the room, as most parents will testify, is not the easiest job in the world.

So what do we find happening? As the minimum wage goes up, according to Walter Williams, an economist of considerable stature who has researched this and put it within the most refined analysis with the best statistical analysis, as the minimum wage increases, it becomes documented the single most important cause for the most grievous intractable unemployment problem in America today, that is, black youth unemployment. There is no getting around it. That is the reason.

Now, obviously, we are all concerned about this. We are concerned about employment, and as you are concerned about employment and you break unemployment statistics down and you find them a definable category, the youth of America, and then within that, the black youth of America.

For example, in 1948, black youth unemployment was 9.5 percent. White youth unemployment in 1948 was 10.2 percent. In 1980, black youth unemployment was 37.7 percent, and over 50 percent in many innercities.

White youth unemployment in 1980 was 18 percent, and is now closer to 12 percent. The single greatest cause for this dramatic increase of this unemployment that seems to stay with us year after year after year, that unemployment that so often becomes a basing point for people diverting their time and their energy into other pursuits, is the minimum wage.

One thing about young people is that they will not sit idle. Indeed, if they cannot find a job to occupy themselves they will find a way to occupy themselves and we need to understand that is the most natural thing in the world. Consequently, high unemployment results in high crime.

It is the minimum wage and increases in that minimum wage causing the decrease in labor consumed and the substitution of capital that has given us this chronic unemployment problem. There can be no disputing it. Walter Williams' work has not been disputed.

What we are suggesting is that we have seen a failure of that policy that was passed so many years ago with such great good intentions. We have seen it hurt my friend Charlie and his family and his children. We have seen it hurt our own youngsters. I am saying the time has come for us to look at the results and recognize that we have not gotten what we intended. Can we, with any degree of understanding of the lessons from that unfortunate experience, turn in another direction?

Some of you will argue, and I suppose it can be argued, that perhaps the total abolition of the minimum wage may be a drastic and severe move. I can only say that I offer such legislation only out of a conviction that the very existence of that wage is in itself discriminatory and is the blatant act of the Government legislating away a person's right to work. In so doing, denying the low-income, low-experience, youthful worker that opportunity to make the most crucial step on the occupational ladder which is that first step which we all took. We all start at the bottom and we learn as we grow, and we should not deny that opportunity to our own young people.

Perhaps that may be too drastic a step; it may be too great an experiment to try. If so, then why not try another experiment, something in the middle; something that more or less compromises these two approaches. That would be the Youth Unemployment Wage.

It is not popular with the young people. A few years ago, before I joined this body, when it was first proposed, I was asked by my local newspaper to assess the Youth Opportunity Wage, and I predicted that it would give more work opportunities to more youth in the summer, and I found an interesting response by one of the youngsters.

One of the youngsters said, "I will not work at that wage." I think it was $2.50 or $2.25 an hour. "I will not work at that wage."

Now, what that says to me is there is a youngster out there whose personal circumstances, perhaps of family income, perhaps of privilege, is such that this youngster, who happened to be a young girl, can afford to say, I do not want to work at that wage. I'd rather go swimming, I'd rather party, I'd rather do all the things we all like to do in the summer.

That does not mean that the job that would be available at that wage would go unfilled. It would be filled by somebody who says,

I will work at that wage; I need to make the money. I want to get started making my own way. I will take this opportunity, and perhaps even, because it is made available to me, having been unaccepted by that other person who might have been in line ahead of me.

Somebody will fill that job. One of the wonderful things about the market we must always understand: The market does not throw people away. The market provides an opportunity for you to work at some wage.

I might say, by the way, when we held some hearings on this earlier this year, I was very much dismayed by an advocate of the minimum wage. A person who opposed the Youth Opportunity Wage who sat in our committee hearing, looked at me and said, "You have to understand, some people just aren't worth anything."

Now that really upset me, and frankly, I was so stunned, I did not even pick up on it. But certainly they are worth something. Maybe their skills are so nominal, their experience so limited, perhaps their attention span so short and their penchant for what we adults might call frivolous behavior so great that they are only worth a dollar an hour. Maybe $1.10 an hour. I was only worth 40 cents an hour.

But whatever it is, whatever my worth is, the market will find a place for me. Maybe it will be doing work that some of us think is not dignified. Shoveling coal in the snow or perhaps cleaning homes. I think it was Margaret Thatcher who said that one of the ways she remembers who she is and where she came from is by the requirement that she clean her own bathroom facilities.

There is not such a thing, in my estimation, Mr. Speaker, as work that is beneath our dignity. Work must be done. People should have the opportunity to do it and receive a wage commensurate with their productivity.

These are the things we are advocating and what we would like to see us try again. Let us turn our attention to opening opportunities, giving beginnings rather than denying even the opportunity to begin.

I yield to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CRANE].

Mr. CRANE. I have profound respect for my distinguished colleague with his professional expertise and training in economics, and I have seen some figures in the past and I questioned them because I was not sure of the reliability of the sources, but knowing the amount of time that you have devoted to this study, is there a perceptible correlation between rises in the minimum wage law and escalating unemployment for blacks and other minorities?

Going back before the minimum wage law, the unemployment figures for black teenagers and white teenagers was roughly the same. Since that time, we now have horrendous unemployment figures—almost 50 percent for black teenagers—notwithstanding unprecedented numbers of Americans who do have jobs.

Is there a correlation that can be drawn there?

Mr. ARMEY. Yes, there is. In fact, Walter Williams draws it with the finest of methodologies.

It is also recognized by racists in the world. I want to take a moment for this because we are talking about what is fair. Certainly, racism is not fair.

If we look at Kurt Begee, who is the secretary of an avowedly racist building workers' union in South Africa, this is why he embraces the concept of the minimum wage. He has recognized what you are talking about. He said:

> There is no job reservation left in the building industry and in the circumstances I support the rate for the job as the second-best way of protecting our artisans.

A year later, he stated that he would be prepared to allow black artisans into the industry provided that the minimum wages were raised from Rand 1.40 to at least Rand 2.00 per hour, and if the rate for the job was strictly enforced.

Indeed, not only has the famous Walter Williams, our own American, black economist who studied this—and again, I was, myself, so overwhelmed by Walter's work and the fine work he did with Step-wise regression and many of the most sophisticated methodologies, that he demonstrated this.

A quick look.

In 1948, it was 9.4 for black youth; 10.2 for white youth. But that has stretched in 1980 to a gap of 37.7 for black youth, over 50 in some communities, to 18 percent. Statistics show the gap has widened over that period of time.

□ 1635

Walter Williams has seen the correlations that explain why it is widening. Perhaps only by intuition, the secretary of an avowedly racist union in South Africa says that if it has worked there, whether intended or not, we can make it work here with that intention.

That, of course, is certainly an insignificant observation if we go back to the beginnings of the legislation, which was to incorporate within a fair labor standard. There is nothing fair about it.

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, does the minimum wage, inasmuch as it is an arbitrary figure picked for the least skilled people in society, have any ratcheting effect on wages up the line?

Mr. ARMEY. Well, yes, and of course, one of the things I have always wondered about is, why does the contemporary American union movement embrace the concept of a minimum wage, when indeed almost without exception, a person with a union card and a job will be far above that; but as you elevate that, you go back perhaps to the notion of a rising tide raises all boats. As the prime goes up, all rates go up, and as any component in the wage structure increases, it will have a tendency to affect increases throughout all.

The only problem is that as we have seen in effect that the upper end of the wage spectrum, we have seen even our unions who have pushed for and been successful in achieving higher wages at the upper rates, really triggered this response of reducing the consumption of labor and substituting instead the use of capital and the upshot of that is higher wages for fewer workers.

THE TORT LIABILITY REFORM ACT OF 1986

(Mr. DAUB asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing the Tort Liability Reform Act of 1986, H.R. 4460, a bill designed to tackle the insurance crisis problem for the wide variety of individuals, businesses, and other institutions who are unable to obtain affordable liability insurance coverage. While there are many reasons for the current insurance problem, the rapid expansion of the concept of tort liability in our American civil justice system is clearly the central issue.

Day care centers, transportation companies, manufacturers, municipal governments, public and private schools, professionals, farmers, environmental cleanup technicians, boards of directors, and a wide variety of business interests are unable to obtain liability coverage. No one bill designed to assist one particular interest, however, can meet the immediate needs of the wide variety of constituents involved.

My bill would attempt to bring about minimum procedural and substantive reforms in the tort litigation area which are designed to expedite tort cases and to provide more consistent awards and recoveries. Specifically, the bill would provide for the following:

First, a preliminary evaluation session would be required within 30 to 60 days of the filing of the action. The session would be administered by a judiciary authority and would be for the purpose of sorting out frivolous suits and defendants who do not belong in the suit. At the same time, recommendations will be made to expedite the discovery process.

Second, where parties have not completed the discovery process within 1 year, the court would be required to take certain actions to expedite the process. In jurisdictions with court-supervised arbitration systems, such systems would be used. In jurisdictions without court-supervised arbitration systems, a judicial authority would be appointed to develop and administer a plan to bring the parties to trial on a timely basis.

Third, courts would be given discretionary authority to provide that awards for future damages may be satisfied by periodic payment through a trust fund or annuity to benefit the injured party.

Fourth, awards would not be permitted to include any interest amount which relates to time periods prior to the filing of the action.

Fifth, any award to compensate for injuries would take into account other sources of compensation to the injured party.

Sixth, pain and suffering damages will be limited to the greater of $100,000 or the amount of economic damages.

Seventh, punitive damages would not be awarded unless the plaintiff establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant manifested a conscious disregard for the consequences of the defendant's acts. Any award of punitive damages will be transmitted to the federal or state treasury rather than to the plaintiff.

Eighth, monetary sanctions will be provided against attorneys who do not act in good faith when filing cases, motions, responses, and so forth. These sanctions will also apply to attorneys initiating suits merely for the purposes of obtaining a settlement when there was not a reasonable prospect of a court award.

These eight provisions would be a significant step in the right direction to curb the insurance crisis. The bill reflects much of the mainstream of tort reform in the 50 States and in many respects is consistent with the recommendations of the tort policy working group established last year by the Attorney General.

None of us need to look too far in our own district to find individuals and organizations which are caught up in the insurance crisis. Let me offer the following examples of the scope of the problem:

Day care centers are closing because their insurance premiums were increased by up to 500 percent or because they simply can no longer obtain liability insurance.

Trucking companies are experiencing increased premiums of 200 to 500 percent. The National Journal reported that a Pennsylvania trucking company was recently driven to bankruptcy by liability premiums that increased from $165,000 to $1.6 million.

An equipment manufacturer in my home State has seen its product liability expense increase by approximately 650 percent over the past 5 years. Product liability costs now represent an amount equal to 59 percent of the total direct labor costs to produce the product.

A municipal government in my State is unable to obtain affordable errors and omissions coverage. Even though nobody can ever remember a claim against the city, premiums in 1986 for $500,000 of coverage would be approximately 7½ times as much, $1 million of coverge the year before.

Schools and local governments are having to discontinue recreational programs because liability insurance is not available.

Attorneys, accountants, engineers, physicians, and other professionals are finding dramatic increases in malpractice insurance. Engineers experienced in handling Superfund cleanup projects can no longer accept contracts or contribute to the effort as there is no available liability insurance in this area.

This bill may not be the perfect bill and may not be all things to all people. It is, however, a beginning in taking a look at a comprehensive tort reform effort. It also recognizes that we need more uniform State standards without federalizing all tort laws. The States must be involved partners in this process and legitimate rights of the States must be recognized in this process. Thus, this legislation attempts to reach some minimal uniform provisions while leaving the States the ability to enact their own tort reform statutes.

I hope that each of my colleagues will take a serious look at this new approach to solving a pressing problem, and I invite cosponsorship of this legislation, H.R. 4460.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair announces that the House will consider two unanimous consent requests for commemorative resolutions, after which we will return to special orders.

AFGHANISTAN DAY

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 272) to authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation designating March 21, 1986, as "Afghanistan Day," a day to commemorate the struggle of the people of Afghanistan against the occupation of their country by Soviet forces, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO], the chief sponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 272.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Senate Joint Resolution 272 designating tomorrow March 21, 1986, as "Afghanistan Day." The people of Afghanistan observe March 21 as the start of their new year and it serves as a symbol of the nation's rebirth. It is, therefore, appropriate that we designate tomorrow to commemorate the struggle of the Afghan people against the brutal occupation of their country by Soviet forces.

In January, while on a fact-finding mission to Pakistan, I again met with Afghan refugees and freedom fighters, the Mujahideen. Their courage and determination to remove illegal Soviet occupation forces continues to impress and amaze me. For more than 6 years the Mujahideen have struggled against great odds to liberate their homeland from the puppet regime installed and maintained by the Soviet Red army.

It is imperative that we do not forget these brave people inside and outside of Afghanistan who continue to endure great hardships in their struggle. We rarely hear news about the Afghan crisis anymore except, perhaps, on the anniversary marking the day the Soviets rolled their tanks in. When considering arms control and the so-called peaceful intentions of the Soviets, we should not forget Soviet actions in Afghanistan or the pain and suffering they have inflicted on the Afghan people.

I urge my colleagues to join me in calling attention to the Afghan peoples' national struggle and designate March 21 as "Afghanistan Day."

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE].

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues in commemorating Afghanistan Day.

It is 6 years since the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan and cast an enduring chill over East-West relations. There are now more than 115,000 Soviet troops engaged in the systematic destruction of Afghanistan. The Soviets dominate Afghanistan's security forces and the bureaucracy. They have constructed extensive military and logistical facilities to support their forces and have tied Afghanistan closer than ever to the Soviet economic system. They are engaged in a scorched Earth policy which includes destruction of crops, water and food supplies. They have destroyed villages and have brutally killed and maimed Afghan civilians. Massive human rights abuses by Soviet troops against the Afghan population have been documented by Helsinki Watch.

The Soviet occupation and the internal turmoil in Afghanistan have caused the flight of one-fourth or more of its pre-1979 population, creating the largest refugee population in the world. Close to 3 million Afghan refugees are reported to be in Pakistan, and some 1½ million in Iran.

Soviet troops and their Afghan proxies have used chemical weapons against innocent Afghans. Soviet strategy seems to be to maintain control of Afghanistan with a minimum commitment while, ominously, seeking a new generation of Afghan Communist leaders loyal to Moscow.

Both the United States and the United Nations have repeatedly called for a peaceful, negotiated settlement of the conflict in Afghanistan, including the immediate withdrawal of all foreign troops from that country.

Mr. Speaker, those of us fortunate enough to live in a land of freedom have a special responsibility to do all we can to end the massive human rights abuses, the suffering and the destruction caused by the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. I am glad to join with my colleagues in speaking out on behalf of the Afghan rebels, who are true "freedom fighters"—and of all those who strive to liberate Afghanistan from its oppressors.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 272

Whereas Afghanistan, more than six years after the Soviet invasion, remains a nation occupied and terrorized by over one hundred eighteen thousand Soviet troops;

Whereas the continued Soviet occupation of Afghanistan is causing enormous suffering among the people of Afghanistan, as well as the deprivation of their basic right of national sovereignty;

Whereas between one-quarter and one-third of Afghanistan's prewar population has been driven into exile, killed, wounded, or internally displaced;

Whereas the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan undermines the spirit and intention of the Declaration of Principles of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, which the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics signed at Helsinki in 1975;

Whereas the puppet regime of Babrak Karmal, installed and maintained by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, has denied the people of Afghanistan their rights to self-determination, in violation of the United Nations Charter;

Whereas the United Nations General Assembly has passed seven resolutions calling for "the immediate withdrawal of the foreign troops from Afghanistan";

Whereas on December 13, 1985, the United Nations General Assembly passed an unprecedented resolution on human rights in Afghanistan endorsing the United Nations Special Rapporteur's report demonstrating "gross, massive, and increasing human rights violations in Afghanistan";

Whereas the undaunted resistance of the Afghan freedom fighters against the Soviet occupational forces is an inspiration to the free world; and

Whereas the people of Afghanistan observe March 21 as the start of each new year and as a symbol of the nation's rebirth; therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating March 21, 1986, as "Afghanistan Day", and calling upon the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL FISHING WEEK

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 262) to authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation designating June 2 through June 8, 1986, as "National Fishing Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. HANSEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do not object, but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 262

Whereas the United States Bureau of the Census reported that fifty-four million residents of our country participated in sport fishing in 1980;

Whereas sport fishing is a family oriented, outdoor recreational activity that provides therapeutic rewards and enjoyment;

Whereas sport and commercial fishing provide an excellent source of healthful protein-rich food;

Whereas the demands for goods and services by sport fishing participants is estimated to generate $25,000,000,000 in economic activity and employment for an estimated six hundred thousand individuals in 1985;

Whereas the commercial fishing industry annually employs an estimated three hundred thousand individuals and lands over six billion pounds of seafood worth over $2,400,000,000 in direct sales;

Whereas fishing promotes respect for our Nation's marine, estuarine, and fresh waters, and their associated plant and animal communities; and

Whereas our country's league of fishing enthusiasts represent a constituency that seeks to prevent the degradation of our Nation's diverse aquatic habitats: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is requested and authorized to issue a proclamation designating June 2 through June 8, 1986, as "National Fishing Week" and calling upon Federal, State, and local government agencies, and the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs and activities.

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I just want to make one comment in conclusion.

I was very pleased that my friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] and myself ended up on the same side today, as we must take the same plane to California and I may very well be sitting with him. Now we will have something very pleasant to talk about.

I appreciate the gentleman's support and the support of my friend, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN].

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read as third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FREEDOM IS NOT JUST AN IDEA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, a nation is made out of a number of forces, which joined together, create, strengthen and protect the people within its borders. A great nation is part good fortune; part geographic advantages; part the character of its people and part the great ideas which animate that society.

It is also humble things. It is the right of people to work and make their own way in the world. It is the right to have a government which represents the people and keeps their interests as a trust. It is the right to be told the truth and to be dealt with fairly by that government. Thanks to the blessings of God and the grit and character of our people, we have become such a great Nation.

But having reached that status, we must work hard to maintain it. This form of government is now the inheritance of those who are fortunate enough to live under it. Even more, it is the shining example and the goal of other peoples, elsewhere in the world, who see in us what can be for them and for their children.

There are disturbing signs now appearing that there are those in government who have begun to doubt the great destiny of our Nation. Some have felt that the great experiment in representative government was fine for 1776 but is out of date in 1986. These cracks in our national foundation do not show themselves first in great things.

Freedom of speech and freedom of religion—the bulwark of our Bill of Rights do not disappear. Great visible changes do not occur overnight. The slide into the dustbin of failed governments begins first with self-doubt, first among our leaders; then communicated to the people. Trusted ideas are questioned, then attacked, and finally abandoned.

Such, it appears, is the fate of one of the great columns of strength upon which our national power has rested for so long. Our ability as a great nation, producing goods and products desired throughout the world, is now under attack.

That attack, I am sorry to say, is not only from outside. It comes also from within the ranks of those who guide our national policies.

Many of you are old enough to remember the history of World War II. Slogans from that great war still ring in our ears. "American is the arsenal of Democracy." Our strength was in Detroit and Pittsburgh as much as in our Armed Forces.

Even earlier, the same fear which plagued the Axis Powers had frightened the Central Alliance. Our industrial strength won us both of the Catastrophic wars in this century.

But they will not win the next one, if, God forbid, we are forced to fight it. We are losing our great production strength. It is seeping away—not because our people are unwilling to work; not because our entrepreneurs are less ingenious—but because our leaders have embarked on a new vision of our place in the world. We are no longer to produce but to consume. We are to leave to others the task of providing the means of defending ourselves.

One of the keys to this new approach is a little known and less understood industry—the machine tool industry. Its low public perception is not surprising. You can't buy its product in a supermarket or a shopping mall. But it is so critical that you can't buy almost anything for sale in those shopping centers which hasn't been produced or packaged or shipped because of the production of machine tools.

Machine tools make the equipment used by heavy and light industry to make railroads and rails; cannon and aluminum siding; airplanes and aerosol cans. It is literally the central jewel of our productive capacity. And it is disappearing from our shores.

We pay tribute to this industry in our everyday speech without realizing what we are saying. We refer to a new enterprise as "tooling up." The phrase honors the machine tool industry.

You might believe that so critical an industry would not merely be allowed to flourish in the great tradition of its contribution to the national well being, but would be protected and hedged around with safeguards to its health. But you would be wrong.

Those who administer our trade policies, such as they are, pursue a policy, not of protection, not of equity, not even of benign neglect, but of almost ferocious hostility to this critical industry. And it has had its effect.

Let me give just the most obvious effects of our new policy of government aggressively seeking to send our industrial might offshore.

In 1980, total U.S. shipments of machine tools stood at $5.8564 billion. By 1984, in just 4 short years, those shipments had fallen to only $2.2288 billion less than half. The fall from the beginning of this decade was more than 60 percent. And last year's figures, though not yet complete, do not give any cause for confidence that the trend has been stopped.

Look at the situation from another perspective. In 1980, this industry employed 110,000 mostly high-skill craftsmen. Last year, there were only 75,000 jobs in that industry; 45,000 people, mostly in what the military would call critical specialities, are now out hustling hamburgers or washing your car. But they are not maintaining and upgrading the skills we may need in a national emergency.

There is a kind of "strategic schizophrenia" plaquing our leaders. We stockpile Middle East oil against the day we need it in a national emergency, civilian or military. They do this while there is enough oil underground to last a generation on this continent.

But they do not turn a finger to maintain our machine tool expertise and skill which we could need at a moment's notice and which they are working to export overseas where we might not be able to reach it in an emergency.

The machine tool industry has not been given a death sentence willingly. It has attempted to fight back. But it is facing two opponents which make its fight almost futile. One of those enemies is foreign governments which subsidize their machine tool industries and give them preferred tax treatment. You do not have to be a trade expert to know that this allows foreign competitors to underprice our own domestic industry. To add a bitter pill to the scenario, many of those subsidies and that preferential tax treatment is made possible by our own Government's financial support of the same countries. Essentially, the craftsman is thrown out of work by his own tax money.

The second enemy is less to be expected and even less understandable. It is our own Government. Our trade laws provide for consideration for critical industries from damaging import competition. It is in the form of a petition called a 232 petition. It is filed with the Secretary of Commerce. It was favorably considered by his office and then went to the Executive for action. It has been sitting in the White House for 25 months while this crucial segment of our strength withers away.

But I mentioned hostility. During that 2-year period, in fact in only 1 year, the Department of Defense purchased nearly 27 million dollars' worth of machine tools from overseas suppliers. That may not sound like a large amount of money, but it would have put a large segment of those 45,000 employees back to work and kept a few machine tool manufacturers above water.

These foreign purchases alone are less important than the idea which motivates them. Gen. Bernard Rogers, the commander of our NATO forces, made a public statement in an interview by the Wall Street Journal praising the Independent European Program group saying it had done more than any other organization in moving down the road toward what we must have—which is a Western European defense industrial base which can compete with the United States.

□ 1650

And I want to repeat that that is an American general stating that we must have a Western European defense industrial base which can compete with the United States.

I make no claim to military expertise, but I have a memory. During World War II, I can remember the terrible costs we paid in the secret war in the North Atlantic. We lost hundreds of ships and millions of tons of shipping in moving supplies to Europe, to say nothing of the loss of thousands of lives. Does the general now propose to try to supply our defense industries from Europe against a far more formidable opponent than we faced in the 1940's?

Some time in the very near future, I hope, the 232 petition will be presented to the President finally by the National Security Council. Whatever the reason for the delay, it is wrong to have held this petition for 25 months. And if he is not already aware, it is high time that the President be made aware of this grave situation.

Neither the President, nor the country have been well served by this delay. It is most important that the NMTBA gets a recognition of its effort to work through the intent of the 1962 Trade Expansion Act, but it is also important that this type of stonewalling be stopped, not only at the National Security Council, but anywhere else in government it is occurring.

Mr. Speaker, we are captives of history. We will learn it and remember it, or we will be condemned to repeat it.

In the middle of the 1830's there was a tremendous argument waged in a major European country over trade. It was very similar in tone and context to what we are hearing in this country today. The protectionists of the 1830's wanted some import barriers erected to protect the beginnings of an industrial base. The "free traders" of that day wanted to protect the agriculture interests of the country. They did not want their agricultural export markets threatened by retaliatory trade barriers if their own industry markets had protection barriers raised.

The "free traders" won. Agriculture export markets were saved, in effect, "protected" at the expense of industry.

The world has lived to rue that decision made over 150 years ago. The country was Russia. Social historians believe that had Russia chosen industrialism and the building of a middle class of manufacturers which is the natural outgrowth of industrialization, communism would have never been able to gain a foothold.

I believe we are approaching such a crossroads in this country, right now!

Every evidence I see is that our choices are coming down on the side of deindustrialization. In trade arguments, we vote on the side of "protecting" disappearing agricultural markets abroad all the while trading off our industries.

It is a futile effort for the agriculture interests. It is a sad choice for our working people. The idea of becoming servants in a service economy, servants to the rest of the world, the producers, is frighteningly similar to the decision made in Russia so long ago. And I worry that the consequences may be as far reaching—as long lived.

We, who demand that our domestic industries be given an opportunity for fair trade and reciprocity of barriers and/or supports are truly the real free trade advocates.

Those who have stacked the deck against the growth of our own domestic and defense industries are the real protectionists—but, sad to say they are protecting the industries and the jobs of nations in Europe and the Orient. In the process, they are compromising the standard of living of our own people. They are also destroying our capability of defending ourselves without going thousands of miles away for strategic parts.

The consequences are being felt right now, but at some point, all too soon, I fear, the consequences may be so grave as to threaten our position as the leader of the Western World.

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will consider the gravity of the course we are taking. There is still time for us to change it.

□ 1700

MY ADVICE TO THE PRIVILEGED ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, last week in anticipation of the House's consideration of the President's request for $100 million, most of which would have been for direct military aid to the group that is variously referred as the rebel or the Contra groups that are presently mostly concentrated across the Nicaraguan border in the sovereign country of Honduras, and we also have progressed very far in what I consider to be a very shameful episode of American foreign policy in compelling the militarization or partial militarization for the first time in many decades of the very beautiful country of Costa Rica.

I stated last week in the remarks I made in anticipation of this vote today and made mention and reference to several things that until this last Monday had not been reported in the American press or in any medium of general mass communication to the American people. I think we also should understand that the issue is not simply the question of approving $100 million in amount in aid, but other policy sanctions on the part of the Congress. For example, part of the request of the President which was incorporated in the legislation before us today, and upon which we voted earlier this afternoon, was the President's request for congressional approval of the use of American military advisers to aid and to coexist, cheek by jowl, with the so-called Contras or rebels.

As I said last week, the President in reality was not really coming to the Congress in order to get $100 million, that he would accept much less, and then in subsequent statements made by the President since last week and earlier this week and over the weekend were to the effect that, yes; he would consider some alternative in lesser amount, or perhaps a hard bargain that at most would yield only in terms of delaying the implementation of the use of $100 million.

The reason I said what I did is that the President's conduct is going to be pursued regardless of what the Congress clearly indicates is its expressed will. The President clearly has revealed this, since the Congress has at no time since its approval of the 1974 War Power Limitation Act seen fit to oversee the act. It has not found it within its desires and will to ask the President for an accounting of his actions. He has been conducting war in Central America. He has been involved, in my opinion, in my opinion so strongly held that it has led to my introducing into the House in two Congresses a sum total of three resolutions alleging War Power Limitation Act violations on the part of President Ronald Reagan. Now until the Congress does that, I maintain that today's exercise really is meaningless as far as the President's determined irreversible, inflexible, dogmatic course of action which he has opted to follow, which is one of war, which is one of unilateral military intervention, for not once has the President ever indicated in his assumption of the Presidency in 1981 that he would even consider initiating a diplomatic approach. Instead, the President has undermined, has completely suborned the diplomatic initiatives of other countries, one group known as the First Contadora Group which consisted of essentially the same group of nations that were formed in 1957, President Dwight Eisenhower being in the Presidency, and for the same purpose. The purpose was to bring about a reconciliation in a peaceful way of the difficulties that had given rise to violence between the two nations of Honduras and Nicaragua where there has been a history of friction. In all of these countries, I know of no two that are exempted. There is a history over the course of a couple of centuries of friction, and animosities, jealousies, and what have you, which is very natural to expect anywhere in the world, even on the North American Continent.

What has been the history here between our country and our next neighbor to the south, Mexico, it has been a history of war, and friction. What has been the history with respect to our neighbor to the north?

Well, actually, we did, because we forget in our self-containment, and in our learning our history, our version of history, that actually the Thirteen Original Colonies from the standpoint of our national emergence were really part of a group of a total of 37 colonies; 24 of which are today part and parcel of the Dominion of Canada.

So that if we do not regain the historical perspective, if we continue to ignore the historical course of developments, particularly with reference to the country south of the border, we have to be paying a higher and higher price, not only in bad feeling and bad relations, but most of all in our ability to develop the economic markets that are natural for America.

What has happened under the same administration of President Ronald Reagan that has gone back to a discredited and an abandoned and a bankrupt policy of Calvin Coolidge, who was the last President to embrace the doctrine of direct military unilateral intervention.

As a matter of fact, it was right in the nation of Nicaragua, in 1929. I have placed in the RECORD over a year and a half ago the documents that were called a white paper of the then-Secretary of State in the regime of Calvin Coolidge, in which the rationalization was given for the invasion by our Marines.

The rationalization was that we had to contain the exportation of Mexican bolshevism—Mexico was then where Cuba is today. Bolshevism was the word, where Marxism-Leninism is today.

We have got to understand, however, that all during this while we have approached this from a unilateral, subjective approach. We have blithefully ignored history. Franklin Roosevelt, the first to realize that the United States had to be creative; it had to evolve a policy. It was not sufficient to say, "We will turn our backs on gunboat diplomacy. We deplore President Coolidge's approach." It was necessary to offer a creative—and he did, he came out with what was known and was glorified as the "Good Neighbor Policy."

Now that policy resulted in creative and in affirmative results for the United States, because not many years after that, less than 6, the United States finds itself involved in a world war in which it was imperative that we have the sympathy and the alliance of these countries that border with ours. Mexico for instance.

Now, in Mexico, ever since the invasion of the Marines in 1914 in Veracruz, ever since the war with Mexico, there has always been a strong undercurrent of anti-Americanism. It is historical, it is traditional.

With the advent of the course of history, the approximation of nations, the fact that whether Mexico had its cultural centers in Europe, not in the United States or the New World, did not detract from the tremendous impact of American economic activity, the progressiveness of American society, and its obvious influence and Mexico's dependency on American's well-being.

So that you had the foreign minister of Mexico, Pavilla, during World War II, not only coming and joining the United States in an alliance, but even permitting the drafting of Mexican citizens who happen to be in the United States.

If you cross the border today and you visit the cemeteries in Nuevo Laredo, you will still see on occasion little American flags and flowers placed on top of some of the burial plots. These were men, Mexican nationals, who fought with our soldiers in the Pacific, in Germany, all over where our troops were, and who died in combat. They did not get the benefits for the survivors of the GI bill, or any of the veterans benefits that the United States has given.

What I am saying is, that the affirmative constructive policies—now, incidentally, Franklin Roosevelt had a very difficult time in the United States. He was bitterly criticized by the opposition and by the vested interests such as the oil and gas interests of the United States who were up in arms and wanted to invade Mexico, because of the expropriation of the oil companies, most of which were American.

Even despite that, Franklin Roosevelt knew because he had the sagacity to attract first-rate minds around him. As a matter of fact, I think Franklin Roosevelt set the pattern and the working order and the sort of job description that a 20th century President after mid-20th century would have to develop to try to cope with the enormity of what we have made of the office of the President.

He said the major task of the President is to attract first-rate minds, and then orchestrate them and lead them in an assault and resolution of the common problems confronting the American people.

Now I think that is very important to remember, because Franklin Roosevelt was able to attract not only able Secretaries of State, but the actual sergeants of that army; that is, men such as Assistant Secretary or Under Secretary for Latin American Affairs Sumner Wells, who was the architect and the carpenter to put the framework and the foundation behind this policy and make it effective.

So that when we did fight, and there was a tremendous pro-German sentiment in Mexico, because Germany had great cultural and great economic interchanges with Mexico, as well as France. As a matter of fact, ever since the occupation of Mexico by Maximillian, who was imposed by Napoleon III, and the elite of the third French empire were sent to Mexico, why did France invade Mexico?

In order to demand and obtain compliance of the Mexican people of the payment of the debts that the American people had to the French investors.

This is the issue today in Latin America. So that with this background of cultural and historic developments, with the background and the accumulation of historical developments with respect to the policy such as we have used.

For instance, before World War I, we had Gen. John J. (Blackjack) Pershing chasing over some of the north Mexican States after Pancho Villa; who was considered the bandit, the great murderer, assassin. This was the label given him.

History today softens that, and he appears as a great revolutionary personality in Mexican history.

We must evoke that history in order to do now what at all costs must come from some level of our Government. If the President, the executive branch, which under our Constitution, under our President, has the main responsibility of creating and carrying out foreign policy. This was determined very early in our history.

The very first Congress, in 1789, had to delegate. For instance, such things as the imposition of tariffs and duties and such had to be delegated to the President. By the very nature of a pluralistic body, it was not in a position to sit in and discuss taxes and tariffs and imposition of duties on thousands of items.

It had to be an executive branch duty even though the Constitution said that that duty was in the hands and within the jurisdiction exclusively of the Congress.

So that the President today has not offered the Congress any kind of a policy, short term, long term. We have not had any long-term development of policies since Franklin Roosevelt. We have accreted, we have let historical developments so telescope that we are approaching events in an ad hoc, spasm-like type of reaction. And that, of course, for a Nation such as ours, is not fair to the people of this great Nation.

What is going to be our policy? Not in Nicaragua. Even if we were to invade Nicaragua, sit in Nicaragua, govern Nicaragua, we would still have to ask ourselves the same question with respect to Guatemala, maybe even Mexico, our next-door neighbor who, right now, is on a cliff, 50-percent inflation, over 50-percent unemployment, and submarginal employment. Of course we are going to continue to face these cycles and tides of human beings who do what all human beings to in all history, and that is try to keep from starving, try to eke out an existence.

But my feeling and deep conviction has been for years that it is entirely unnecessary to wait for crisis. This has been, actually, what I feel is the thing that inwardly, subjectively, I feel the proudest, ever since I did get involved in the political endeavor: and I will say for the record that that first endeavor was on the local level, the city council; it was there that I discovered that this was a field of interest that absorbed me, that challenged me. I call it legislative advocacy. I discovered by accident, because the last thing I ever thought I would be doing was seeking political office. I studied engineering and then I studied law. I had two older brothers who were engineers. And I could not decide. And it was by accident and only after the war when I found myself working for the Bexar County Juvenile Department and eventually was appointed chief juvenile probation officer, that I realized what a sorry mistake had been committed by my family in the method and manner in which we had been reared, in which we were considered sort of guests, not citizens, though born here, and that sooner or later the entire family would be returning to our parents' homeland. This is understandable when one realizes that in my father's case his roots are in the northern State of Mexico, in Durango, back 400 years, 1561. Not the same in the case of my mother, but nevertheless it is understandable if we look at it from that standpoint, in a day and time in which we were quite living simplistically, 1911, from 1911 to 1930, roughly, was the very turbulent revolutionary period in the Republic of Mexico.

Now, what is going to be the policy? Nothing really has been resolved by today's vote because when the Congress cut off and mandated cutting off direct aid to the CIA for involvement with the Contras, the President simply shifted his funding in his executive discretionary funds and moved the money that he wanted, to the extent that he wanted, right down for the purpose that the Congress said it should not appropriate or divert any appropriated funds for that purpose. The same thing will happen today. The President is not the kind that is flexible in his mindset approach to this type of a pattern of activity. I think that the most awesome development that has literally impressed me and raised my concerns extremely, like I have felt with none of the six Presidents that I have had the honor of serving with in this body since I came to the House, and that is the experience in Beirut, where a President, in his role as Commander in Chief, deploys a couple of thousand marines into a situation and under conditions that the Joint Chiefs of Staff unanimously advised him against.

Now when you have that and you have the consequent results, it was not easy for me to get up here for 14 months and ask the President, "Mr. President, what is the mission of the marines in Beirut? Mr. President, if you are telling the reporters that they are peacekeepers, you can't be a peacekeeper if you are on the side of one faction."

You are having the same thing in Lebanon as you have in Nicaragua, as you have in these other Central American countries in the course of turmoil, you have civil wars. This has been going on in what we call Lebanon for years, for generations. And when the President told a reporter because he did not answer the letters I sent him—this is the first President that does not answer a Congressman's letter of the six I worked with—but he did reply to a newspaper reporter's question, some 6 months after I had first written him in a letter. In it he said two reasons, one to shore up the Gemayel government in Lebanon. Well, the Gemayel government was one of four factions in Lebanon. So there would be three who would be antagonized. So you are not a peacekeeper if you are taking sides in a civil war.

The second reason he gave was that they were peacekeepers. But marines are not politicians, marines are not ambassadors, marines are warriors. They are trained as soldiers. That is their purpose. No soldier has a commander in chief who is worth his salt unless that commander in chief is in a position to give him clear and explicit mission purposes. What is the mission of the military? This is the pervasive question in our involvements since the active hot shooting phase of World War II, because I maintain World War II has not ended. There is no peace treaty terminating the declaration of war that this Congress made on December 7, 1941. We have 300,000 military in Germany alone, we have 45,000 in Korea.

So that what has happened is that we have our chief executive as a popinjay swinging on a pole. Just a few weeks ago the headlines were that, by golly, he was going to put down this upstart, Qadhafi, in Libya. So the headlines were, "Mediterranean Fleet Deployed." Secretary of State Shultz got up and he said, and it was frontpage at least down in my San Antonio paper, "Secretary Shultz says don't rule out the possibility of the use of force."

Then the next thing you know you have this character known as Qadhafi who dresses himself very much like some of the courier-messengers here in Washington, DC, and he has his picture taken and all the press picks it up in the international sector and he says. "I am going on a PT boat to meet President Reagan's Mediterranean fleet."

Then all of a sudden nothing. Where is the big issue? Was or was not Qadhafi backing down? Did or did not President Reagan back down? The whole thing is absurd. Why? Because there is no basic policy of approach or consideration analysis.

I have asked the question from the beginning of my speechifying here, and that beginning was April 1, 1980, and it was not President Ronald Reagan who was in office. It was Jimmy Carter. I was asking the same question I am asking today. There was a very, very illustrative book written that I think was sort of a seminal writing and thought-provoking book. The title of it was "On Revolution" by Hannah Arendt. She had one statement—she had other things that I think historical developments prove her erroneous or wrong in her criteria or her judgment, but her basic thesis was that a contest that divides the world today, and which continues, and in which so much is at stake, those will probably win who understand revolution. That is a very, very true statement that should have been emblazoned on every State Department entrance door. It should have been placed before every Secretary of State. If we do not understand these developments after 1947, labeled as wars of liberation, people's liberation movements, from Asia to the Middle East to the New World—Is the El Salvador movement the same as the Nicaraguan? Is this indeed an East-West conflict? During debate today we had eminent leaders in the House saying it indeed was. Well, the first Secretary of State under the Reagan administration was Alexander Haig. And he no sooner had been installed after January 20 when he announced that he was drawing the line, those were his words, in the smallest country in the Western Hemisphere, El Salvador, and that this was an East-West conflict reflected in the smallest country in the New World.

Five years later and $4 billion out of our Treasury, that conflict is no closer to resolution now than it was then. Should we not ask, Mr. Speaker, what is going on here? Can it be that the basic assumption that you can and insist on obtaining a military resolution is flawed? Can that be the thing? And if, after $4 billion, all told, and 5 years, and the loss of several of our active-duty military, and the yet-to-be-reported violation of the advisory capacity of our military, and in our embracing tactics that we condemn when used by other nations, in that tiniest, smallest of countries, what then are we going to do when Guatemala blows up? You do not have to be a prophet, you do not have to be a big, big expert to know that it is coming.

Where have we been, where have our voices of outcry on persecution been when we have literally equipped the armies of Guatemala to eradicate entire Indian tribes?

If we were to be judged by the Nuremberg principles, we would be declared guilty. We are, in fact, at this very moment, under what we would call in our court system here a restraining order by the World Court of Justice to cease and desist and refrain from conducting war against Nicaragua, are perpetrating acts of war against Nicaragua, because we have been tried and found guilty of acts of war. We have been accused and found guilty of trying to mine and bomb and destroy and port facilities. There is no question about it.

Our CIA has called upon tactics that I do not think have ever been sanctioned in law. The CIA was created by the 1947 National Security Act. I do not think the CIA, under that act or any subsequent amendments, has the authority or the right to accept the untold number of war planes that the Defense Department gave it on September 18, 1984, for use, obviously, by the Contras, obviously, in and around Nicaragua.

What I am saying is that these collateral debates such as they have been on whether or not we are going to sanction and approve $18 million for the President, they are that. They are collateral issues. They are not hitting at the heart of the matter. They are not asking the President for accountability.

Now the American people have no other way except through their elected Representative and their elective officials—in this case, it is their U.S. Senators and Members of the House and, in the case of the President and Vice President. Now the President and Vice President have 230-plus million Americans to look after. They can interpret their mandate to their like. In a State like mine, the two U.S. Senators have over 15 million citizens to respond to. But in the case of the individual Representative, the citizen should have a sense of immediate accessibility, whether it is just a tele-pone, to this office we call the Office of Representative of the Congress of the United States. If that office is not accessible or if it is not leading the way in disseminating the information necessary to understand the issues, can we then demand of the American people to act and respond in a knowledgeable way? Well, I think that begs the question; of course not.

I heard some statements made here today that were taken as dogma, and even some of those were arguing and saying that they could not go along with the President were quick to preface their remarks by saying, "But that doesn't mean that I am on the side of the Sandinistas. I don't think they are any better or worse or anything. They are no angels."

Well, that is again begging the question.

The point is that we heard very serious allegations. One, that the church was persecuted and is being persecuted in Nicaragua. But the same people who are alleging this persecution are equally condemnatory of Fidel Castro in Cuba. But the church has always had and still has and continues to have diplomatic relations with Cuba. As a matter of fact, my own archbishop of the archdiocese of San Antonio just came back from a conference of bishops in Cuba.

Why is it then that the Vatican is so severe in its handling of the eccelsiastics in Nicaragua? Well, can it be that President Reagan, after he named our first representative to the Vatican, has struck a deal with the Pope, and that the Pope, among other things, will supply our CIA with what is going on in Poland, for example?

I can assure you the CIA does not have the capability to find out any other way.

Can it be that the leading lobbyist right now here in Washington on behalf of the so-called Contras was the former representative of the Banco de Ambrociano of Italy, which is the Vatican bank, which went kerplunk as a result of a scandal, in which that same lobbyist was the one who headed that bank's interests in Nicaragua during Somoza? Could there be some happenstance connection? Could it be that there is some reason why some of the leading columnists and editorialists in the Central and South American press say that the real issue and that the reason why ultimately American soldiers will be there is that that is the only way they will be able to collect the bank's debts, which they cannot get right now, and which the leading countries meeting just last month in February in South America were united in their expression of concern about the exaction of the interest rates demanded in the repayment of these debts? These are the real issues.

But who here has ever informed this Congress of the nature and the background of these lobbyists, some of whom were referred to by some of my colleagues as very distinguished and responsible leaders trying to bring democracy to Nicaragua?

I think that those facts ought to be known. I think they should be established. I think we Americans are in many ways so innocent even now.

What I said for the first time and placed in the RECORD, because what I did put in the RECORD a letter that the Washington Ambassador from Nicaragua had sent, I assume, to all the Members—I know I got one of the letters. I had known from reading some of the Latin American press, some of the Mexican press, Argentina press, which I do read, that these events had happened, but they had never been reported in our press. In this letter the Nicaraguan Ambassador was saying, look, we have just entered into a bilateral agreement with Costa Rica in which we are creating a commission to resolve peacefully our differences here along the border.

So that it was not until this Monday that the first report of this event was written in the American press, in the Washington Post for Monday, March 17, on page A18. The title of the article is "Latin Mood Shifts Against Washington; Diplomatic Trends Weaken Reagan Effort to Isolate Nicaragua and Win Contra Aid." It is bylined by Robert J. McCartney, Washington Post Foreign Service. Its dateline is Mexico City, March 16.

The article follows:

LATIN MOOD SHIFTS AGAINST WASHINGTON; DIPLOMATIC TREND WEAKENS REAGAN EFFORT TO ISOLATE NICARAGUA AND WIN CONTRA AID

(By Robert J. McCartney)

MEXICO CITY, March 16.—The diplomatic mood in Latin America has tipped against Washington in recent months, weakening the Reagan administration's sales pitch to Congress for aid to the Nicaraguan rebels and isolating the United States in the region on the issue.

Seven South American countries and Mexico, grouped in the Contadora movement, took the unprecedented step last month of formally urging the U.S. government to halt aid to the guerrillas and press efforts for a regional peace treaty.

These countries are convinced that such U.S. involvement only aggravates the conflict in Central America and hurts chances for a negotiated settlement there, according to senior diplomats of Latin American and other western countries.

The Latin Americans' stepped-up role has its roots in the expansion of the Contadora movement last summer, in the emergence of new democratic governments in South America, and in a new sense of regional solidarity owing to the Latin American debt crisis, diplomats said.

In Central America, a center-left tide in recent elections has contributed to fresh interest in peace talks with Nicaragua's Sandinista government.

Costa Rica has irritated the United States by talking directly with Nicaragua about the two nations' border problems. Guatemala's new civilian government, hoping to make a foreign policy splash, plans to host a summit of Central America's five presidents in May.

The diplomatic trend appears to have undermined Washington's efforts to isolate Nicaragua. Instead, the United States finds itself isolated in the face of nearly unanimous regional opposition to helping the contras, or counterrevolutionaries, who are fighting a civil war against the Sandinista government.

"The United States' support efforts [for the contras] lead to concern that it could be the cause of destabilization and greater conflict in Central America. There is real ideological agreement on this among the countries in the Contadora groups," a South American ambassador said.

The Latin Americans' shift has attracted the attention of U.S. allies in Western Europe, Canada and Australia and reinforced the allies' own skepticism over U.S. policy in Central America, western diplomats said.

Nevertheless, the tilt is unlikely to have much effect beyond its impact on U.S. and foreign public opinion. None of the Contadora countries has expressed any intention to cut back economic or diplomatic ties with the United States because of disagreements over Central America.

Moverover, Washington may benefit later this year from the Latin American countries' own growing frustration with the Nicaraguan government's military buildup and curbs on political pluralism, according to the Latin and other western diplomats. These sources emphasize, however, that dissatisfaction with the Sandinistas did not translate into support for the contras.

To some extent, the Latin Americans are making a fuss over contra aid in order to underline their opposition to direct U.S. military action in the region, western diplomats and other observers said. Several Latin American governments worry that use of U.S. forces against Nicaragua would trigger large protest demonstrations and cause significant political unrest in their countries, the sources said.

Peruvian President Alan Garcia said Friday that his country would break diplomatic relations with the United States if it attacked Nicaragua.

"The Latins are saying very strongly that the time has come to tell the United States that you can't just send the Marines into Latin America anymore," a senior West European diplomat said.

As far as contra aid is concerned, U.S. officials argue that the Latin Americans' diplomatic stance is largely a public relations gimmick playing on anti-Yankee feeling at home.

"Central America is a long way away from some of these (Contadora) countries and is not a priority national interest," a U.S. official said.

Some U.S. officials say that representatives of several Latin American nations have told the United States privately that their governments "secretly" favor a tough line against Nicaragua, and even want Washington to back the contras. This was disputed strongly, however, in interviews with senior diplomats of four Latin American countries and three non-Latin U.S. allies.

"It is unrealistic for the United States to say that all of our diplomatic work is just for show. This attitude leads nowhere," a South American envoy said.

A western ambassador said: "The Americans claim to hear privately all the time that people wish they would go in against the Sandinistas. That is just not what we are being told by the Latin Americans."

A high point of Latin American opposition to U.S. policy in Central America came on Feb. 10, when the foreign ministers of the eight countries of the Contadora movement met jointly with Secretary of State George P. Shultz in Washington to urge the United States to halt aid to the contras.

The original Contradora group—Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Panama—has been trying since January 1983 to draw up a region-wide peace treaty for Cental America. The group, named for the Panamanian island where it first met, has produced two major draft treaties calling for Cental America's countries to reduce their military arsenals, halt all support for guerrillas in neighboring countries, and promote democracy at home.

Neither pact has won universal acceptance among the five Cental American nations: Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica. Critics charge that the Contadora process has yielded only meaningless paperwork and fruitless diplomatic conferences.

But the Contadora process got a boost last July when Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Peru formed a support group for Contadora. The Contadora movement now includes every major Latin American democracy except Bolivia, Ecuador and the Dominican Republic, and represents approximately 300 million people.

Three of the support group countries—Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina—have switched recently from military to civilian governments, which the U.S. administration applauded.

In general, however, the new democratic governments are pursuing policies that are more nationalistic and more critical of Washington.

Well, most of them, including Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua, were in Guatemala City at the taking of the oath of office at the newly elected president of Guatemala, who said, "Gentleman, let's get together here and declare ourselves in positive agreement of seeking and obtaining a peaceful settlement of our differences," and every one of those, including Daniel Ortega, subscribed to that.

Now, it was not until after those meetings that the President mentioned the possibility of some kind of compromise based on a diplomatic approach. But what it would be, to this day he has not said. Now, today during the debate there were some pledges made by some of the Members apparently speaking on behalf of the White House who said, "Well, there is no harm in giving the President this money because he is going to hold up its use for 90 days to see if we can force Nicaragua to a diplomatic resolution."

Well, these nations have already done it. When the Contadora group had an agreement from these nations in dispute, Nicaragua, Honduras, the United States undermined—that is a strong word, but it is the truth. The United States did not say we appreciate this and we want to help you, we want a peaceful resolution. We undermined them. We put pressure, for instance, on the Mexican foreign minister. And, of course, they are vulnerable. Why, which one of us is not vulnerable to threats, depending on the nature of the threats?

I happen to know, for instance, in the case of the horrible decimation of the poorest of the poor in the world, not just in the New World, the Indian tribes up in the mountains of Guatemala, where they fled, 20,000 to 30,000 in one particular day or two, and went into and across the border of Mexico in the state of Chiapas. I talked to the bishop of Chiapas himself, who was still horrified—I could see the horror in his eyes—of the Guatemalan soldiers beyoneting 6- and 7-month-old babies, ripping their bellies open. With what bayonets? Russian made, Cuban made? No; bayonets and materiel that were clearly stamped "For U.S. Army use only."

Is this the way we want to be associated, whether we carry the day or not, with the masses of the people with whom destiny says we have to share the future in the New World and which for the first time in the last 15 years now exceed our population by about 75 or 80 million?

I say the time has come for us to develop, and if it is not forthcoming from the executive branch, then let the policymaking body rise to its purpose in great destiny, as it has in the past and let us forge the policy, one, that like Franklin Roosevelt's, will be creative and productive of good.

The irony of this is that we will never, never succeed with bullets and bayonets. If we are talking about eliminating communism, we will never, never, bomb communism out of existence. The only way is justice and social justice. That is the only way, and it is the surest way. It is the easiest way, really, in the long run, and it is the one most productive of good, where we can become the natural producers. Once again we must never forget the old biblical saying, "By their fruits ye shall know them." A good tree will not produce bad fruit. A bad tree cannot produce good fruit. And what is the result of Reaganomics and Reaganism? In the foreign field we have been kicked out completely of any influence in the Middle East. We have lost that. It is gone. In fact, England and France have returned with a greater presence than we.

To the south of us we had allowed our private sector to abandon Latin America. In less than a 10-year period our investments had dropped from 37 percent, or maybe more, to less than 17 percent. Why? It is a natural. Mexico, for instance. Who knows in this Congress, among my colleagues, that we buy over 85 percent of Mexico's production? Who knows it? Do you think that Mexico did not try during the last 20 years to find markets in Japan? In fact, they even tried Russia, through Cuba. But why do they find that it is better to deal with the United States? Naturally, because it is the natural market, it is the productive market, it is the profitable market. They do not have the problems that they found they confronted when Italy wanted to come in and buy oil, when France wanted to come in and buy oil, West Germany, Japan. What happened? The Mexicans found out that old Uncle Sam was not such an Uncle Shylock after all.

But is the United States reaping any good from this knowledge? No. It is not even generally known that we consume or rather buy that tremendous overwhelming preponderant amount of Mexican oil production.

Why should we be suffering in our growing agricultural producing areas for the lack of markets for this tremendous ingenuity of American production know-how?

Why should Mexico be a scarcity area now for corn and wheat and not be a natural outlet on some kind of a barter deal? Why? I will tell you why. Because the U.S. Government, the American people, do not have real control, not even ownership over the main grain companies in this country.

Canada, the great wheat producer, has a government wheat board. We do not have any such thing.

It is the big speculators in Brussels, another one in London, another one in Buenos Aires, Argentina, that is determining what the farmer is going to get for his grain in America and how it is going to be sold and when it is going to be sold and under what conditions.

Why do we not address that problem? I say that rather than wasting our sustenance in these frivolous and unproductive foreign adventures, Mr. President, we stay at home and first resolve the needs of our people. If you tell me that you have $100 million to give the Contras while you are also telling me as chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing that you do not have $63 million for the homeless of America, Mr. President, you will never get my vote, and I do not think you will find you will get the majority under those circumstances, as you found out today.

There is no way the American people, even those who have supported you, will accept that kind of a conflict or dichotomy, as they say. And, after all, we are supposed to be trying to represent people. I say, Mr. President, we are hurting here at home. Our people do not want to waste the sustenance and the strength of our future, which is our youth, in adventures in foreign shores, with no basic purposeful reason of a creative nature or one conducive of any good.

Why are we in such a dilemma?

One of our most eloquent colleagues, the gentlewoman who preceded me, was deploring the sad state of how America, the great arsenal of democracy, is now a consuming importing nation. We are now back where we were before 1914 and during the Continental Congresses and during the time we were a colony, a sort of a merchantile system, where we import our manufactured and processed goods. We are not producing. As of the last 3½ years the United States is not a producing nation.

Second, we are now a debtor nation for the first time since 1914. When Teddy Roosevelt insisted and obtained the construction of the Panama Canal, he had to wait until he could get $40 million line of credit from the French bankers because we were not a creditor nation. And why? Because we were self-centered at that time. And we responded and we had not sold our soul and our people's souls and its economic well-being for a mess of potage. We had not sold out to the tremendous financial interests who have total control of our country today and who, in reality are making the decisions as to the American standard of living as to whether or not we will continue this debacle of more and more and thousands and thousands of small businesses going broke.

As I reported last week. The last report I got on housing indicates that for the first time since the Depression—and, mind you, that must be horrible, because during the Depression, before the housing policies and programs were put into effect, we did not have much home ownership. We do now, or we have had. But for the first time last month over 7 percent of the homeowners of this Nation were facing foreclosure. In what kind of a market? The market we had 2 years ago, 1½ years ago, which was an inflationary market? No. In a downturn market in which real estate values, for instance, in my area dropped 40 percent in less than 10 months. We anticipated this, Mr. President. And in May of 1983 a bit of legislation we called the Emergency Home Morgage Assistance Act, which I took great pride in having concocted on the basis of the Homeowners Loan Corporation studies of the 1930's, which worked, when our Government had faith in its people and the people returned that faith. When we closed out the Homeowners Loan Corporation the taxpayers made half a billion dollars profit, and that was a lot of money at that time. Half a billion dollars then was like $3 billion today, or more.

But not this time, Mr. President, because you fought us down the line. And even though we battled and we got it out of subcommittee and we got out of full committee and we got it out of this House by a goodly margin, you and your leaders in the Senate killed it. It languished and died in the Senate.

Mr. President, while you are asking for $100 million for a motley crew with untold purposes, ill-defined objectives, untold prospects for enmeshing this country in quicksands of jungle wars, while you are saying you have the $100 million for that, please reconsider and let us forwardly push with just that amount of money, $100 million, which is what we were asking for in 1983. We could have saved 150,000 Americans whose only real identification with the country is their home and their little plot or lot of land.

Let us, Mr. President, go back. I heard last week, right before my special order, a colleague representing the agricultural area, saying there was great distress and that family homes were popping out of existence like popcorn in a popper. Today we have heard the gentlewoman from Maryland. Before that I have heard many times the distinguished chairman of the Steel Caucus referring to the rust belt of the United States. That was the producing arsenal of democracy in the vast war today rusing, inactive, out of use.

We have been subjected to the invasion of former enemies who lost the shooting war and have won the economic war.

I have related in speech after speech in 1965 and especially since 1966 and the first credit crunch of June, 1966, and it gives me no particular joy to say, "I told you so," anymore than I am joyful because of the outcome of the vote today which I had advocated and pled for, because I have never been satisfied with criticizing. I criticize only after I have some suggestions as alternatives to be considered.

The only time I complain is when there is no consideration given, when you are shut out from any consideration, because I think that is a disservice. Every one of us has the right and the duty to speak out and be heard and to be considered in those serious endeavors.

There has never been any levity on my part, but what I say is in the words of the prophet Isaiah:

> But this a people robbed and spoiled, they are all of them snared in holes and they are hid in prison houses. They are for a prey and none delivereth for a spoil and none sayeth restore.

I also include for the RECORD the following article and letter:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 14, 1986]

The Reagan administration is right to take Nicaragua as a serious menace—to civil peace and democracy in Nicaragua and to the stability and security of the region. Some of its rhetoric is easily mocked, but the administration understands things much better than those who paint the Sandinistas as poor put-upon patriots of a mischievous but unthreatening leftist persuasion. There is no good reason to doubt the Sandinistas are revolutionary communists who would if they could make their country a second Cuba: a police state and an outpost of Soviet power. To defeat Somoza, they lied to the hemisphere that they were pluralists and democrats. To get aid from Jimmy Carter, they told more lies of their peaceful intent. They are squeezing the remaining pluralistic forces, and their subversive capability is evident.

The question is, what should be done about it? More precisely, since this is the seventh year of the revolution and the fifth year of the counter-insurgency and many political facts already exist on the ground, what can be done about it? For—here is where judgment must temper ardor—all possibilities are not equally open.

The first requirement is a general explicit agreement among Americans to draw certain geopolitical lines: no Soviet bases, no weapons of regional intimidation. The United States needs to make sure the Kremlin knows where these lines are. The United States needs to pledge to itself it will counter the inevitable Soviet probes.

Then the United States needs to do what is necessary to block and defeat efforts by Nicaragua, with or without its Cuban and Soviet patrons, to subvert other Central American countries. Naturally this can only be done with the consent and cooperation of the countries affected. The whole argument over the contras illustrates, by the way, the foolishness of imagining that El Salvador's large guerrilla force could stay in the field for two weeks without Nicaraguan support.

What about the contras? They have become an instrument to topple the Sandinistas or—a nearly equivalent goal— to deny them a monopoly of power. But they are an imperfect instrument. The credentials and field performance of the effective military leadership do not fit the democratic and humane purposes avowed by the political leadership. Their American sponsorship lets the Sandinistas depict them as inheritors of earlier Yankee interventions. Their American sponsorship also denies them the necessary warm support of almost all other Latin countries, whose fear of communist subversion is offset by a reluctance to endorse what they see as American armed intervention.

But, as the administration says, would not these difficulties dissolve if the United States ended its hesitancy on the contras and provided them the resources and American policy constancy they need to prevail? The record suggests that the Sandinistas would stiffen, close out the lingering traces of domestic pluralism and seek additional support. Other Latins, fearing the whirlpool, would distance themselves further from Washington.

The other Latins include Nicaragua's near neighbors and the South American democracies. They have found it next to impossible to gain political concessions from the Sandinista regime while it faced what it has regarded as a threat to its very existence. While Managua sees the issue as survival, no real concessions are likely, and even then they would be hard in coming. In this sense, the administration's insistence that the Sandinistas are irredeemable becomes, as does its critics' insistence that the contras cannot win, a self-fulfilling prophecy.

We believe, nonetheless, that serious negotiation offers a route to the loosening that internal reconciliation and regional stabilization require. It counts that Nicaragua is not Cuba: not an island, necessarily more open to its neighbors, harder for Moscow (or Havana) to protect and sustain. It counts that inside as well as outside Nicaragua there remain important elements devoted to the best interests of their country. It counts that Latin America is caught up in a historic sweep toward democracy and that the Latin democracies are available to tug and haul on the parties, to assist in the back and forth, to draw away some of the Sandinistas' paralzying paranoia and to put the administration's effort in a larger multinational context.

"Serious negotiation." The goals—the feasible goals—are clear enough on the democratic side: first the scaling down of limits on civil liberties, press, private enterprise and church, the opening of next year's municipal elections to all parties, plus credible evidence of reduced Sandinista support for El Salvador's guerrillas; then a turn toward national power-sharing. What could the Sandinistas reasonably expect in return? A guerrilla cease-fire, postponement at least of American aid to rebel forces, a start on diminishing the American regional military presence, an end to economic sanctions; and, if things went along, American renunication of an intent to drive the Sandinistas from Nicaragua.

The Sandinistas have taken Nicaragua a long way toward the Soviet-Cuban orbit. An attempt to fit Nicaragua back into a Central American mode would be disorderly, incomplete and frustrating—but a vast improvement on what otherwise looms.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, March 14, 1986.

EDITOR,
The Washington Post,
Washington, DC.

DEAR EDITOR: Your March 14 editorial on Nicaragua correctly points out that the Sandinistas are tough cookies; that's the way revolutionaries are. Then you go on to say that the Contras aren't nice guys, either, so maybe the best thing to do is forget about the latest request for more aid and try to negotiate a settlement. The trouble is, it isn't up to us to settle anything in Central America. It's up to those folks, not us.

Obviously, $100 million isn't going to make or break the Contras, let alone their enemies in Managua. If the Vietcong survived unlimited U.S. firepower, it's pretty clear that the Contras could do the same—if they had popular support, if they had internal unity, or even if they had some democratic leanings of their own.

The Reagan policy can make life tough for the Sandinistas, but they already know what hard times are. Hard times make hardbitten people. They haven't forgotten the decades of U.S.-sponsored dictatorship, and they see our present misadventures as just another chapter in Yankee efforts to impose our will in places where it's none of our business.

Nobody appointed Ronald Reagan to cleanse the world of obnoxious governments. If they did, there's a long list that he's forgotten about. If repression is bad in Nicaragua, how about Seoul? How about Santiago or worse still, Pretoria? And if "constructive engagement" works in South Africa, why couldn't it work in Nicaragua?

Money won't buy us a popular revolution in Nicaragua, any more than Marcos could buy his way out of one in the Philippines. The test the Contras have failed is the test of popular appeal and support. "People power" eliminated Somoza from Nicaragua, Marcos from the Philippines and Duvalier from Haiti. This is the power that the Contras don't have, and we can't buy. Reagan may believe that power stems from the barrel of guns, but revolutions grow only in the hearts of people. The Contras don't represent anything except an ugly past. Forget the aid. All it's doing is illing off whatever chance we might have ever had to walk away from our old role of bullyboy. Forget American negotiation; nobody down there is interested in being told again what Uncle Sam wants; it's their turn.

Sincerely,

HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
Member of Congress.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. I thank the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to take the full 30 minutes, revisiting this legislation one more time. I am sure all Members of the House listening or here will recall this bill. Enough is enough. It is time to get reconciliation over. This agrees to the Senate amendment. It is safe to say that every side has negotiated in good faith but we could not make and agree to any changes. This does what reconciliation is supposed to do. It saves $25 billion over the 3 years, $19 billion in outlay savings and $6 billion in revenue increases. It has the changes that are necessary in 8(g) and OCS. It also has the necessary changes that are required retroactively with the cigarette tax. I think it is about time. If this reconciliation does not take place there will indeed be divorce. I would just say let us vote quickly and let us get the savings. Whatever State you represent you are better off with this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the motion to concur.

When the House acted on March 6 to amend the reconciliation package, it did so in good faith and in recognition of the need to compromise on items in dispute in order to resolve the deficit reduction agreements of last year.

I must oppose the motion to concur because I do not believe the other body's action has been taken in good faith. In the face of the clearly articulated position of the House, the other body, in its amendment of March 14, deleted crucial modifications of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, Medicare, AFDC, and the Federal Employee Health Benefits Program. Beyond that, the other body went so far as to include in its amendment changes in the Medicare Program which will benefit a single constituency in a single State.

Since Tuesday, when the House disagreed to the other body's amendment and the other body insisted on its amendment, House Members with matters in dispute met to formulate a final concession. Yesterday, modifications were proposed to the other body. They responded today. That response was no response at all. The counteroffer of the other body indicates to me that they will not negotiate in good faith. We must not allow ourselves, as Members of the House, to be pressured into a compromise which is no compromise at all.

Reconciliation was intended to be a vehicle for deficit reduction. The House has acted to fulfill that pledge in good faith. The other body has not.

We must not agree to concur in the other body's action.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this bill once again. I think it is a real tragedy that we have to cave in not only to the Senate but to OMB which has more power sometimes, it seems to me, than the three branches of Government. It is a shame that we have forgotten American workers and we want to cave in to the provision that excludes the Buy American provision. It is a shame that we have to once again sock it to Government employees who would have gotten an opportunity to have health benefits that were really competitive and that would have cost them a little less.

As a matter of fact it would have cost the Government less. But we do not ever in this body want to help Government employees. Somehow our astronauts, the people who work on our borders, deliver our mail, and issue those Social Security checks and inspect our food are not that important.

So I think it is a shame that we are just caving in to OMB and the other body, and I hope that we oppose it again. I think it is in our best interest to do that.

Mr. Speaker, I for one vote "no."

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX].

(Mr. BREAUX asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the amendment that was offered by Mr. GRAY originally was objected to incorporating the provisions of the previously informally agreed-to proposal that we sent to the other body as a compromise yesterday. That represented the last vestige of our effort to keep faith with the reconciliation process that had produced a conference report last December.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to rehash in detail a blow-by-blow account of the events that have taken us from that promising beginning to what inevitably appears to be the end of the road today. Other Members will likely want to express their views on some of the elements of that amendment now.

I would note, however, that all of the elements of this amendment from AFDC, unemployed-parent provisions, to the section 19 amendments to the OCS Lands Act, to the so-called Buy American provisions, to the 8(g) provisions represent additional and unilateral concessions offered by the House to provisions of the conference report that was agreed to by both Houses of Congress last December.

Our mistake in making these concessions was that we thought we would be negotiating in good faith. Our mistake was that we thought we were negotiating with parties in the other body who were capable of making independent judgments on important policy and budgetary decisions. Our mistake was that we did not realize that the other body, upon receiving a thumbs down from the President's men at OMB, would force us to negotiate with a gun to our head. With respect to the 8(g) we previously conceded, in House action 2 weeks ago, to demands of the White House that we deny coastal States a fair and equitable division of royalty revenues flowing from OCS leases after the date of the 1978 law requiring such a division, when those royalties came from leases issued prior to that date.

The OMB and the Senate did not think that even this concession was sufficient even though OMB Director Miller indicated that this would meet his objections when he testified before the other body last month. The OMB did not even think that it was fair and equitable to now pay the States what it admits is currently due to them, taking 10 percent off the top for their own purse and forcing the States to wait 15 years for this money.

I can recognize reality, however. I can feel the cold muzzle of that veto gun against my head and I am proud that we have held out for this long even though some were telling me last year to accept a settlement for my State that represented less than one-third of what we have in this package today.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI].

(Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I expect that tonight the House will finally bring to an end the long debate over the 1986 reconciliation bill. The conference agreement on this legislation was filed on December 19 of last year. For 3 months we have been sending this conference agreement, with various amendments, back and forth between the Senate and the House. Frankly, we are not any closer tonight than we have been for a number of weeks.

There is no question that this is important legislation. It will reduce the deficit by about $18 billion over the next 3 years. We have worked hard to resolve the issues that are in disagreement because we need these savings, and because we need to demonstrate to the American public that we are capable of enacting legislation that will address the serious deficit problem.

Despite the importance of this bill, I intend to vote against it for two reasons. It does not contain the extension of the AFDC two-parent family program to all States that was in the House bill and was agreed to as part of the original conference agreement. Also, I do not think it is right to single out specific States or other geographical regions for special treatment under our national entitlement programs.

Nevertheless, the House will work its will tonight and, as I said, I expect we will concur in the latest Senate amendment and send this legislation to the President.

I thank the Speaker.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it seems like we are right back where we started again. It is about time we finished this. This is dragging on. When we leave here today we do not come back until after the recess and then we have something like a week or a week and a half to produce a budget resolution that meets the guidelines of Gramm-Rudman. So things are getting tighter and closer. I want to point out to the House again what is separating us from the other body in this version is not matters of money, they are matters of policy that ought to be brought up at another time, they ought to be brought up in legislation dealing with policy, not legislation dealing with spending changes to try to save money.

I think it would not be wise for us on this eve of recess to vote down again a measure that saves $17 billion for this country, savings we badly need, to begin work on Gramm-Rudman.

I also point out for the coastal States that this means another delay and continuing to trifle with an agreement that we have with the administration and with the other body that would put to rest and settle this matter once and for all paying the offshore revenue to the States involved. AFDC amendment is something that ought to be taken up again at another time. This will cost my State $12 million. This amendment will cost my State $12 million in additional expenditures at a time when it is running a deficit of maybe as much as $500 million.

I think the State of Louisiana would appreciate that coming up at another time, a time when we have time to sit down and discuss that and debate that separately as a policy change rather than trying to attach it to this spending reduction bill on the idea that we can get this and force this down the President's throat. It is not going to work. I do not know how many times it is going to take for the other body to keep rejecting something until we finally understand. The administration has made it clear it is not going to sign something like that. So we ought to drop it and get on with the business of saving money and take that up at another time.

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Louisiana, when we talk about AFDC unemployed-parent program, the Subcommittee on Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation of the Committee on Ways and Means had full hearings on this matter, we marked that bill up in subcommittee, reported it to the full committee of which the gentleman is a member, we had open discussion at full committee level. We reported the bill out.

Mr. MOORE. I hear what the gentleman is saying. I do not disagree with him. But we have the tail wagging the dog.

Quite frankly I say to my good friend from Tennessee who has worked so hard on this amendment, while his amendment may be meritorious, bring it up in another bill. Do not let this hold up a $17 billion savings to the entire country and the money of these coastal States involved. Now is not the time to argue this.

□ 1900

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. If the gentleman will continue to yield, we worked tirelessly in the full committee on this unemployed parent program. We went to the conference committee in order to reconcile the differences with the Senate.

The gentleman talks about it is going to cost his State $12 million. That is true. But on the moratoriums, we lift the sanctions under the Medicaid Program, which will also provide about $17 million additional dollars to the State of Louisiana.

We did the same thing for Texas. We tried in every way to compromise with the conferees in the Senate side. We gave up everything. For them to come back now at the 11th hour, when we are about to leave here for recess for the Easter break, to tell us no, no AFDC UP Program—our President stood right in this well in his State of the Union Message, and he talked about the profamily piece. He talked about welfare reform.

Mr. MOORE. I hear the gentleman. I am simply saying this is not the time to fight that fight. This is a budget reconciliation bill. It is not a bill to address AFDC.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope my colleagues would realize at this point the UP Program is only saying that the unemployed parent can live in the household and be a part of the family unit.

Right now, under current law, options are there for States to adopt it, whereas the father can live in the home and keep the family intact.

I would hope that we would take a clear message from the President when he said here that we are talking about welfare reform, profamily, in breaking the cycle of poverty. I would hope that we would see fit to reject this motion that is before the House today and not agree with what the Senate has rammed down our throats here this afternoon in saying that we ought to accept this reconciliation.

I, too, would agree that reconciliation is important, but it is not that important when we have gone through the legislative process to add the unemployed parent program to the reconciliation bill. We have gone through the subcommittee level, the full committee level, as well as our conferees on the Senate, to reconcile the differences. We gave up and protected Louisiana, Texas, and other States, We gave up everything that was fair that was possible to give up.

I would hope my colleagues would say no to this motion before the House today.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOULTER].

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the motion to concur with the Senate amendments on reconciliation. There are a lot of reasons for my support, but there is one in particular that I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues.

In a time when we are attempting to reign in out of control Federal spending and get our fiscal house out of the red, we have a provision in the House package that would increase the size of the welfare state, bringing more people onto the welfare rolls, rather than trying to reduce those numbers.

This change would cost 25 States a total of $187.4 million each year—and would cost the State of Texas alone $23 million. The provision would mandate that as of January 1, 1988, States would have to provide AFDC benefits to two-parent families with dependent children in which the principal wage-earner in unemployed. Participation in the two parent AFDC Program has historically been an option for States. Many, including Texas, opted out of participation. Now we are saying, in the House passed version—that States must participate. Texas must, the law says, now spend as much as $23 million on a program it has chosen not to be part of.

This, Mr. Speaker, is not the kind of quality control on welfare that the American people want. In fact, it is just the opposite. The Senate amendments delete this unnecessary provision, returning the AFDC Program to its original state. The Senate amendments leave State's rights and State decisions where they belong—in the State.

We must remember that we are trying—the American people are demanding that we do—we are trying to reduce this Nation's deficit. This does not mean that we can shift burdens onto our State and local governments. This does not mean that we should be increasing the scope of our welfare system.

We must remember, Mr. Speaker, that we are trying to be fiscally, and socially, responsible. The Senate amendments do a far better job of meeting those goals, and I encourage my colleagues to support the Senate version.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, very briefly, the issue is not the timing on reconciliation in terms of savings. That is something we should have passed last year. I would say that I have no question in my mind that ultimately we will pass a form of reconciliation bill.

The real issue here is the integrity of the House in terms of the House's position. We made a deal with the Senate. We basically sat down and agreed as to the elements that would be included in reconciliation.

Instead, now in a bona fide offer that the House has made to the Senate, it is just outrightly rejected.

So the question is: Is the House going to stand for its position at this point? That is the issue.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge the Members to stand by the position of the House if we are to truly have a bargaining position, not only in this reconciliation, but in reconciliation bills for the future.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROEMER].

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Chairman for yielding. I would like to congratulate the gentleman, not necessarily for what we got today, but for what the gentleman has tried to do for those of us who wanted elements that we did not get.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to thank my colleagues, JOHN BREAUX, JERRY HUCKABY, HENSON MOORE, for the work they have done on agriculture. It could have been a lot better, but I think we have a chance now to help our State help this country with the deficit reduction.

Mr. Speaker, I say let us move on.

Mr. Speaker, I once again say to the Chairman, thank you for the attempt to have us a good bill rather than the one we have.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that this side has the right to close debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Illinois has the opportunity to close debate.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will make one closing statement.

Mr. Speaker, I think all of us know what the issues are. We have been down this road many times. I think clearly the issue from my perspective is one of good faith. We have made many offers; the Senate has rejected them.

Mr. Speaker, I want to particularly take a moment to thank our distinguished leaders of the House who have worked so hard: Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI who worked tirelessly in this effort to bring about an equitable reconciliation process; also the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX] who was one of the originators of the idea of the Outer Continental Shelf proposals that were included in the House budget. It was his suggestion that led us to move it in the budget, and eventually it was accepted by the other body, and also by the administration as true deficit reduction. So the gentleman is to be congratulated for helping us in that leadership.

I also want to thank Mr. Bosco, who worked so hard to get the other body to recognize the need for protection of American jobs with the Buy America. I would also like to thank Chairman WILLIAM FORD of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, who worked to protect the Federal employees health benefits, which the other body rejected. I want to thank, of course, subcommittee Chairman HOWARD FORD of Tennessee, who worked to try to bring some real profamily into the welfare system that we heard so eloquently talked about from the well of this House during the State of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the Members of this body to vote against the motion to concur.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, although my heart tugs at the thought of not being able to debate this another week and at another time, may I strongly suggest a "yes" vote.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were yeas 230, nays 154, not voting 50, as follows:

□ 1925

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Loeffler for, with Mr. Dymally against.

Messrs. STARK, SYNAR, REID, JONES of Tennessee, RINALDO and DYSON changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Messrs. HEFTEL of Hawaii, WYDEN, WHITTEN and McCLOSKEY changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, I want the record to reflect that I voted "no" on H.R. 3128. Savings is not a question. The issue is whether or not the House and Senate agreement, which was reached in December, should have been met. It is my feeling that it should have been.

For example, the AFDC program called for a Work Fair Program which I think this country needs; it would have been a good start. There were other problems with the legislation, but I want the record to reflect that the issue is not savings, but one that we should have followed, as the House version of the agreement.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous material on the bill, H.R. 3128.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. DAUB. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do so for the purpose of using the request by the gentleman from Texas for unanimous consent, should I not have that opportunity later in this evening's proceedings, to inquire of any Member, particularly the chairman of the Budget Committee if he is in the Chamber, and or any other Member of the leadership as to why this House has decided to adjourn for 17 days and forget about the budget process, which under Gramm-Rudman requires us to act so that the Senate can act by April 15 on what we have as a common budget, as required by that act.

I will be happy to yield to anyone who can so answer the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Washington wish to respond?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the recess schedule, as the gentleman knows, has been announced for some time. It was planned that the schedule would take effect early next week. We have made the decision to postpone legislation relating to the Federal Firearms Act until the week that we return.

There is no scheduled business now from this point forward to what was the schedule at the beginning of the Easter recess week.

Under those circumstances, it is my intention to call up immediately the recess resolution.

Mr. DAUB. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do so to inquire again of the distinguished gentleman, does the gentleman know or have knowledge as to whether or not the House Budget Committee intends to meet at all next week in furtherance of the objective of being able to achieve a budget resolution in agreement with the other body by the 15th of April?

Mr. FOLEY. I have no knowledge of any scheduled meeting of the Budget Committee next week.

Mr. DAUB. Let me say, I will withdraw my objection to this particular request of the gentleman from Texas, with the intention of getting a vote on whether or not we adjourn.

Mr. FOLEY. The gentleman, of course, will be recognized for whatever parliamentary request or demand that the rules allow.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mrs. JOHNSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman, what then is the plan of the leadership to enable this House to pass a budget by our deadline in the bill that we just passed by April 15?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentlewoman will yield, we are recessed until the week of the 7th of April if the House agrees to the recess resolution. That will, of course, permit a week's time between that date and the date that the gentlewoman mentions.

Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I cannot hear what the gentleman is saying.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentlewoman will yield, I would answer that the resolution will provide for the House to stand adjourned until April 8, 1 week before the deadline of the 15th.

Mrs. JOHNSON. Can I have the word of the gentleman from Washington that then we will be able in that week to reserve the time that we need to pass a budget early in that week so that it can go to conference and be returned?

I believe it is of the utmost importance that this House meet its Gramm-Rudman deadline and pass a budget out of conference with final action by April 15. I believe that is extremely important to our credibility and to our ability to implement our responsibility under the Gramm-Rudman legislation.

Mr. FOLEY. That is our intention.

Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS A COSPONSOR OF H.R. 3800

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the gentleman from California [Mr. BATES] be removed as a cosponsor of H.R. 3800.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

REREFERRAL OF EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION 2686 AND H.R. 4144 TO COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS AND TRANSPORTATION AND COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Executive Communication 2686 and H.R. 4144, both referred to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, be referred jointly to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation and the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE FROM TUESDAY, MARCH 25, 1986, TO TUESDAY, APRIL 8, 1986, AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE FROM WEDNESDAY, MARCH 26, 1986, OR THURSDAY MARCH 27, 1986, TO TUESDAY, APRIL 8, 1986

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privilege concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 304) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 304

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the House adjourns on Tuesday, March 25, 1986, and that when the Senate adjourns on Wednesday, March 26, 1986, or on Thursday, March 27, 1986, pursuant to a motion made by the majority leader, or his designee, in accordance with this resolution, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Tuesday, April 8, 1986, or until 12 o'clock meridian on the second day after Members are notified to reassemble pursuant to section 2 of this concurrent resolution whichever occurs first.

SEC. 2. The Speaker of the House, after consultation with the minority leader of the House, and the majority leader of the Senate, acting jointly, shall notify the Members of the House and the Senate, respectively, to reassemble whenever, in their opinion, the public interest shall warrant it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the concurrent resolution.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the concurrent resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 170, nays 158, not voting 106, as follows:

□ 1950

Mr. RICHARDSON changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CORRECTING ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 3128, DEFICIT REDUCTION AMENDMENTS OF 1985

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 305), to make technical corrections in the enrollment of the bill H.R. 3128.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, but I think it is important to take a minute to explain to the House what these provisions are.

Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to adopt the technical changes at this time because adequate notice was not given for their inclusion when the House last passed H.R. 3128.

The changes have been agreed to by the majority and minority on the two committees of jurisdiction—the Committee on Education and Labor and the Committee on Ways and Means.

The changes are absolutely necessary to the proper administration of the ERISA title IV termination insurance program inasmuch as—

First, they include transition rules and other adjustments to ease burdens on employers and the PBGC which otherwise would arise from the January 1, 1986, effective date of the legislation—for example employers who have already filed notices of intent to terminate would have an opportunity to withdraw their notice, file for a distress termination, or fully fund their plan for vested benefits;

Second, they include a number of technical and clarifying changes recommended and considered necessary by the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation; and Third, they include corrections to spelling, punctuation, and cross-reference errors which could otherwise lead to confusion.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, these technical amendments have been chasing H.R. 3128 for a number of months, as it ricocheted between the House and the Senate with the Senate amendment and the House amendment to the Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate amendment. There has been no substantive argumentation; it is simply that politically this little 41-page book of technical amendments has not caught up with the reconciliation bill.

I would like to add, under the gentleman's reservation, Mr. Speaker, that the amendments which are contained in the reconciliation bill have no business being in there in the first place. They are substantive law which was added whimsically because somebody decided that H.R. 3128 was a convenient vehicle. Maybe tonight those people will be proved right.

The problem with them is while they attempt to shore up BBGC and the fund, they are inevitably going to cause pension plans not to be formed by new entrants. Inevitably through the years, this means less coverage for less individuals in the United States.

What went forward in H.R. 3128 was very unwise legislation. What follows here in this 41-page package is some necessary language to clean up some of the technical difficulties. It does not relieve the deep substantive difficulties of that legislation.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, this amendment has been cleared by OMB and is acceptable to the other body.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 305

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, in the enrollment of the bill (H.R. 3128) to make changes in spending and revenue provisions for purposes of deficit reduction and program improvement, consistent with the budget process, the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall make the following corrections:

(1) SECTION 11001.—In section 11001 of the bill, strike out "1985" and insert in lieu thereof "1986".

(2) SECTION 11002(c).—In section 11002(c) of the bill, strike out "Act" and insert in lieu thereof "title".

(3) SECTION 11004.—In section 11004 of the bill—

(A) in section 4001(a)(2)(B) of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (hereinafter in this resolution referred to as "ERISA"), as proposed to be amended, strike out "affiliated group" and all that follows and insert in lieu thereof "controlled group, and";

(B) in section 4001(a)(13)(A) of ERISA, as proposed to be added, insert ", in connection with such plan," after "responsible";

(E) AUTHORITY OF CORPORATION TO EXTEND 90-DAY PERIODS TO PERMIT STANDARD TERMINATION.—The Corporation may, on a case-by-case basis in accordance with subsection (c), provide for extensions of the applicable 90-day period referred to in clause (i) or (ii) of subparagraph (B) if it is demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Corporation that—

(i) the plan could not otherwise, pursuant to the preceding provisions of this paragraph, terminate in a termination treated as a standard termination under section 4041(b) of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (as amended by this title), and

(ii) the extension would result in a greater likelihood that benefit commitments under the plan would be paid in full, except that any such period may not be so extended beyond one year after the date of the enactment of this Act.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WORLD HEALTH WEEK AND WORLD HEALTH DAY

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 226), to designate the week of April 6, 1986, through April 12, 1986, as "World Health Week," and to designate April 7, 1986, as "World Health Day," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN. Under my reservation of objection, I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minority for its cooperation on this resolution.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, as the sponsor of House Joint Resolution 426, I rise in strong support of this resolution which would designate April 6 through 12, 1986, as "World Health Week" and April 7 as "World Health Day."

For 37 years, April 7 has been celebrated as "World Health Day." In observance of "World Health Day," communities throughout the world and across the Nation conduct health fairs, health education workshops, and other informational programs. These activities serve to focus public attention on the challenges we face in obtaining better health for all.

This year, the activities will run for 1 week. With "Healthy Living: Everyone a Winner" as its theme, "World Health Week 1986" will be an occasion to urge Americans to make a commitment to healthier lifestyles and to support global efforts to ensure health for all. This year's theme reminds us that we can improve our own health if we eat nutritious foods, exercise regularly, and if we don't abuse tobacco, alcohol or drugs. The theme also stresses the importance of combating malnutrition, the lack of clean water and sanitation and inadequate health care services in developing nations, in order to achieve the World Health Organization's goal of "Health for All by the Year 2000."

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 226

Whereas the health of a nation depends upon the health of its people;

Whereas improvement of the health of the people of our Nation contributes to world health, and world health contributes to the health of our Nation—a principle enunciated in the Constitution of the World Health Organization and accepted by the United States;

Whereas the United States is an active member of the World Health Organization and has both benefited from and contributed to the achievements of the Organization;

Whereas the countries of the world, acting through the World Health Organization, are committed to the goal of "Health for All by the Year 2000";

Whereas primary health care is recognized as a key to the attainment of "Health for All by the Year 2000";

Whereas health education and health awareness, prevention, and treatment of common diseases and illnesses, basic sanitation, and adequate nutrition are essential elements of primary health care;

Whereas the World Health Organization has established April 7 of each year as World Health Day to call attention to what individuals and governments can do to further the health of human beings everywhere, and the American Association of World Health has sponsored and assisted in this endeavor; and

Whereas it has been the custom for the President to call attention to World Health Day each year in the form of a public message: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of April 6, 1986, through April 12, 1986, is designated as "World Health Week" and April 7, 1986, is designated as "World Health Day" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

MAKING A REPAYABLE ADVANCE TO THE HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCE RESPONSE TRUST FUND

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a joint resolution (H.J. Res. 573) making a repayable advance to the Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

On my reservation, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for purposes of explaining the bill.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, over the past 6 months, the reauthorization of Superfund has been hotly debated on both sides of this Capitol. What this program needs is a good, long-term bill and an assured source of funds.

Up until this point, the Committee on Appropriations has strenuously opposed all efforts to provide short-term extensions, in order to keep maximum pressure to reach some sort of an agreement on Superfund reauthorization.

Mr. Speaker, we have reached the point of a crisis, and we have passed that point, and still there is no solution in sight. Unless something is done soon, national Superfund contractors responsible for the actual work will have to be terminated and their staffs will have to be laid off.

If that should happen, it will take many months, maybe 12 to 18 months, to put the program back on track. We cannot allow that to happen to the Superfund Program.

So this resolution simply provides, out of the $900 million already appropriated for Superfund in 1986, that $150 million will be available from a repayable advance from the general fund to the Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund.

These funds cannot be obligated after May 31, 1986. I understand that agreement has been reached by both sides and that the Committee on Ways and Means has no objection to it. Hopefully, they will be coming in with a solution to the tax problem.

My understanding is that the Committee on Energy and Commerce agrees to this. And CBO indicates that there are no additional outlays and no additional budget authority. The appropriation is already in place and this simply permits $150 million of that $900 million appropriated to be available now to continue this program.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize a couple of points to the House. First, this was adopted early this evening by the Committee on Appropriations by a voice vote. One addition, has been made to it, spelling out specifically the May 31st expiration date of the appropriation.

The other point that I think is very important is that there are no new obligations, no new budget authority in here, and no new outlays in here. This is all money that was in the HUD-independent agencies 1986 appropriation bill that has been adopted.

The only problem has been the hangup in the conference in the authorizing legislation. This emergency legislation will allow the program to keep going without contractors having to be terminated, and without the whole program collapsing. This will keep us going for 2 months while the conferees try to resolve their differences.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Continuing my reservation, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. FRENZEL. May I ask the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts: The resolution merely provides for borrowing; it does not provide for any particular rate of taxation?

Mr. BOLAND. The gentleman is absolutely correct. It provides an advance from the general fund and that will be repaid to the general fund when the money is available through the taxing process.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for his explanation, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKART] for yielding.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE].

Mr. ROE. Just for the Members of the body, the Committee on Public Works, Representative HOWARD and myself, we support this action because it has to be done at this point.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Under my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I want to clear up a technical point. The unanimous consent was for consideration only? The question will be put on the resolution, is that correct?

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. It is my understanding that the question is consideration, and not passage.

The gentleman would have to proffer that question to the Speaker.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, the unanimous-consent request is for consideration, and the question will be put?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Under my reservation, I am happy to yield to my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKART] and the gentleman from New Jersey and everyone else involved in this, including the members of the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

This is a very serious problem with the Environmental Protection Agency. We completed 2 days of hearings yesterday with the EPA, and Lee Thomas, who in my judgment is probably one of the finest administrators that has ever been appointed, indicated to us the seriousness of the problem. He believes in a long-term solution. However, that is not possible within the timeframe within which these committees have been operating. So a short-term solution is the only solution to resolving the problems facing EPA today.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Last, Mr. Speaker, continuing my reservation, I understand there are no language or substantive provisions in this bill?

Mr. BOLAND. That is correct.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. I understand that there are no future encumbrances in this bill.

Mr. BOLAND. There are no future encumbrances.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. And that it can in no way be used for repayments or advances.

Mr. BOLAND. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation objection, and urge adoption of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 573

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That language under the heading Environmental Protection Agency, "Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund" in Public Law 99-160 is amended by deleting "as amended, including sections 111(c)(3), (c)(5), (c)(6), and (e)(4) (42 U.S.C. 9611), $900,000,000, to be derived from the Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund," and inserting in lieu thereof "including sections 111(c)(3), (c)(5), (c)(6), and (e)(4) (42 U.S.C. 9611), $900,000,000, of which $750,000,000 shall be derived from the Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund and $150,000,000 shall be derived from an advance from the general fund of the Treasury to the Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund to be repaid in accordance with section 223(c)(3) of Public Law 96-510 and notwithstanding section 223(c)(2)(D) of Public Law 96-510, Provided, That none of the $150,000,000 shall be available for obligation after May 31, 1986,".

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JAMES WILDER DAY

(Mr. EMERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, everybody loves a hometown boy who has made good. I am pleased to share with you today the success story of one young man from a community in my district in southeast Missouri.

In 1976, James Wilder was a senior at Sikeston Senior High School, where he thrilled football fans with his talents as a member of the Sikeston Bulldog football team. During his high school career, James distinguished himself as a member of the all-conference team, and as an honorable mention member of the Missouri All-State Team. In his senior year he broke the Sikeston Bulldog regular season rushing record by gaining 1,292 yards.

Following high school, James attended the University of Missouri at Columbia, where he again displayed his talents on the football field. Each Saturday afternoon during the football season, James Wilder thrilled Mizzou football fans as a star attraction of the Tiger squad. By the time his senior year was completed, James had broken the university's rushing record and was selected as the most valuable player in the 1978 Liberty Bowl.

James now makes his hometown proud as a running back with the Tampa Bay Buccaneers. He has been called the NFL's best kept secret. He is a star on the national horizon, but he has never forgotten his roots. James visits his hometown with regularity and has sponsored a softball team for young people—offering them the chance to participate in community sports, just as he did as a youngster.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to share the success of this outstanding young man with my colleagues, and to announce that Thursday, April 3, 1986, has been proclaimed "James Wilder Day" in the city of Sikeston; and on that evening he will be presented with the annual Man of the Year Award by the Sikeston Chamber of Commerce. In addition, for the first time in history, the Sikeston Public Schools will be retiring a jersey number—James Wilder's number 29.

The city of Sikeston and, indeed, all of southeast Missouri, are proud of this favorite son and are delighted to be honoring this hero. He is an inspiration to all young men and women in our area—proving that hard work, diligence in purpose, and dedication to the task have their reward in success and achievement.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER TO ACCEPT RESIGNATIONS, AND APPOINT COMMISSIONS, BOARDS, AND COMMITTEES AUTHORIZED BY LAW OR BY THE HOUSE, NOTWITHSTANDING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding any adjournment of the House until Tuesday, April 8, 1986, the Speaker be authorized to accept resignations, and to appoint commissions, boards, and committees authorized by law or by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 3, 1986

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday, April 9, 1986, may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

THE HOUSE TURNS ITS BACK ON THE NICARAGUAN CRISIS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Today was a very disappointing day Mr. Speaker, for many of us who have worked very hard and diligently in the area of foreign affairs to deal with the crisis in Central America.

We have felt for some time that that situation needed to be addressed, but unfortunately the House saw fit today, by about a 12-vote margin, to turn their back on that crisis and let it continue to fester.

My concern, Mr. Speaker, is that the problem is going to get considerably worse before it gets better.

□ 2010

We have had a number of days of debate on this floor and a lot of misinformation has been presented to the American people. I would like to try to set some of that straight tonight before I go home. I do not think I could sleep well if I felt that the American people had been misled and did not know the facts.

So I want to make a few points before we depart on our recess with a lot of unfinished business yet to be done.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague from California.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join the gentleman from Indiana in this special order because post mortems sometimes are very valuable things.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate you for bringing down the gavel and asking the demonstration to stop on your side of the aisle when the President's resolution was rebuffed.

Given the number of speeches on this House floor that we were dealing with hard-core Communists in Managua who were dealing in terror, persecuting the church, building prisons, and that is the only thing they are building down there and filling them with 11,000 political prisoners; suppressing labor unions. Not everybody around here cares about the private sector but that seemed to be what crippled Cuba was when the private sector all fled. There are some heroes trying to remain down there. They have had their property expropriated, several of them just since VIN WEBER and I met with them.

After talking about how horrible all the situation was down there, just trying to go for a little different direction and then have all this cheering on the other side I thought was in the poorest taste. And I appreciate you, Mr. Speaker, bringing down the gavel and demanding that there be no demonstration on your side of the aisle.

So let us proceed with a constructive post mortem here. I have things I want to get off my chest too.

I thank the gentlemen for taking this time out.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. CRANE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Unfortunately I was unable to secure time to participate in the debate that we had yesterday and this morning on this issue, notwithstanding the 10 hours allocated for the entire debate.

But there are some things that I want to get off my chest, too, and I am grateful for the gentleman having this opportunity to deliver the post mortem, as our colleague from California described it.

The thing that disturbed me about this whole debate is I do not think there is any dispute on either side of this question about the nature of the government that exists in Nicaragua. We all know it is totalitarian, we all know it has defiled the concept of free democratic elections; we all know it does violence to religious worship; we all know it does violence to freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly. We all know it violates all of the traditional norms that we consider proper with respect to judicial institutions.

Now all of those ideals were principles that the Sandinista movement committed itself to in 1979 when the United States joined with the other members of the Organization of American States in an effort to derecognize the dictatorial Somoza Government, to anticipate the fulfillment of the real Sandinista movement which was to guarantee all of these principles. In short we joined in the overthrow of a government that did violence to all those principles because we had a revolutionary force committed to those ideals.

The sad reality was that the real Contra movement was Communist within that true democratic reform revolutionary movement. The real counterrevolutionaries are the people who sit in control of the Government of Nicaragua today who violated every one of the solemn commitments made to the United States and every other country that was a participant in the Organization of American States toward the realization of those goals. I think it is important now for us to look at the situation in the stark light of what transpired here on the floor and to call upon our own administration to urge those members of the Organization of American States that joined with us in 1979 and derecognize that Government that exists in Nicaragua and to re-recognize the true Sandinista movement represented by the freedom fighters and ultimately work toward the end of the tyranny that exists down there that is a threat to their neighbors and is, in fact, a threat to the Western Hemisphere.

The revolution is still alive, but the revolution is represented by the freedom fighters who do indeed believe in freedom, not by the Communists who subverted that, and for us to continue to maintain recognition of that iniquitous regime to me is working at cross-purposes with everything we tried to wage the fight for in the debates that went on yesterday and today.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for his very valuable contribution.

I think what I would like to start off with—and I will try not to take too much time because I know the people at the front desk are tired, it has been a long 3 or 4 days—but the people of the United States, the people in the Congress I think should know that Mr. Ortega, who went to Moscow shortly after the vote last year for $17 million in humanitarian aid and because of his trip to Moscow changed a lot of minds on the other side of the aisle and we were able to get $27 million in humanitarian aid; Mr. Ortega this year did not go to Moscow but went to Havana instead. He addressed the Third Cuban Communist Party Congress in Havana on February 6. Instead of making the terrible mistake that he made last year he sent Bayardo Arce to the Communist Congress in Moscow during the same period of time so that they could be together with their comrades-in-arms who were working to make sure that they have worldwide revolution.

But that did not upset my colleagues on the other side of the aisle this time because today they manifested their support or at least their nonopposition to that Communist regime by voting against military aid for the freedom fighters who are fighting so valiantly for the recapture of their revolution in Nicaragua.

I will be submitting some items for the RECORD, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make that point very clear, they did go to both the Cuban Communist Congress and the Moscow Communist Congress to express their support and allegiance to the puppets from Cuba and to the big brothers in Moscow as far as their mutual goals are concerned, those being worldwide domination and worldwide revolution.

Now last night one of my colleagues and I engaged in a debate about the problem of disinformation, Communist disinformation getting to the American people via the media here in the United States. I was told by my colleague that some of the things I raised, some of the issues I raised were drivel and that they should not be brought to the attention of the American people the way we did and that if I had not been doing it here on the floor of Congress, if I had been doing it in any other forum, I would probably be dragged into a court of law and sued for libel because I was accusing a law firm here in Washington, DC, of being tools or puppets of the Communist Sandinista government.

So today I wrote a letter to my colleague who made those allegations last night and I would like to read this letter into the RECORD for the benefit of my colleagues and for the people who may be paying attention to this debate:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, March 20, 1986.

DEAR PETE: Regarding the debate last night, it is not really in dispute that many of the human rights groups, such as WOLA, have become "shills for the Sandinistas" (that's what Bruce Cameron, former lobbyist for the ADA calls them). For example, two former WOLA associates, Kay Stubbs and Sophia Clark, are now working for the Nicaraguan foreign ministry in Managua (you can call the Nicaraguan embassy to verify this). None of these organizations has ever, to my knowledge, issued a report on human rights in Cuba.

The enclosed articles, from the Wall Street Journal and The New Republic outline the allegations we discussed regarding last year's WOLA report.

I also recommend the enclosed report on high-ranking Sandinista defector, Alvaro Baldizon. You may choose not to believe what he says, but you should at least review the report and judge it for yourself. You may want to take into account the fact that he has every incentive not to speak out against the Sandinistas, given that they are now holding his wife and family captive.

Sincerely,

DAN BURTON.

P.S.—This is not drivel.

Now Mr. Baldizon, who was a lieutenant for Tomas Borge, escaped to freedom and came to the United States and told about the atrocities that had been taking place at the hands of the Communist Sandinista government which my colleagues on the left of this body have chosen to ignore. I would like to read an excerpt of an article by Fred Barnes regarding Mr. Baldizon, talking about Tomas Borge, one of the nine comandantes in the Communist Party down there:

Borge personally ordered some killings and whitewashed others, Baldizon said. In 1981 Borge allegedly standardized the practice of murdering political foes by issuing a secret order allowing "special measures," the euphemism for assassinations. He institutionalized the deception of visiting foreigners, appearing before Christian groups in an office with a crucifix, a statue of Jesus Christ, and a Bible. His real office is adorned with pictures of Marx, Engels, and Lenin, and copies of The Communist Manifesto and Das Kapital. Moreover, Borge was involved in cocaine trafficking, put former criminals in police jobs, and installed Cuban advisers in operational posts.

Now remember, Baldizon was one of Borge's lieutenants.

Now this is fact, this is fact that has been given by a chief lieutenant who defected to the United States remarks last night drivel, I hope he reads this article. Also I sent to him an article from the Wall Street Journal regarding the Washington Office on Latin America's published reports regarding human rights violations in Nicaragua at the hands of the freedom fighters, the Contras. In this article it says that the law firm of Reichler & Applebaum received, not $350,000 as I stated last night, I made a mistake, but $320,000 in legal fees from the Communist Sandinista government last year.

Reichler & Applebaum sent Reed Brody—and I will give the name tonight—a 31-year-old lawyer, and Jim Bordeloin, a law school student, who were selected to conduct an objective investigation. They spent 4 months in Nicaragua taking statements from witnesses of resistance-force atrocities, all with the full cooperation of the Communist Sandinistas. Mr. Brody confirms that most of the investigators' in-country transportation, boarding, housing, office space, staff, and one can assume the witnesses themselves were provided compliments of their Marxist Communist hosts and sympathizers in Managua.

This report was paid for lock, stock, and barrel, and I mean lock, stock, and barrel, by the Communist Sandinista government. But that was not enough. When they came back to publish the report the law firm of Reichler & Applebaum decided they wanted to distance themselves from this report so they sent a second team down there.

The second team was headed by a man named Mr. Fox. Let me give you his exact name here, Donald Fox, a New York city-based international human rights lawyer activist. Mr. Fox went down there and he confirmed later that his wife was a Nicaraguan-born lady who has two brothers and both of her brothers are members of the Communist Sandinista foreign ministry. He went down there, studied the report and the allegations made by the first committee that went down there and verified the first report. Obviously he would do that; his wife was in sympathy with the Communist government in Nicaragua, her two brothers are members of the Communist Sandinista government, the first report was paid for by the Communist Sandinista government and they came back and it was published by the Washington Office of Latin American Affairs. Mr. GEJDENSON, a member of the Democratic majority on the other side of the aisle, held a news conference along with some other Members, I understand, along with the members of the Washington Office on Latin American Affairs, and NBC, CBS, ABC, CNN, all the major networks were there and they all swallowed this Communist disinformation report hook, line, and sinker. And it went across the airwaves of this country to the American people as fact.

Now that is why the American people are confused about this issue. They do not know who to believe. Communist disinformation is publicized across the airwaves as fact and they have to listen to it.

After they listen to it they say well, who is right, who is wrong, is it the left or is it the right down there? Is it the Communists, the bad guys, or the freedom fighters? And because of this confusion today many of my colleagues I think were led down the primrose path and voted against aid to the freedom fighters.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. DICKS. I did not quite understand the gentleman. Is the gentleman suggesting that the Congressman from Connecticut [Mr. GEJDENSON] was involved in a disinformation campaign? Is the gentleman suggesting that he was exploited by the Communist? Is that what the gentleman is saying here before the House of Representatives?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I will be very happy to state it very clearly and concisely for my friend.

What I am saying is that the report was paid for by the Communist Sandinista government, not the report but the transportation and all the people who went down there. In fact I will quote the article, referring to a Wall Street Journal article that was on the editorial page written by Mr. Jim Denton.

□ 2015

Let me read it to you once again so you will have it straight:

> Reed Brody, a 31-year-old lawyer, and Jim Bordeloin, a law-school student, were selected to conduct the "objective investigation." They spent four months in Nicaragua taking statements from witnesses of resistance-force atrocities, all with the full cooperation of the Sandinistas. Mr. Brody confirms that most of the investigators' in-country transportation, boarding, housing, office space, staff and, one can assume the witnesses themselves, were provided compliments of their Marxist hosts and sympathizers in Managua.

This report was commissioned by the law firm of Reichler & Applebaum. They sent the people down there to do the report in the first place. Reichler & Applebaum received $320,000 in legal fees from the Communist Sandinista government last year.

The gentleman just walked in, so I will go through this one more time.

The report was then verified by a second group that went down headed by a gentleman named Donald Fox, a New York City based international human rights lawyer activist. Mr. Fox is married to a lady from Nicaragua who has two brothers in the Communist Sandinista Foreign Ministry. He verified the first report, which was done at the behest of the law firm of Reichler & Applebaum. When they came back, this report was published by the Washington Office on Latin American Affairs. There was a news conference here on Capitol Hill, and Mr. GEJDENSON was a participant. Whether he knew or did not know this was done at the behest of the law firm of Reichler & Applebaum, I do not know.

But what I am saying is that Members of the Congress, in my view, have been duped into believing that human rights violations have been perpetrated upon the people of Nicaragua by the freedom fighters down there, when much of that has been Communist disinformation, paid for by the Communist Sandinista government and sold to the American people lock, stock and barrel by a duped media.

Mr. DICKS. Well, I think the gentleman has to be a little careful, in my own judgment, when the gentleman starts suggesting that Members of Congress, who have a whole variety of sources of information and have maybe read a report and agree with its consequences and the substance of it, have been duped. I think that phrase is very pejorative.

I am a little surprised the gentleman, who I have a great deal of respect for, would enter into that kind of a diatribe just because today the House of Representatives voted. We had a vote here. We have a democratic process.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I brought this issue up many times. This is not the first. Nobody has refuted it.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

I want to say this to my good friend, with whom I helped found the military reform caucus and for whom I have the deepest respect. Nothing pains me more than the fact that for many Members in this body, if a Wall Street Journal article is being read by one Member which suggests—let us get it out in the open—which suggests that one of our good friends may well have been taken in. That is certainly what the article suggests. Nothing pains me more than to have it said that the gentleman from Indiana, who was reporting that our good friend may well in fact have been deceived, that it was the gentleman from Indiana who was first challenged, whereas in fact I think we would want to say to our good friend from Connecticut, what are the lessons all of us should learn about Soviet disinformation if, in fact, you are taken in.

Mr. DICKS. I happen to know the gentleman from Connecticut. He is a very bright, able Member of this body. I am certain that he has looked at this issue like all of us have. We read lots of reports. We get in lots of different debates about it.

The people here, I think, have a right to make their judgments.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. If I may reclaim my time, this was brought up the first time at a Foreign Affairs Committee meeting in which Mr. GEJDENSON was in attendance. Now, he knows about this report and he knows that we challenged the report, because Reichler & Applebaum received this legal retainer of $320,000 from the Communist Sandinista government, and they requested the study be done in the first place. and sent the group down there the first time.

So he is not unaware of this, and he has never come to the floor to challenge these remarks. I would be happy to talk with him about them.

Mr. GINGRICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. GINGRICH. I just want to carry this a step further.

I am not suggesting that any Member who voted no is necessarily being duped or anything else. That is not what I am saying. I want to make that very clear.

I am saying unequivocally there is clearly Soviet, Cuban, and Nicaraguan disinformation out there.

Mr. DICKS. I want to say to my distinguished friend that I agree with him.

Mr. GINGRICH. OK.

Mr. DICKS. There has certainly been a campaign conducted to influence public opinion in the United States. As the gentleman from Georgia well knows, the United States does the same thing all over the world on behalf of the things we believe in.

Mr. GINGRICH. In free countries where we can.

Mr. DICKS. I am not so sure it is just there. But I think the gentleman understands that we have a vigorous approach to presenting our viewpoint around the world with U.S. Government funds being involved.

Mr. GINGRICH. I ask the gentleman, does it not disturb the gentleman a little bit if a proposal is issued as supposedly being a human rights proposal, if in fact the Communist government has paid $320,000 to have a law firm to have the proposal written?

Mr. DICKS. All I am saying is I think we ought to be careful.

I think there is one thing we learned from this debate that we have just been through. I really do not think it is productive to start saying the press has been duped and Members have been duped.

Mr. GINGRICH. What if it has been?

Mr. DICKS. I really do not think that is the case.

Mr. GINGRICH. You do not think it is ever the case?

Mr. DICKS. There could be one report. There could be one situation. But Members have had a chance to debate this issue for 4 years.

Mr. GINGRICH. That is not the issue. The gentleman is missing the point we are trying to make, I think.

The question I am asking the gentleman is: What if there is a serious systematic disinformation effort? What if the Communist governments pay a significant amount of money to pay lobbyists? What if, in fact, they set up front groups? What if, in fact, in some cases, they work closely with specialists in the United States to figure out how to frame the Communist argument in the United States. Should that not be a matter of public record and should we not be aware of it?

Mr. DICKS. I agree with that. I do not have any problem with the gentlemen presenting their concerns about a disinformation campaign that has been presented by the Sandinistas and the Soviet Government. I do not have any problem with that.

What I am worried about—and I admit that I just heard part of the gentleman's presentation, and I wish I had heard all of his presentation—but when I hear the words "duped" and "misled" or that the Members of Congress——

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Let me just interrupt.

Last night I brought this issue up on the floor before the debate. One of my colleagues stood up and said that everything we were saying was dribble and there was no documentation to back up what we were saying. So tonight I came down here with a specific purpose, among other things, to point out that there was fact and a firm basis for us saying what we said last night.

Now, this article has not been refuted by anybody. Nobody sued the paper for slander, and nobody has taken me on that was involved in that report on the floor of the House.

Mr. DICKS. All I am suggesting to my good friend is that when you use the word "duped," I do not think the Members around here are duped.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DICKS. I think they study these issues carefully. And I think they make a judgment based on the evidence, and sometimes you do not agree. But I do not think they are being duped.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Let me just say one thing.

If a person believes a report to be fact, and it is in fact Communist disinformation, if it is not being duped, tell me what it is.

Mr. DICKS. I think Members may read 1 report and they may read 50 other reports.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. What is it if it is not duped?

Mr. DICKS. But what the gentleman is suggesting is Mr. GEJDENSON made up his mind on this issue based on this report. I do not think that is how any Member makes up his mind.

Mr. BURTON. He made it in a news conference that cited this report as fact. If that is not being duped, American people were watching and there he was giving lending his credentials to the report.

I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GINGRICH. I just want to read a paragraph here. This is from the Wall Street Journal:

> The Brody document made its way into the public and congressional debate with a splash. The media fallout included articles in the Washington Post and the New York Times, and network coverage, including about 2½ minutes on the CBS Evening News. None of these accounts seriously challenged the report's origins or handling, ignoring or playing down the Sandinista sponsorship to the point that it was virtually unrecognizable to the audience.
> The overall impact of the press accounts and congressional responses served the purposes of a Marxist regime to distort the U.S. public and Congress' understanding of the human-rights saga in Nicaragua—all of which will continue to shape U.S. policy in that war torn country.

All I am saying to the gentleman from Washington State is that I am puzzled by the fact that—let us place it to one side. The gentleman from Connecticut who is not here and is a bright and a lively Member, and who I am sure would do a great job of explaining his position.

Mr. DICKS. I think he is a patriot.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think he is a patriot, too. We are all patriots. That is not the issue.

The issue is whether patriots dealing with a highly sophisticated foreign government which is systematically trying to manipulate the American system.

The gentleman does not seem to buy that. But I think that a Communist regime spending $300,000 on a law firm is not stupid.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. If I may reclaim my time, I only have 5 minutes left and I want to make a couple of other points.

I do want to say this. The Soviet Union has a whole department in Moscow that is devoted entirely to disinformation.

□ 2035

And is it any wonder that they would be exporting revolution and, right along with it, the experts who know how to utilize disinformation? If you think that that puppet regime down there in Nicaragua is not following the Moscow line and the Cuban line right down the pike, then you are very misguided. And the thing that concerns me is if they are masters of disinformation——

Mr. DICKS. If the gentleman will yield for one statement, I just think we ought to be careful about using the phrase "duped."

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. If they are masters of disinformation, then why in the world would they not be using disinformation tactics in Managua? Which they are, and this report verifies it.

Now, I just want to make a couple other points before I run out of time. I have just about 5 minutes left.

General Lopez, a Cuban war hero, a Communist, Gen. Nestor Lopez, who was involved in the war against Israel, who fought in the Yom Kippur war against Israel on the side of the Syrians in 1973, who later fought in Angola, on the side of the Communists in Angola, who fought against Batista when Castro came to power, now that Cuban general is down in Managua, Nicaragua, helping lead the Communist forces against the freedom fighters, helping lead the 3,000 Cubans who are down there, who are flying the Communist Hind helicopters, the Soviet Hind helicopters.

So not only are there human rights distortions, disinformation, coming into the United States of America, but the Cubans and the Communists are sending men down there, generals and support troops, to augment the Communist Sandinista government in their quest to eradicate the freedom fighters in Nicaragua, to squash them once and for all.

But one of the things that bothers me the most is something that I brought up time and time again, and that is what they are teaching the children in Nicaragua. The first thing the Communists do when they take over a country is send in the teachers. They sent into Nicaragua about 300 to 600 teachers as soon as they took power. Our last commanding general in Vietnam, General Weyand, when asked why the Communists kept coming after losing a million men, why did the Communists and North Vietnamese keep coming, they lost 1 million men, we lost about 110,000 the reason was, he said, because of elderly ideological indoctrination. For instance, the children were taught to add and subtract by saying, "If there are 10 imperialists and 5 are killed, how many will be left?" That was taught in the textbooks.

Here is a copy of a textbook I got in Managua, Nicaragua, a first-grade mathematics text. And here is how they are teaching their children to add: two AK-47 rifles plus two AK-47 machineguns plus two machineguns are six machineguns. Three handgrenades plus three handgrenades are six handgrenades.

These children, like the Communist Vietnamese, are going to be zealots in the not-too-distant future, and if the freedom fighters down there are not allowed to fight them and to at least force them to the conference table and negotiate a free democracy, then they are going to have their way not only in Nicaragua but throughout Central America. And our children are going to have these zealots on the battlefield. They have alreay had 7 years to indoctrinate these children, and it is going to get worse.

I just want to end up by saying that my colleagues on the other side of the aisle, many of them, after the vote today, said, "Well, we may come back next month with another version, something that will be workable, something that we can support."

There are those of us on this side of the aisle who feel like if they come back with a watered-down version that is not going to give enough help to those people down there, we will not be able to support it.

We either should give enough help or none at all. To give false hope to protect the political fortunes of my friends on the left here in Congress, would be unforgivable, and I think that many of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle think that we will come back and just give a drop here and a drop there and that will pacify the American people. The American people are not going to be duped, they are not going to be fooled for very long. If the Communist Sandinistas are successful in crushing the freedom fighters, as they very well may do because the freedom fighters will not be getting any aid from us, at least not in the foreseeable future, if they crush those people down there, then they are going to solidify their position in Nicaragua, the exportation of the revolution will increase, make no mistake about it.

I saw the weapons in El Salvador that came through Nicaragua, and I talked to a captured Communist guerrilla who told me where the weapons came from, from Managua. The exportation of revolution will increase, and then, my friends, El Salvador will be in danger of falling and may fall, Guatemala, Honduras and then we are going to be up into Mexico, and our boys are going to be involved in a war that is unnecessary. And I say to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle who voted against helping those freedom fighters today that the responsibility will be at your feet, at your feet.

CONTRA ATROCITIES, OR A COVERT PROPAGANDA WAR?

A LOBBYING DRIVE BEGAN IN MANAGUA

(By Jim Denton)

The likely congressional defeat of President Reagan's proposal to provide military aid to the anti-Sandinista contra forces comes in the wake of an extraordinary lobbying campaign. The struggle for the hearts and minds of Congress has mobilized a handful of partisans who have been enormously effective in distorting the Nicaraguan human-rights story. Although it is not uncommon for foreign governments to try persuasion on Capitol Hill, the manner and degree to which the Sandinistas have manipulated public and congressional opinion is noteworthy.

A review of the origins, the dubious handling and the reception of a report recently released by Rep. Samuel Gejdenson (D., Conn.), and two putative human-rights groups provides a case study of how Sandinista propaganda is legitimized and makes its way into the public debate and, ultimately, congressional policy.

The Washington, D.C., law firm of Reichler & Applebaum is the Nicaraguan government's official registered agent in the U.S. For its services, the firm is paid an annual rate of about $320,000. From all outside appearances the firm has ably represented its client. An accounting of the lobbyists' appointments with legislators and staff reads like a Who's Who among Senate and House liberals.

But Reichler & Applebaum's lobbying efforts on the Sandinistas' behalf have gone beyond the congressional routine. In an interview, Mr. Reichler confirmed that some months ago he originated and orchestrated a plan to send a team of "professional attorneys to Nicaragua to conduct an objective, independent investigation of contra atrocities."

Reed Brody, a 31-year-old lawyer, and Jim Bordeloin, a law-school student, were selected to conduct the "objective investigation." They spent four months in Nicaragua taking statements from witnesses of resistance-force atrocities, all with the full cooperation of the Sandinistas. Mr. Brody confirms that most of the investigators' in-country transportation, boarding, housing, office space, staff and, one can assume, the witnesses themselves, were provided compliments of their Marxist host and sympathizers in Managua.

Upon completion of the "investigation," the 141-page Brody Report, consisting of nearly 150 sworn affidavits from "witnesses," was duly processed back through the Sandinistas' lobbyists at Reichler & Applebaum. There it was prepared in final form and, according to a report submitted to the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, passed to the Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA), the International Human Rights Law Group and Rep. Gejdenson for public dissemination.

These three parties all have their individual biases. WOLA, for example, has been a particularly prolific and harsh critic of the human-rights records of Latin American governments friendly to the U.S., as well as the contras, and sympathetic to the Sandinistas and other Marxist insurgents in the region. In reviewing WOLA reports, articles and studies, no serious or critical account of Fidel Castro's human-rights record in Cuba could be found. It is also worth noting, in weighing the group's objectivity, that two former WOLA employees are now employed by the Nicaraguan Foreign Ministry.

Apparently recognizing that a hasty embrace of the Sandinista-sponsored Brody report might be viewed with skepticism. Rep. Gejdenson, WOLA and the Law Group assembled a second delegation to verify the Brody findings. This second delegation consisted of Michael Glennon, former chief counsel to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee under the chairmanship of Frank Church; Donald Fox, a New York City-based international human-rights lawyer-activist; Valerie Miller, the delegation's interpreter, who lived in post-revolutionary Nicaragua for two years and wrote a book on the Sandinista literacy campaign; and, as an observer, a staff aide to Rep. Gejdenson. Mr. Fox confirmed that his Nicaraguan-born wife, now a U.S. citizen, Ana Clemenzia Tercero, accompanied the group to Managua to visit family members at WOLA's expense. Ms. Tercero's brother is a high-ranking official in the Nicaraguan Foreign Ministry assigned to Rome. This group uncovered no discrepancies in the Brody findings after having corroborated only 10 of the nearly 150 Brody affidavits during its one-week visit to Nicaragua.

Then, on March 7, in releasing the Sandinista-sponsored Brody Report, Rep. Gejdenson, WOLA and the Law Group called for a congressional investigation into contra atrocities before a packed press conference on Capitol Hill. Mr. Gejdenson stated he was forwarding the report to Rep. Lee Hamilton (D., Ind.), chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, and Rep. Michael Barnes (D., Md.), chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, of which Mr. Gejden-son is a member. In their prepared press statements, Mr. Gejdenson, WOLA and the Law Group did not mention the Sandinistas' role in originating and facilitating the Brody Report.

Last week the House Western Hemisphere Affairs Subcommittee held several days of hearings on aid to the contras. At Thursday's session, at the request of Mr. Gejdenson, Mr. Brody testified before the committee and had his report entered into the Congressonal Record. Mr. Fox also testified, embracing the Brody report. And, apparently in order to gain some distance from the Sandinista-inspired document. Mr. Fox submitted a second report written by himself, Mr. Glennon, the Law Group and WOLA. The findings of this report substantiated and reinforced the Brody report.

The Brody document made its way into the public and congressional debate with a splash. The media fallout included articles in the Washington Post and the New York Times, and network coverage, including about 2½ minutes on the CBS Evening News. None of these accounts seriously challenged the report's origins or handling, ignoring or playing down the Sandinista sponsorship to the point that it was virtually unrecognizable to the audience.

The overall impact of the press accounts and congressional responses served the purposes of a Marxist regime to distort the U.S. public and Congress' understanding of the human-rights saga in Nicaragua—all of which will continue to shape U.S. policy in that war-torn country.

(Mr. Denton is executive director of the National Forum Foundation, a public-policy group in Washington.)

Daniel Ortega at the Cuban Party Congress

To reaffirm publicly the Sandinistas' solidarity with Fidel Castro and the Cuban Revolution, President Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua made a special point to attend the Third Party Congress of the Cuban Communist Party February 4–7, 1986

Ortega was only one of two chiefs of state to participate in the congress (the other being the President of Guinea Bissau).

Indicative of his priorities, by attending he snubbed an important delegation of Western leaders representing the Socialist International who were visiting Managua.

He competed at the podium in anti-U.S. rhetoric with representatives from the Soviet bloc and from communist parties of such countries as Angola, Ethiopia, and Afghanistan.

Ortega also rubbed shoulders with representatives of such political terrorist groups as the Argentine Mononeros, the Chilean "Manuel Rodriguez" Patriotic Front, and the Colombian M-19.

In his speech, Ortega characterized Nicaragua's relations with Cuba as "unalterable, non-negotiable and sealed with the blood of Cuban internationalists fallen on Nicaraguan soil . . ."

He also praised Cuba as "a symbol of dignity, resistance, and combativeness in Latin America." He closed his remarks by declaring, "Long live Cuba and Nicaragua, united they will overcome!"

In reciprocation for Ortega's expression of loyalty, Cuban Politburo member Jorge Risquet responded, "In the future, as now, we will share our bread, our knowledge and our blood with the heroic people of Sandino's homeland."

Fidel Castro asserted that not only the Salvadoran guerrillas (statement by Salvadoran Communist leader Shafik Handal) but "all the Central American revolutionaries" would unite to defend the Sandinistas.

Ortega returned to Havana March 2, 1986, for what a Nicaraguan Government communique characterized as a "private" stay of 10 days, after dispatching another of the Comandantes, Bayardo Arce, to Moscow to attend the Soviet Communist Party Congress. Arce is chief ideologue of the Sandinista Party.

(Excerpts of Ortega's speech in Havana are attached.)

Speech by Commander of the Revolution Daniel Ortega, President of Nicaragua and Coordinator of the FSLN Executive Committee, Third Cuban Communist Party Congress, Havana, February 6, 1986

Esteemed Comrade Fidel Castro, comrade delegates and guests: I bring greetings from the FSLN militants to the militants of the CCP who are today holding their Third CCP Congress. We are bringing a fraternal message from Sandino's heroic people to Marti's heroic people . . .

Cuba is an example of a people's determination when they decide to be free in the face of the terrorist actions of Yankee imperialism. To speak of Cuba is to speak of the heroic resistance against the invasion in Giron. It is to speak of the people's firmness in the face of the criminal blockade. It is to speak of the internationalism of thousands of Cubans who have given their blood and sweat in favor of sister peoples . . .

In the report presented yesterday, we have learned of the tasks undertaken by the workers, peasants, youths, women, soldiers, technicians, professionals, and party militants. The balance is positive, with a stronger revolution and with a more developed party, above all, marching with open eyes to avoid the obstacles that are in its path. We have learned in the report about the just and dignified positions that Cuba has upheld in the international field of defense of sovereignty, the self-determination of peoples, and peace. We were especially moved by the generosity of its heroic people who despite their limitations, struggles, and sacrifices, give their best and share their blood and bread with sister peoples who defend their freedom and independence in various regions of the world.

In Nicaragua, we are witnesses of the internationalist disposition of the Cuban people. Ever since the struggle against the Somozist dictatorship, the blood of Cuban revolutionaries has mixed in Nicaraguan soil with the blood of Nicaraguan revolutionaries. In these past years, the blood of Cuban internationalists who were providing their cooperation in various specialties has again been shed in Nicaraguan soil, victims once again of the imperialist policy that assassinated Sandino, Che, and Allende, and that procreated Batista, Somoza, Duvalier, and Pinochet . . .

Our relations with Cuba are friendly, fraternal, and respectful. They are relations that are unalterable and nonnegotiable. They are relations sealed with the blood of Cuban internationalists who have fallen on Nicaraguan soil . . .

They (the United States) are trying to justify their terrorist policy towards Nicaragua by accusing our homeland of being the sanctuary of the Salvadoran revolutionaries. We all know perfectly well that as long as there is injustice, exploitation, and lack of freedom, there will be revolutions and that if in El Salvador there is a revolutionary struggle it is because there has been a lack of justice and democracy and because the Salvadoran people have not been respected.

This Third Congress is taking place when the threats of the nuclear hecatomb are being brandished by the U.S. rulers in a policy of universal blackmail that is rejected by the peoples of the world. One can no longer deny the extraordinary efforts that the Soviet Union carries out in favor of peace . . .

To defend Nicaragua's right to self-determination and peace in Central America means to defend the right to self-determination of Latin America and the Caribbean as well as to defend our right to struggle against the financial blackmail to which we are being subjected by the creditors of a debt that is unrepayable, and therefore, uncollectible. It means defending the right to struggle for a new economic order; it means defending the right to peace . . .

Long live the Third Congress of the Cuban Communist Party! Long live the friendship between Cuba and Nicaragua! Cuba and Nicaragua, united they will overcome! Long live peace!

Israel and the Contras

(By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak)

The arrival in Nicaragua last week of a Cuban general who fought against Israel in the 1973 Yom Kippur War is the launching pad for a new political effort to win the contra-aid vote in Congress on grounds that a vote against the contras is a vote against Israel.

Brig. Gen. Nestor Lopez, the Soviet-trained Cuban commander who is just now making his debut in Nicaragua, commanded armored forces on the Syrian front against Israel and then stayed there for two more years. His move to Managua buttresses the administration's charge that a seamless web of left-wing forces now spans the globe, with the capability of pinpointing its power where and when needed.

According to that theory, Lopez's battle experience in one theater of operations after another shows the capability of moving non-Soviet communist forces led by Soviet-trained officers into combat almost anywhere. The troops that fight on the Honduran border today may return to the Israeli border tomorrow.

Republican supporters of anticommunist guerrillas in Nicaragua believe there is political advantage to be taken of this, particularly with many Democratic congressmen who vote consistently for aid to Israel but against the contras. Rep. Newt Gingrich plans to get a group of colleagues together for trips to New York, Chicago, and Miami—all major centers of Jewish population—to deliver this message: a "no" vote on aid to the contras is a "yes" vote for the enemies of Israel who fought in the Yom Kippur War on the Arab side.

Lopez was one of them. Indeed, at age 44 he typifies the Cuban communist professional who has made his mark in three theaters of war. A youthful fighter against the Batista regime in Cuba, he was trained at armor school in the Soviet Union. When the ill-fated freedom fighters landed at the Bay of Pigs in the spring of 1961, Lopez commanded one of the first Fidel Castro units to meet them.

In 1973, he was sent to the Mideast in command of an armored regiment fighting with the Syrians against Israel along the Golan Heights, staying there throughout sporadic cleanup fighting that lasted into

May 1974. All told, 3,000 Cubans were estimated to have been in Syria—including MiG and helicopter pilots.

According to The Economist's March 1978 Foreign Report, Cuban tank crews commanded by Lopez suffered 180 dead and 250 wounded in the Yom Kippur war. Less than a year later, in March 1975, the Cubans were dispatched to Angola to battle Jonas Savimbi's freedom fighters following Portugal's departure. Lopez was put in command of a Cuban armored division.

Thus, while Washington sends one of its veteran peace-seeking envoys, Ambassador Philip Habib, to Central America, Havana sends one of its outstanding combat veterans to Managua.

The Nicaraguan government's pleas for peace, echoed by Reagan critics in Washington, contrast with such warlike moves. Commandante Emmet Lang, the Nicaraguan air force commander in chief, is on a secret mission to Moscow seeking a favorable sign from the Soviets—such as the loan of MiG fighters, or perhaps the symbolic landing of a squadron of Bear bombers.

U.S. experts very much doubt the Sandinistas will get any such stakes-raising signal from the Soviets. But even without the Russians, internationalization of the communist struggle in Nicaragua is well along.

The globe-trotting Gen. Lopez shows what military analyst Edward N. Luttwak meant when he wrote that "the pieces are on the chessboard"—in the Middle East and elsewhere.

Tying Israel and the contras together politically is not all that easy. Formidable Democratic spokesmen in foreign affairs, including Rep. Mel Levine of California, chairman of the House Democratic task force on Central America, and Rep. Stephen J. Solarz of New York, a senior member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, support Isreal and oppose the contras with nearly equal passion.

Gingrich and his colleagues will try to convince them they will not be able to perform that feat with impunity much longer. Levine acknowledged to us that the apparent contradiction made him "uncomfortable." But he said "the tail should not wag the dog"—that giving Israel what is asks is not the same as supplying arms to the anti-Sandinista contras.

Gingrich will try to change that, raising the political cost of opposing the contras. The arrival in Managua of the Cuban general with his battle ribbons from the Syrian front helps his cause.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

(Mr. DE LA GARZA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I am concerned that, in the pressure of the vote of today, we have neglected to give more emphasis to the fact that today is National Agriculture Day. This is the day when we thank all of those who till the soil and work for us and make us the bested Nation in the world, with yet enough to export to other countries.

There is a very critical situation in rural America and in the farm sector. We have addressed that in part, with legislation that we feel will aid the farmers—credit legislation, commodity-support legislation—but the rest remains with the American people that they recognize who it is that puts the bread, the daily bread, on the table and the sacrifices that they made. We take pride in saying that Americans are the best fed people for the least amount of disposable income per family, with enough to sell abroad. Yet more often than not, the farmers sell for less than it costs them to produce it.

So what we need is that the American people realize, understand and, hopefully, appreciate the fact that it is the farmers, the producers of America, who are giving us this bounty, and at least for today, as we close this session, and tonight, that all of us say a silent prayer or otherwise for those who till the land. We have spoken today about life and liberty and democracy and the pursuit of happiness. None of this would be available in this country of ours without those who till the land. There would be no life, no liberty, no pursuit of happiness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed with my special order, which was requested earlier.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to talk about what happened today and where we go from here. Some who may watch or who may look tomorrow at the transcript may say, "Why is GINGRICH talking? Isn't the vote over?" and my answer to our friends is: No, it is not over.

I think the very distinguished Democratic chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee said it beautifully on the floor today when he said, "This will not end today, whether we vote yes or not. This will not end tomorrow. This may well go on for 10 years." And then he cited—and I say with a great sense of history, for I have read some of his statements back in 1961 and 1962—Fidel Castro and all those who thought it would be over, "if only we could negotiate, if only we could have let Fidel play baseball in Yankee Stadium, if only we could do something." Twenty-six years after Fidel Castro, it is not over. As the very distinguished Democratic chairman of the Rules Committee, CLAUDE PEPPER, said today, in what I thought was a heroic moment that, frankly, sent chills up my spine listening to him talk, looking back over many years of watching this planet, a man who has witnessed the isolationism of the 1930's, a man who saw the rise of the cold war, a man who has seen far beyond those of us who are younger, Chairman PEPPER said, if I may paraphrase: "They are Communists. They lie to us. They have lied again and again. We have no choice."

And yet the fact is that when the vote was over today, while Ronald Reagan carried 49 States in 1984, today it is George McGovern, Jimmy Carter and Walter Mondale who control the House of Representatives. It was the George McGovern-Jimmy Carter-Walter Mondale foreign policy that received a vote today.

I will be glad to yield to my very distinguished friend, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD].

Mr. RUDD. I thank the very distinguished gentleman in the well for taking this special order. His remarks are well taken in that people think this vote is over, and the vote on the floor is over, but I just have to make a comment with regard to a little bit of history that the gentleman was talking about.

I was in the Caribbean when Fidel Castro took over, and I was in Mexico at the time of the Bay of Pigs and at the time of the missile crisis.

In 1959, when Fidel Castro took over in Cuba, everybody thought, as you pointed out, that a democratic government might come to Cuba, with the exception of a few people. A friend of mine who was with AP at the time was the only reporter out of Havana who was writing these stories that told the stories the way it was. He knew that Fidel Castro was a Communist.

So Fidel made some promises and got a lot of support in this country, and then shortly after that he declared himself to be a Communist.

Now, two important things really took place in Cuba in 1961 and 1962. On April 17, 1961, the Bay of Pigs, the famous Bay of Pigs, occurred. And at that time, although the assistance had been promised and had been assured by President Eisenhower, who decided to leave it to his successor, President Kennedy, to carry out the plan that had been on the books for a long time, an open secret, I might add, that was not really a secret, but the refusal of President Kennedy to provide air support for the exiles, the freedom fighters who were trying to recover freedom in Cuba after they had been deceitfully deprived of freedom by Castro, Castro subsequently consolidated all of his power at the failure of the Bay of Pigs, and the Soviet Union got a permanent foothold in our own back yard and later installed missiles and nuclear warheads the following year.

In July 1962, we got information that the Soviets were shipping missiles to Cuba, and on October 22, President Kennedy, at long last, recognizing the folly of his earlier decision not to help in the Bay of Pigs, placed a naval blockade around Cuba, and President Kennedy planned an armed invasion, I was told at the time, on October 30, 1962. On October 28, Premier Khrushchev backed down, presumably, and promised to remove all of the missiles from Cuba, and we got some pictures of them removing something that looked like missiles and we took it for granted that they did. We do not know for sure that they did. It did not really matter because the base was assured.

The missile crisis, in my opinion, was the greatest geopolitical victory that any country could have had in recent times, and certainly the greatest geopolitical victory that ever occurred in the Western Hemisphere if you discount Hernan Cortez and Francisco Pizarro in the conquering efforts that they made in Latin America 400 years earlier.

And the reason it was such a victory is this: What did we get in return for all of this? We really got some empty promises that the missiles would be removed from Cuba, but in turn we took our missiles out of Turkey and we gave carte blanche authority to the Soviet Union to establish a permanent base in Cuba, a base for espionage, a headquarters for terrorism and a base for subversion and military activity throughout all of the other countries in Latin America.

At first, Castro decided to send his henchman, the Guevara, to Bolivia, and fortunately he discovered that he was not going to be able to live off the land and do the things that he wanted to do.

How lamentable it was that we did not provide the air support for the Cuban exiles. What a mistake that was. And we struck a deal with the Soviets to allow Cuba to become a dominant power in the world, even though it is a nation of something like 9 million people, to do the bidding of the Soviet Union at that time.

As we all know now, Cuba has armed forces, they have a submarine base for the Soviets, they have submarines of their own, warlike material, first-rate aircraft, perhaps 10,000 maybe 12,000 Soviet soldiers and advisers in Cuba to tell them where to go and how to get there and how to use the equipment, to teach them how to use it so that they can teach others how to use military equipment.

To go back for just a moment, on July 23, 1961, under the direction of Fidel Castro, three Nicargauan Marxist radicals, Carlos Fonseca Amador and Tomas Borge, now Interior Minister and overseer of the secret police for Nicaragua, and Castro's closest friend, and Silvio Mayorga, set up the FSLN in Honduras.

Now, I guess the name in Spanish is Printe de Sandinista Liberacion Nationale, the National Sandinista Liberation Front, and from Honduras they began their terrorist activities to overthrow the then legitimate government of Nicaragua.

In July 1979, the revolution came where the Sandinistas had taken power and put in Tomas Borge again, Nicaragua's Interior Minister, and Castro's personal choice to run the country, although Ortego took over.

Tomas Borge has with the help of Fidel Castro established a power base in Cuba that is almost unshakable today and the Cuban advisers that came in under Castro's direction have taught the government there how to really install political oppression.

On September 21, 1979, I think I have heard the gentleman talk about this before, the FSLN in Nicaragua approved the 72-hour document, the manifesto that committed the Sandinistas to revolutionary internationalism. I think that was the title of it, and a Marxist-Leninist state was closely aligned with the Soviet bloc.

The 3-day session produced the basic blueprint for the construction of communism in Nicaragua, spreading subversion throughout the region. The document was remarkably similar to that others captured in Grenada 4 years later and stressed the need to hoodwink U.S. opinion into believing that the Sandinista pledge to promote pluralism, a mixed economy and nonaligned foreign policy was the way to go; all of this for our consumption, the smokescreen behind which they could gain time and complete their integration into the Communist world revolution that took place and the scenario as to Communist evolution in Cuba now was installed and taking place in Nicaragua.

During the month of September 1983, Tomas Borge was interviewed by an American magazine. He was asked to respond to President Reagan's assertion that Nicaragua is the first domino in Central America since the revolutionary triumph in Nicaragua, and it will be the next revolution exported to Nicaragua and then to Guatemala and then on to Honduras and eventually to Mexico.

Borge replied, "That is one historical prophecy of Ronald Reagan that is absolutely true." That is frightening in itself.

Now, in 1984, January 10, Henry Kissinger reported the findings of the bipartisan Kissinger Commission and he said that our efforts in Latin America would fail because they are not broad enough and they do not provide sufficient resources. He mentioned a figure of $8 billion for all, not for the freedom fighters, but for all the area to try to cope with the crisis which on a continuous basis was being exacerbated by the Soviet Union and by Cuba.

One other little item that should frighten everybody as in June 1984 the Soviet Ambassador to Brazil said that the most important event in the past 2 years in that region in Central America undoubtedly is the Sandinista victory in Nicaragua and the way things are going. We will have another Cuba there. That was his opinion.

So the pattern is in and the domination that they accomplished, they continue to accomplish throughout the world, with one exception and that one exception was Grenada.

George Shultz met with the foreign ministers of the Contadora process and he said at that time in December 1985 that the Sandinistas did not want to negotiate in good faith, which is underscored by everything else that they have done.

So today we have in Nicaragua, like Cuba, a revolutionary movement by the Communist international and Daniel Ortega is quickly following the footsteps of Fidel Castro. He has betrayed the moderate members of the coalition, the people who were really seeking freedom, and he has consolidated his power by the use of force behind the barrel of a gun again.

In just winding this up a little bit, today the Sandinistas have the largest armed force in Central America. We all know that. We know the huge numbers of soldiers that they have under arms, perhaps 120,000, and we know that they have thousands, over 10,000 advisers in the form of people from the Soviet-Cuban, Bulgarians, North Koreans, Libyans, and Palestinians.

The buildup in offensive material with over 150 tanks, and I will not go ahead and name all the equipment they have, because we know what they have; but if we are as unconcerned, as apparently we are today with that vote, which I think is pretty final, then the Contras will have to disappear from the scene. The only hope that we will have then is presumably a negotiated settlement with Nicaragua, who will never negotiate. Why should they negotiate now? I will not be a bit surprised if Ortega does not get aboard a plane, issue a press release and go to Moscow to personally report the good position that he now finds himself in.

We have abandoned the Contras, as we did the Cuban freedom fighters at the Bay of Pigs. In doing so we have now allowed the Iron Curtain to fall around Nicaragua and when it comes up from time to time it will only be up long enough to allow military forces, terrorism, and espionage to leave in order to do the same thing in the surrounding countries. Probably the first target will be Honduras, then El Salvador and then Guatemala and then Mexico, but they will leave Costa Rica to the last because Borge was reported to have said, "We don't have to worry about that. We can take them anytime we want."

I wonder what happened to the tremendous emotion captured in a phrase that our President Kennedy once said. He said,

> We are a people who will pay any price, make any sacrifice, travel any distance, to protect freedom on this earth.

I cannot believe that we as a people cannot be sympathetic with the freedom fighters all around the world, because we were once freedom fighters. Our Founding Fathers were and our statements of sympathy for that by almost every President that anyone can remember, starting recently, most recently with Harry Truman, were that we would defend freedom fighters wherever they might be found anywhere in the world.

Those people who opposed the freedom fighters in Honduras I do not feel understand that the freedom fighters are defending United States principles as surely as they are fighting for their own freedom.

I want to thank the gentleman for yielding to me, but this is a ticklish question. We in America who have always stood for freedom and liberty, and it has really taken 5,000 years for us to come to the understanding that we have about freedom and liberty and it culminated and became an apex of that thought with what happened 200 years ago in Philadelphia; but I just cannot believe that the sympathy we feel for freedom fighters everywhere, I cannot understand why we cannot feel that for the people who are trying to recover freedom which was taken from them, stolen from them by Ortega and the Sandinista movement in Nicaragua.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I particularly wanted to yield to our friend from Arizona because I know the gentleman personally has witnessed this. I know the gentleman has lived the frustration of 26 years of Fidel Castro and the Cuban Communists extending their power in Cuba, creating a colonial army for use in the Soviet empire.

I think, and I do not know whether the gentleman wants to comment on what I am about to say, because it is very, very strong, and yet it is at the core of the reason I decided to stay tonight and do this special order. It seems to me it is the history of 26 years of Cuban communism, 69 years of Soviet communism, that for people like us creates a genuine fear of Communist tyranny.

We were here on the floor today voting frankly out of fear, a real fear. We think the Soviets represent a weird and frightening reality, while our friends on the left believe in a pleasant fantasy that simply is not true.

Let me say, because I think we have to say it and we have to say it firmly and we have to say it clearly. There were patriots disagreeing on this floor today. I respect Members who voted their conscience. I respect the Speaker when he got up today and I think spoke from the heart, but I have to say that there was a deep emotion as I stood in the back at the last minute of the vote and some Members on the left cheered and applauded. A part of me, frankly, was sickened. They were patriots who were cheering and applauding. I do not question that they are sincere Americans, but I have to ask myself, "How much do those who were cheering lack compassion and concern? How much did they lack sensitivity?"

When that vote went down, there were Afghan freedom fighters who were crying because America once again has once again shown weakness in the face of communism.

There were Cambodian freedom fighters who were crying, because America still was not helping them adequately.

There were Polish workers in Solidarity crying, because we will have not found a way after 40 years to help those oppressed by communism in Europe.

There were Israelis crying, because their loved ones had been killed by Cuban troops led by Gen. Nestor Lopez, who is now the Cuban leader, the head of the Cuban colonial army in Nicaragua.

There were Nicaraguans crying, because they have 35,000 Cuban troops right now oppressing them with Soviet weapons and America is not doing enough to help them and they know that if we do not have the courage to stand up in our own backyard, we are not likely to have the courage to stand up across the ocean.

There were Ethiopians crying, because a thousand a day are dying in Soviet dictatorship concentration camps and forced relocations.

There were Cubans crying, because by failing to stand up to Castro and his colonial army we increased the power of his grip in his totalitarian government.

There were Nicaraguans crying, because they are going to be in the mountains fighting for freedom against Soviet helicopters manned by Cuban pilots with no effective American help tomorrow morning.

There were Soviet citizens crying, because like Sakharov, they were either threatened with a mental institution if they believe in freedom or they are imprisoned or sent in isolation to a strange city.

Who was laughing and cheering as they watched C-SPAN and saw the vote go down and saw America turn its back on freedom fighters?

I suspect the Soviet Embassy was laughting and cheering.

I suspect that Fidel Castro's observers at the United Nations in New York were laughing and cheering.

I suspect that Qadhafi in Libya when he got the vote results was laughing and cheering.

I suspect that Ortega and his communist gang in Nicaragua, although I have been told that Ortega himself is in Cuba right now and his air force general is in Moscow; but I suspect that Ortega and the Communist gang in Nicaragua are laughing and cheering, and in this House there were those on the left who were laughing and cheering.

Those who cheered, those who thought they defeated and weakened Ronald Reagan, in fact defeated and weakened the forces of freedom not only in Central America, but around the world.

I guess what I find so troubling and so hard to deal with is not the men and women of conscience who quietly and soberly voted no because in their hearts they just did not agree with Ronald Reagan, I think that is their job. I think if we cannot convince them, they owe it to this country to vote their conscience; but when you read, as we read today, "The Democratic leadership vowed to defeat him today in the House," referring to the President of the United States on a foreign policy issue, and you see the maneuvering in which first we scheduled a vote early because that way the Democratic leadership thought Ronald Reagan could not rally the country, and then when the President went on television and rallied the country, they offered a new vote in April, because they were afraid they would lose today, and then the radical elements in their party laughed and cheered. It is a bit much not to want to cry for freedom, for freedom fighters, and for America.

□ 2105

So I wanted to ask the gentleman from Arizona, and I appreciated so much him sharing with us the history of these years, because he has lived through the frustration that I think DANTE FASCELL, the chairman of the Democratic Foreign Affairs Committee, was warning all of us we may live through, and the question is whether we live through the next decade gradually winning for freedom, or we live through the next decade gradually losing our freedom.

I would be glad to yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. RUDD. I do not want to be an apologist, but when things happen as they have happened with the Communist extension of power throughout the world since they came to power, when freedom fighters in Hungary wanted to regain freedom, when freedom fighters in Poland and Czechoslovakia and Greece—thank the Lord we were able to help them then, and I could ask you that question then, if you were opposed to freedom fighters, what would have happened in Greece if we had not come to the aid of them. They would now be under the total domination and another province of Soviet Russia.

But we look at these areas, and they say, "But that is far away. Afghanistan is far away. Ethiopia, Angola, is far away." Even in Vietnam we were not interested in that because it was far away. So we did not want to be bothered with that.

Does the gentleman think it is because we are here at home affluent, with good shoes on, with clothes on our backs, that we do not feel the compassion? We know it is there, we admit it, and for just a fleeting moment we are opposed and angered by what the Soviets are doing throughout the world, but it is far away and it is easier to just forget about it and hope that it will go away, even though you know in your heart it will not go away.

But here in Central America, that is not far away. That is almost within walking distance of the United States of America, or in a rowboat, if you will. But you would think by this time that we know how the Soviets operate, what communism is all about, that it feeds on war. That is the only way it continues to exist, is to feed on war, to let the people within the Iron Curtain borders of the country where it takes place, and I am talking about Soviet Russia and every other Communist country, that it will eventually take over everything that we hold dear.

Freedom and liberty will no longer be ours if we continue to let them advance, and advance and advance. You would think that we would at least become fearful enough to realize that if we have not helped these people regain their freedom, they do not want our soldiers there to do it, they want our help only in the way of materiel, that we will have lost our last opportunity, and the next time that we will be involved it will be in armed conflict to defend freedom and liberty as we know it. And could it be too late then?

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me say first of all, just very briefly, that I think there are three primary reasons we in America find it hard to systematically confront communism and the threat to our freedom and our survival.

The first is that if you are prosperous and you live in a suburb and your life is orderly and rational and you watch color television and you have a good life, it is hard to believe in the weird and frightening reality of Leninism and the Soviet system. It is just outside our normal behavior.

The second is that for very, very many members of the American political elite, members who are in the Henry Wallace-George McGovern tradition of isolationism and neopacificism, that I think there are intellectual and there are psychological reasons that they find it very hard to confront the Soviet empire. I think for some of them they have now spent 40 years trying to explain away this dangerous reality, and trying to develop a pleasant fantasy that sounds good even if it is not real.

The third, candidly, and the one that led me to ultimately decide to do this special order, is that only in recent weeks have we had the firmness and the clarity from the Reagan administration necessary to force this issue.

The fact is, the President has not been clear enough, his advisers have not been systematic enough. To this very day, they have not finished the process of getting the State Department to use the right language to explain what is going on. I think if the President does not lead systematically, and if his staff does not lead systematically, they can hardly expect the Nation to follow. In fact, I think this vote was lost as much in the last 5 days by people on the White House staff talking about compromise as by anything else.

If this issue is not important enough for the President and his senior staff to focus on systematically, it can hardly be important enough for the average American voter to worry about.

So I think all three factors are at stake.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, it is only recently that we began to understand that probably the key to all of this for the Soviets is the tremendous to which they have developed disinformation services to provide a wrong picture throughout our Nation, and it is targeted at us particularly. Everything that has happened in the last 2 or 3 weeks, for example, how much money the Nicaraguans, which came from Soviet Russia and Cuba, are spending to provide disinformation on all subjects with regard to who they are and what they are doing, and nothing about what they are not doing.

I recently received a pamphlet, as I know the gentleman did, from Los Angeles. It told me how wonderful everything was in Nicaragua. Tomas Borje is holding a child, grieving for the hated freedom fighters who had killed the parents. We saw pictures of schools that were blown up. We saw the hospitals that were blown up. We do not know if these were blown up in Nicaragua. It could have been in El Salvador. It could have been in Cuba at an earlier time.

But anyway, this came out, and this is all total disinformation. So the Soviet Union has been beaming information into our country into the ears and for the eyes of our citizens for a long time, to tell us that things are not the way we know they are, but the way they say it is. So disinformation is probably the key to this whole thing for the Communists in order to soften us up and to soften any nation up before they take over. When they promise freedom and liberty, they are talking about slavery.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be glad to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to get in here to say that I appreciate both gentlemen putting the vote today in somewhat of a historical perspective, because I think it is important to understand what happened today is a part of an ongoing history that this country is going to have to deal with at some point or another.

I was taught some time ago that men and nations move in historical cycles. The cycle tends to move from bondage to faith, from faith to courage, from courage to freedom, from freedom to abundance from abundance, to complacency, from complacency to dependency, and from dependency back to bondage.

What I heard on the House floor today and yesterday all too much was people talking about the downside of history rather than the upside of history. The upside of history is faith, courage, freedom, and ultimately abundance. The downside of history is complacency, dependency, and ultimately bondage.

What I heard many people saying on the floor today and yesterday was that they did not even have faith enough to stand with people of courage in Nicaragua who are members of churches that are being persecuted and who are people standing against all odds in order to protect their faith; that we do not even have the kind of courage in this House to stand safely on the House floor and vote to provide the kind of aid that gives people of real courage the sustenenace they need to carry on the fight for freedom; that we do not even believe in the ideals of freedom enough to do, as one of our colleagues described it, allow people to stand on their feet and fight rather than to live on their knees.

Rather, what we heard all too often in the debate today was people who had decided to be complacent, who had decided to be complacent about what was going on in Cental America, who had decided that despite the fact that they came to the floor and described a Sandinista Communist regime in such horrid terms that they could not endorse it. Time and time again they said, "We cannot endorse this regime."

Despite knowing what they knew about what was happening in Nicaragua, they said, "Well, it really does not matter enough to do anything now." That is complacency.

And they also talked about dependency, because ultimately what they said was, "We have no solution to the problem there. Let us leave it to somebody else to solve the problem. Let us leave it to the Contadora nations. Let us leave it to a regional kind of solution. Let us leave it to someone else. We have no stake."

People are complacent, people who are dependent about the issues that we had before us in this House today, are ultimately people who are in danger of being placed into bondage.

That is my great fear. I share with the gentleman a sense of fear about what we saw take place here, because history teaches us precisely the kinds of things that took place here today are what allow free people to become slaves.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me say that of all the people who voted "no" today, the ones who surprised me the most and saddened me the most and made me the most confused were those who claimed in April they would vote "yes" for something else a little bit like this.

There seems to be one faction of the House which always has a compromise, if only there is a headline or a fig leaf. There seems to be one faction of the House which, if they just said "no" to the freedom fighters and walked off, would then have the country and Ronald Reagan and history angry at them.

On the other hand, if they said yes to the freedom fighters, then they would have the radicals in their own conference angry at them. And it seems to me that our efforts in the coming weeks and months must focus on these Members, because they are the most difficult Members to deal with, and in many ways those who in the way they behave make it the hardest to explain the challenge and the choice.

Let me draw a distinction. There are Members in this House who sincerely and openly believe that we should not be in Central America. They go back and they explain their viewpoints, they are elected by folks back home who agree with them. I respect those Members because they are up front, they are straightforward. The folks back home know what they are voting for and they get what they vote for. That is perfectly reasonable and patriots can disagree. I go back home and I say you vote for NEWT GINGRICH and you are going to vote for somebody who is explicitly, strongly, actively trying to stop communism. And I am willing to take the risk of sending money to help the freedom fighters help themselves, because I think that is a smaller risk than some day having to send American troops.

Other Members come in and say I think we can afford the risk of communism in Central America. I think that is a smaller risk than us getting involved, and I will vote against aid. And I can respect those because they are up-front and clear.

The difficult ones, those who cause the most problems in having a clear debate and a clear dialog and a public education process, are the ones who say oh, I am really a conservative but I cannot quite vote for it this time. One was quoted, for example, in the New York Times as describing himself as a "genuine, certified, 100-percent hawk," except, of course, he was going to vote no. Now let me just say if you had even said "I was a 99-percent hawk but on this one, this 1 percent I was not" that would have made some sense. But there were no genuine, certified, 100-percent hawks who voted no today, and somehow what puzzles me the most is how do we get across the message, first of all, that there are a lot of folks who pretend they are sort of like Ronald Reagan when they are back home, but they vote sort of like they are George McGovern when they are up here.

And second, there was just something fundamentally wrong about standing here on the floor of the House in March, talking about a year in Central America and promising that in April you would vote a better deal. If the deal is better, should we not have voted on it today? What kind of person can walk off now before a recess knowing that tomorrow there will be Soviet helicopters, manned by Cuban pilots, killing young men and women in the mountains of Nicaragua, but in April, the ones who are still alive will get a better deal? How can they day by day over the next 30 days get up in the morning knowing that today Cuban colonial soldiers in Soviet helicopters will be patrolling, seeking freedom fighters to kill, but in April we are going to have a chance to vote on a better deal? How many men and women will die in the mountains of Nicaragua while we wait for the better deal?

If they had had a better deal, should they not in any sense of conscience have brought it up today, if it was really better, and if that deal is going to be voted on, and in my judgment it is a worse deal, not a better deal, and in my judgment has not got a chance of passing, then should we not have discovered that today and faced the fact that they have no answers, and that the President at least has an answer because, frankly, those on the left have an answer, and it is a legitimate answer. It is Nicaraguan communism is not a real threat, and do not really worry about it, let us talk. Those on the right have an answer, and it is a real answer. The answer is Nicaraguan communism in the Soviet empire and the Cuban colonial army are a threat, and if we do not do something about it, then let us help the freedom fighters help themselves. But those in the middle who voted no because they have a better deal in April, it seems to me they have the least answer and the most to answer for.

When they are home, I hope folks will ask them if it does not bother them a little bit that people are dying, as Americans drink their coffee, drink their Coca-Cola and go to movies.

In three recent debates, I have debated Democrats on the left who have said, well, if it gets bad enough, we can always send in the Marines. I believe that was even said on this floor today.

Let me say I hope as they go home that every American mother and father will say to them: "Do you really mean you believe it is a smaller risk to be prepared to send my son to die in Nicaragua rather than to send the weapons so that the Nicaraguan freedom fighters can fight for their own freedom? Are you really telling me you think you would rather gamble on our children in Central America 2 years from now than take the risk of helping freedom fighters today?"

You know, the old isolationism of the 1930's was based on bad information about the need for America to be involved elsewhere in the world, and sometimes in a sense that the old world would only taint the new if we came in greater contact with old-world conflicts. The fact is today we are faced with the fact that the old world is in the new world. It is a Soviet tyranny in Nicaraguan Cuba. It is Soviet colonial officers who trained the Cubans. It is Soviet secret police methods that dominate Nicaraguan Cuba. The old world has come to the new world, the tyranny is here. Now it is America which today rejected those who reach out to help us. We do not just fight for Nicaraguan freedom if we help the freedom fighters, we help the freedom help us fight for our own freedom, and it is we who are involved, for as Franklin Roosevelt said, if your neighbor's house is on fire and he is willing to help somehow put out the fire if you will lend him a hose, you are a pretty foolish person who refuses to lend the hose and waits until your own house is on fire. The fact is that today the Nicaraguan and Cuban houses are on fire with Communist tyranny.

Charles Krauthammer put it brilliantly in an article entitled "The Neutrality Act of 1986." I quote:

The great "red" scare of 1986 is over. The president and Pat Buchanan have backed off the claim that those who want to end the contra resistance would ensure the success of communism in Nicaragua. The tone of the charge was uncomfortably accusatory. But that does not make the proposition any less true this week than last.

It seems to me an unexceptionable and rather undeniable fact: if the contras wither, as House Democrats devoutly wish, there will be an irreversible consolidation of Sandinista power in Nicaragua. Can anyone present a remotely plausible scenario in which the Sandinistas, unforced, either relinquish power or permit a free competition for power—i.e., a democratic election?

That does not mean that those who are against contra aid want to see a communist Nicaragua. But the consequence of their position, however unintended, is certainly not unforeseen.

So it is dismissed. America's national interest, it is said, depends not on the form of a foreign government, but on its foreign policy. What we want is a Nicaragua that doesn't subvert its neighbors or permit the Soviets a military base. We don't care how it is ruled. Therefore the United States should work out a deal with the Sandinistas—a negotiated "Contadora" agreement under which the Sandinistas guarantee not to bother us or their neighbors, and we guarantee them control of Nicaragua by cutting off their opponents.

Now, what will prevent the Sandinistas from violating such an agreement? In 1979 in return for hemispheric support, the Sandinistas pledged in writing to the Organization of American States to bring pluralism and democracy to Nicaragua. They got the support. They gave Nicaragua dictatorship.

Apart from their word as Leninist gentlemen, what is to prevent the Sandinistas from ultimately subverting, for example, Costa Rica? Or from bringing in Soviet MIGs and transports and submarines, quietly and gradually, exactly as Cuba has done for 25 years?

Bruce Babbitt, progressive, hard-headed, neoliberal Democrat, and an advocate of such a deal, has the answer. "The United States, with its overwhelming dominance of the hemisphere, has the power and the duty to enforce such an agreement," he writes in The New York Times.

American power. It seems, then, that the Marines will do the enforcing. So it is unanimous. Everyone agrees: cut off the Nicaraguans who want to fight the Sandinistas and the only cordon against Sandinista threats to regional and U.S. security will be American boys and American blood. Not very sanitaire. And this is advertised as a counsel of prudence.

The current contra debate has produced the clearest division of the house in memory. The Democrats want to deal with the Sandinistas and the president wants to get rid of them. What muddies the waters is that neither side is permitted to say what it really thinks.

Democrats have to pretend that they care about democracy in Nicaragua. And the administration must pretend it does not seek to overturn the Sandinistas. Democrats accuse the president of seeking a military solution, as if that would be undesirable. (It certainly did the trick for Castro in Cuba, for the United States in Grenada and, for that matter, for the allies in World War II.) Even more absurd, the administration is forced to agree that victory is not its objective.

Instead, it has to cook up another preposterous mission on which to send Phil Habib. This one is designed to symbolize for House Democrats the administration's desire for a diplomatic solution. To be sure, House Democrats are easily impressed by airborne symbols. Last year, after all, a single flight to Moscow by Daniel Ortega convinced them that this agrarian reformer had pro-Soviet proclivities.

And now there is on-again, off-again talk of a compromise: the United States will starve the contras for a few more months, and the Sandinistas will thereby be induced to compromise and negotiate. This is the Nicaraguan version of that memorable Vietnam success, the "bombing pause." Only this time, the bombing—deadly fire from Afghan-tested Soviet MI-24 helicopter gunships—will continue. The pause will be in the supply of anti-aircraft defenses for those on the receiving end.

Compromise or not, if in the end the contras are cut off, the reason ultimately will be fear—fear of another Vietnam. It will not be the first time we have closed our eyes to a threat to escape an evil deja vu. Opponents of contra aid see it as another Gulf of Tonkin Resolution. They might consider another analogy, the Neutrality Acts of the 1930s, by which Congress undertook to legislate American safety in a world of Nazism and Japanese militarism. After the passing of the Third Neutrality Act of 1937, the New York Herald Tribune wryly dubbed it "an act to preserve the United States from intervention in the war of 1917-1918."

Cutting off the contras will not repeal the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution. Nor will it bring us the blessings of neutrality. At least the isolationists of the '30s had an idea: hunkering down and hiding from the world in our own hemisphere. Where do we hide now?

□ 2125

That was a quote from Charles Krauthammer, a democrat, a liberal internationalist by his own definition, but a man not too afraid to look the Soviet empire in the eye and see reality.

We in fact heard on this floor today, as he predicted, the Gulf of Tonkin resolution referred to by at least one man who voted against aid to the freedom fighters.

The fact is, that today the U.S. House of Representatives voted for neutrality in Central America, while the Soviets and the Cubans have voted for aggression.

Today the U.S. House of Representatives voted for unilateral disarmament of the freedom fighters, while the Soviets and the Cubans arm the Communist side.

This debate will not go away; this debate will not end; it will go on. What then should the White House do now? First, it should go to the other body and pass the reasonable request for a modest amount of money designed to help freedom survive in Central America.

Then, however, the White House should take heed of two Democrats: Of DANTE FASCELL, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who told us this would be a 10-year struggle; and of Charles Krauthammer, who pointed out that all too often the voices of timidity in this administration have silenced the truth, have weakened the cause, have turned us away from the debate which is so necessary.

The No. 1 thing this administration must do is educate the American people about the Soviet empire. Yes, we can talk to Gorbachev, but let us be honest who we are talking to. Yes, we can deal with the Soviets, but let us be honest about who we are dealing with.

If this administration has not the courage to be up front and consistent about what the threat is, it should not expect the American people to understand and it should not expect the American people to support them.

Let me list some other things: This administration should release everything we have on Soviet, Cuban, and Nicaraguan disinformation efforts and on Communist lobbying in the United States, and it should establish the process of once a month releasing everything new we learn about every person who is working with the Communists, about every dollar the Communists are spending in this country, and it needs to clear up the confusion about disinformation.

The simple fact is: The Communist Governments of Nicaragua, Cuba, and the Soviet Union spend millions of dollars lying to the American people, hire Americans to carry those lies, and we should at least know who is doing it and what they are doing.

Second, this administration should hold a weekly briefing on death in Central America caused by communism and on the flow of arms into Nicaragua from Cuba and the Soviet empire. On a weekly basis, the President should report to the American people, if necessary an additional radio speech, possibly in something as extraordinary as a television speech.

Week after week we have to be as willing to speak about the Soviet empire's aggression as the Soviet empire is willing to be aggressive.

In addition, this administration should ask the Federal Emergency Management Administration to send a letter to every town and every county in this country, to outline the number of refugees we can expect if Central America goes Communist, and to ask that town and that county to hold a public meeting this summer to discuss how it is going to deal with the refugees.

Based on the flow of refugees from Cuba, Cambodia, Laos, Vietnam, and Afghanistan, we can expect between 9 and 15 million refugees in the next 5 or 6 years. Towns should be told how many they will probably get; and they should be asked to plan now and think through, how are they going to put the children in school, how are they going to pay for the people, where are they going to find the housing, what are they going to do with the public health facilities.

Now is the time for a prudent government to ask the Federal Emergency Management Administration to ask every town and every county to start thinking through the alternative.

This is not a cost-free vote. Those Members who stood in this House and said they did not want to spend $100 million should go to those town meetings and explain how much Cuban refugees have cost in south Florida. How much Laotian refugees have cost in Clayton County, GA. How much we have spent in southern California on Vietnamese and Cambodian refugees.

Let us talk about the real cost of not sending $100 million to help fight freedom, for freedom in Central America. Let us lay it on the line and be honest with the people who are going to pay for it when the refugees start arriving.

In addition, this administration needs to upgrade the quality of its strategy, its operations, and its tactics to deal with the transnational Soviet empire and its use of a Cuban colonial army.

The simple fact is: We have every power to say to the Soviets diplomatically, we will not tolerate Czechoslovakian airplanes, we will not tolerate any more Hind helicopters, we will insist that you cut it out, and we have methods of stopping you.

Furthermore, we need to systematically develop a strategy to raise the cost to Castro and his Communist dictatorship of serving as a Soviet colonial army. It is a tragedy that Cuba, that left-wingers tell us once upon a time was a sugar plantation for America, earning a living off of American tourists, has become a Soviet colony that earns its money by being a sugar plantation for the Soviet empire and sending its children overseas.

Progress under Castro has been, that instead of American tourists in Havana, the sons of Havana are now serving in Angola, Ethiopia, Mozambique, and Nicaragua. That is what Communists call "progress."

We need to take steps. There are simple steps. For a start, there should be a branch of Radio Marti set up in the bush in Angola, broadcast to the Cuban troops. We should offer a reward to every Cuban soldier in Angola, Ethiopia, Mozambique, and Nicaragua who deserts. We should offer a big reward to the first Cuban who deserts with a Hind helicopter. We would love to have a Hind helicopter; and I suspect the morning we offer, say $1 million, there will be fewer Hind helicopters flying without a KGB officer prepared to shoot the pilot if he tries to desert.

We need to systematically make life difficult for the Communist dictatorship in Cuba as long as it serves as a colonial army for the Soviets.

In addition, this administration needs to launch an all-out effort to communicate to the Jewish community that cares so deeply about Israel the reality of Nester Lopez and the fact that the Cuban general now serving in Nicaragua is precisely the same Cuban general who commanded a regiment in Syria against the Israelis, precisely the same Cuban general who commanded a division in Angola, smothering freedom there, precisely the same Cuban officer who was trained in the Soviet Union.

Furthermore, this administration should develop a Grenada Week effort this October on every college campus in America, on every public television station, to educate the American people about Leninism, the nature of the Soviet empire, the role of Cubans, terrorists ands Nicaraguans, and the absolute historic proof, first, that Leninism is real; second, that there are Communists in this hemisphere; third, that they are allied with Nicaragua and Cuba and the Soviet Union; and fourth, that there is an active Soviet disinformation effort, and we have absolute proof that on some occasions, American congressional staffs and American Congressmen—well-meaning patriots—have served unwittingly as methods of communicating that disinformation.

The President should make a major goal of his administration to make Grenada Week a week the American people can look at historic facts, and can debate the facts. Because in Grenada, we captured the documents that prove the truth about the nature of the Soviet empire.

In addition this administration through the Republican National Committee, through other institutions and other allies, should develop an intensive advertising campaign to make sure that people back home understand the nature of the Soviet empire, the Cuban colonial army, and the threat to American national security in Nicaragua.

I can assure the President that the voters of Tennessee never thought they sent McGovern-Mondale Democrats to Washington and would be shocked to discover that not a single Democrat in Tennessee voted to help the freedom fighters, that the voters of North Carolina did not think they sent McGovern-Mondale Democrats to Washington and would be shocked to discover that they did not send a single Democrat to Washington who voted to help the freedom fighters, that in Oklahoma there are two districts who have no idea they sent McGovern-Mondale Democrats to Washington and they voted against helping the freedom fighters; that in Texas, most Texas Democrats had no idea that a clear overwhelming majority of the Texas delegation Democrats voted the McGovern-Mondale pattern against helping freedom fighters.

Finally this administration must identify the good, decent patriotic folks of this House who are so confused that they always seek a compromise and they always seek a way to avoid clear choice. Those people cannot become the basis for a firm, consistent policy and there must be no effort made to find a compromise based on sand.

In short, my suggestion to this White House is simple: Hang tough, read what DANTE FASCELL, the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, said, read what CLAUDE PEPPER, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, said. This is the beginning of a long struggle. To those in the administration who grow weary of this long struggle, who grow impatient, read Ronald Reagan's words about George Washington, about Lafayette, about Churchill.

I can promise, having canvassed the Republicans on this floor tonight, we who fought so hard in favor of Ronald Reagan's request will oppose vehemently and vigorously any phony patched-up compromise that some timid souls in the White House or elsewhere might suggest.

Yes, this debate will go on, just as Churchill in the 1930's argued every day, because reality gave him no choice; just as Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson in the 1770's and 1780's argued every day because reality gave them no choice.

So long as freedom is threatened by communism in our hemisphere the argument will continue. As long as the Cuban colonial army can threaten Israel and Syria, to crush freedom in Angola, can endanger American security in Central America, the argument will continue because we have no choice. As long as the American left, patriotic but intellectually and psychologically scarred, refuses to learn from Lenin, refuses to learn from Stalin, refuses to learn from Eastern Europe over 40 years, refuses to learn from Vietnam, refuses to learn from the Grenada documents, refuses to learn from open literature and Soviet disinformation, refuses to learn from current reality, for that long the argument will go on. It will go on because those of us who believe in freedom, those of us who truly do fear the Soviet empire, have no choice. In a free society while patriots on both sides can disagree, it is just as important for the patriots who are afraid of the Soviet empire to talk out as it is for those who believe the Soviet empire is not a threat.

CONTRACTUAL ACTIONS, CALENDAR YEAR 1985 TO FACILITATE NATIONAL DEFENSE

The Clerk of the House of Representatives submits the following report for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD pursuant to section 4(b) of Public Law 85-804:

NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, DC, March 17, 1986.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: In accordance with section 4(a) of Public Law 85-804 (50 U.S.C. 1431-35 et seq.), I am herewith reporting to the United States House of Representatives on all CY 1985 actions taken by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration under authority of that Act which involve actual or potential cost to the United States in excess of $50,000.

During CY 1985, the NASA Contract Adjustment Board did not grant any request for extraordinary contractual relief under P.L. 85-804.

On January 19, 1983, the Administrator made a decision to provide indemnification to certain NASA Space Transportation System (STS) contractors for specified risks arising out of contract performance directly related to NASA space activities. The authority of that decision was extended on September 26, 1984, to include prime contracts which have an effective date before October 1, 1989. This decision was based upon consideration of the potential liabilities to which a contractor could be exposed in the event of a hardware or software malfunction or operator error in NASA's STS space activities leading to an accident; these liabilities could be in substantial excess of the insurance coverage that a NASA prime contractor would reasonably be expected to purchase and maintain considering the availability, cost, and terms and conditions of such insurance. A copy of the Administrator's Memoranda of Decision is enclosed.

During CY 1985, three NASA prime contractors, performing under four contracts, were indemnified under the Memorandum of Decision dated September 26, 1984, for the risks set forth therein. A summary description of each contract is also enclosed.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM R. GRAHAM,
Acting Administrator.

Enclosures.

MEMORANDUM DECISION UNDER PUBLIC LAW 85-804

Authority for National Aeronautics and Space Administration Contracting Officers to idemnify certain NASA contractors and subcontractors involved in NASA space activities.

1. On July 4, 1982, the Space Transportation System (hereinafter STS) completed its design, development, test and evaluation phase and was declared an operational system of the United States for the transportation of payloads into and out of outer space for governmental and commercial purposes. With the commencement of these space operations, the STS has conducted and will continue to conduct launch, in orbit and landing activities on a repetitive basis and at an increasing frequency.

2. Scheduled STS operations at an increasing frequency has dictated a continuing examination of the risks in repetitive space activities of the STS and the present availability of adequate insurance at reasonable premiums to manufacturers and operators of the system. While NASA's STS space activities are designed to be safe, and have been proven to be safe, there exists the remote and low statistical probability that a malfunction of either hardware, software or operator error could occur resulting in an accident. This low probability of occurrence, albeit remote, cannot be totally removed. In the event that such a malfunction or operator error led to an accident, the potential liability arising from such an accident could be substantially in excess of the insurance coverage NASA contractors could reasonably be expected to acquire and maintain considering the availability, cost and potential terms and conditions of such insurance at the present time.

3. Pursuant to the authority of Public Law 85-804 and Executive Order 10789, as amended, and notwithstanding any other provisions of the contracts to which this determination may apply, I therefore authorize that certain NASA contractors, as further defined in paragraphs 4 and 5 below, be held harmless and indemnified against certain risks as specifically set forth herein. Accordingly, and subject to the limitations hereinafter stated, cognizant, NASA contracting Officers are authorized to include in prime contracts, described in paragraphs 4 and 5 below, contract provisions for the indemnification of the contractors and their subcontractors at any tier, against claims or losses, as defined in paragraph 1A of E.O. 10789, as amended, arising out of contract performance directly related to NASA's space activities.

4. This authorization is limited to prime contracts which have an effective date before October 1, 1989, by or for NASA for:

a. provision of Space Transportation System and cargo flight elements or components thereof;

b. provision of Space Transportation System and cargo ground support equipment or components thereof;

c. provision of Space Transportation System and cargo ground control facilities and services for their operation; and

d. repair, modification, overhaul support and services and other support and services directly relating to the Space Transportation System, its cargo and other elements used in NASA's space activities.

5. This authorization is further limited solely to claims or losses resulting from or arising out of the use of performance of the products or services described in paragraph 4 in NASA's space activities. For this purpose, the use of performance of such products or services in NASA's space activities begins solely when such products or services are provided to the U.S. Government at a U.S. Government installation for or in connection with one or more Space Transportation System launches and are actually used or performed in NASA's space activities.

6. The risks for which indemnification is authorized are the risks arising under the contracts described in paragraphs 4 and 5 causing personal injury or death, or loss of or damage to property, or loss of use of property. These risks are considered unusually hazardous risks solely in the sense that if, in the unlikely event, the Space Transportation System, its cargo or other elements or services used in the NASA's space activities malfunctioned causing an accident, the potential liability could be in excess of the insurance coverage that a NASA prime contractor would reasonably be expected to purchase and maintain, considering the availability, cost and terms and conditions of such insurance. In no other sense are the Space Transportation System, its cargo or other elements or services used in NASA's space activities unusually hazardous.

7. a. This authorization may be applied prospectively, without additional consideration, to existing prime contracts and subcontracts and in new prime contracts and subcontracts which otherwise meet the conditions of this memorandum.

b. Indemnification of prime contractors and subcontractors may be provided under this authorization only when the Government will receive the benefit of all cost savings, if any, to the prime contractor and its subcontractors at every tier.

8. All contract indemnification clauses shall comply with applicable provisions of Federal Acquisition Regulation 50.4 as modified by the NASA FAR Supplement 18-50.4.

9. This authorization is given upon condition that each prime contractor is approved by me and that such contractor maintains financial protection of such type and in such amounts as may be determined by me in writing to be appropriate under the circumstances. Each prime contractor shall provide a statement of applicable financial protection through the cognizant NASA contracting officer for my review and determination. In making this determination, I shall take into account such factors as the availability, cost and terms of private insurance, self-insurance and other proof of financial responsibility and workman's compensation insurance.

10. When indemnification provisions are included in a prime contract pursuant to the authority of this decision, the cognizant contracting officer shall immediately submit directly to the Contract Adjustment Board a report referencing this decision and containing the information required by NASA/FAR Supplement 18-50.403-70-Reporting and records requirements.

11. The actual or potential cost, if any, of the actions hereby authorized is impossible to estimate since it is contingent upon the remote possibility of an occurrence and extent of loss resulting from certain space activities which malfunction. Such an event may never occur, however, should a major incident occur, millions of dollars of damage could result.

12. I find that this action will facilitate the national defense. In the remote event that the Space Transportation System, its cargo or other elements or services used in NASA's space activities malfunctioned causing damage in excess of insurance maintained by contractors and subcontractors, the resulting excess liability could place the contractors and subcontractors continued existence in jeopardy, making those contractors and subcontractors unavailable to continue to support space activities and the Department of Defense. I note that for purposes of the Defense Production Act of 1950, the term national defense is defined as "programs for . . . space, and directly related activity." (50 U.S.C. App. 2152(d)).

MEMORANDUM DECISION UNDER PUBLIC LAW 85-804

Authority for National Aeronautics and Space Administration Contracting Officers to indemnify certain NASA contractors and subcontractors involved in NASA space activities.

1. On July 4, 1982, the Space Transportation System (hereinafter STS) completed its design, development, test and evaluation phase and was declared an operational system of the United States for the transportation of payloads into and out of outer space for governmental and commercial purposes. With the commencement of these space operations, the STS will conduct launch, in orbit and landing activities on a repetitive basis and at an increasing frequency.

2. The initiation of scheduled STS operations at an increasing frequency has dictated a reexamination of the risks in repetitive space activities of the STS and the present availability of adequate insurance at reasonable premiums to manufacturers and operators of the system. While NASA's STS space activities are designed to be safe, and have been proven to be safe, there exists the remote and low statistical probability that a malfunction of either hardware, software or operator error could occur resulting in an accident. This low probability of occurrence, albeit remote, cannot be totally removed. In the event that such a malfunction or operator error led to an accident, the potential liability arising from such an accident could be substantially in excess of the insurance coverage NASA contractors could reasonably be expected to acquire and maintain considering the availability, cost and potential terms and conditions of such insurance at the present time.

3. Pursuant to the authority of Public Law 85-804 and Executive Order 10789, as amended, and notwithstanding any other provisions of the contracts to which this determination may apply, I therefore authorize that certain NASA contractors, as further defined in paragraphs 4 and 5 below, be held harmless and indemnified against certain risks as specifically set forth herein. Accordingly, and subject to the limitations hereinafter stated, cognizant NASA Contracting Officers are authorized to include in prime contracts, described in paragraphs 4 and 5 below, contract provisions for the indemnification of the contractors and their subcontractors at any tier, against claims or losses, as defined in paragraph 1A of E.O.

10789, as amended, arising out of contract performance directly related to NASA's space activities.

4. This authorization is limited to prime contracts, which have an effective date before October 1, 1984, by or for NASA for:

a. provision of Space Transportation System and cargo flight elements or components thereof;

b. provision of Space Transportation System and cargo ground support equipment or components thereof;

c. provision of Space Transportation System and cargo ground control facilities and services for their operation; and

d. repair, modification, overhaul support and services and other support and services directly relating to the Space Transportation System, its cargo and other elements used in NASA's space activities.

5. This authorization is further limited solely to claims or losses resulting from or arising out of the use or performance of the products or services described in paragraph 4 in NASA's space activities. For this purpose, the use or performance of such products or services in NASA's space activities begins solely when such products or services are provided to the U.S. Government at a U.S. Government installation for or in connection with one or more Shuttle launches and are actually used or performed in NASA's space activities.

6. The risks for which indemnification is authorized are the risks arising under the contracts described in paragraphs 4 and 5 causing personal injury or death, or loss of or damage to property, or loss of use of property. These risks are considered unusually hazardous risks solely in the sense that if, in the unlikely event, the Space Transportation System, its cargo or other elements or services used in NASA's space activities malfunctioned causing an accident, the potential liabilities could be in excess of the insurance coverage that a NASA prime contractor would reasonably be expected to purchase and maintain, considering the availability, cost and terms and conditions of such insurance. In no other sense are the Space Transportation System, its cargo or other elements or services used in NASA's space activities unusually hazardous.

7. a. This authorization may be applied prospectively without additional consideration to existing prime contracts and subcontracts and in new prime contracts and subcontracts which otherwise meet the conditions of this memorandum.

b. Indemnification of prime contractors and subcontractors may be provided under this authorization only when the Government will receive the benefit of all cost savings, if any, to the prime contractors and its subcontractors at every tier.

8. All contract indemnification clauses shall comply with applicable provisions of NASA PR Part 10. The applicable requirements of NASA PR, Part 17 shall be complied with.

9. This authorization is given upon condition that each prime contractor is approved by me and that such contractor maintains financial protection of such type and in such amounts as may be determined by me in writing to be appropriate under the circumstances. Each prime contractor shall provide a statement of applicable financial protection through the cognizant NASA contracting officer for my review and determination. In making this determination, I shall take into account such factors as the availability, cost and terms of private insurance, self-insurance and other proof of financial responsibility and workman's compensation insurance.

10. When indemnification provisions are included in a prime contract pursuant to the authority of this decision, the cognizant contracting officer shall immediately submit directly to the Contract Adjustment Board a report referencing this decision and containing the following information: (i) name and address of the contractor, (ii) cognizant NASA installation (iii) contract number and date, and (iv) a brief description of the supplies or services procured under the contract.

11. The actual or potential cost, if any, of the actions hereby authorized is impossible to estimate since it is contingent upon the remote possibility of an occurrence and extent of loss resulting from certain space activities which malfunction. Such an occurrence may never occur; in the event of a major incident, millions of dollars of damage could occur.

12. I find that this action will facilitate the national defense. In the remote event that the Space Transportation System, its cargo or other elements or services used in NASA's space activities malfunctioned causing damage in excess of insurance maintained by contractors and subcontractors, the resulting excess liability could place the contractors and subcontractors continued existence in jeopardy, making those contractors and subcontractors unavailable to continue to support space activities and the Department of Defense. I note that for purposes of the Defense Production Act of 1950, the term national defense is defined as "programs for . . . space, and directly related activity." (50 U.S.C. App. 2152(d)).

THE SECOND PILLAR OF SOUND MONEY

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the second of 10 pillars of sound money entails the principle of free coinage, as propounded by Prof. Antal Fekete. Considering the economic climate and budgetary framework, his commentary is indeed timely.

THE SECOND PILLAR OF SOUND MONEY AND CREDIT: THE PRINCIPLE OF FREE COINAGE

(By Antal E. Fekete)

A CHINESE TALE

Once upon a time money in China consisted of silver coinage issued by the Imperial Treasury. Since time immemorial, the main source of imperial revenue had been seigniorage, due to the limit the emperor placed on the number of silver coins in circulation. Consequently the Imperial Treasury could buy two pounds of silver from the people in exchange for coins containing only one pound, then turn around and mint it into twice as many silver coins. The difference was simply expropriated by the emperor. As a result of this cruel exploitation, people of the Celestial Empire fell into the direst poverty. Money was exceedingly scarce. Parents were selling their children into slavery, and they killed their baby daughters when no takers were found.

The chief mandarin, Kwang, threw himself at the feet of the emperor, pleading thus: "Son of Heavens, have pity. People are suffering. Money is scarce."

The emperor made an edict providing for free coinage. From then on, people could take all the silver to the Treasury, and get the same weight in silver coins in exchange. Seigniorage was abolished. There was a great relief all over the Celestial Empire. A tremendous resurgence of agriculture and industry took hold. The humblest of coolies could pick and choose between jobs. People were becoming so prosperous that husbands started to embellish their wives with choice silver jewelry.

Hardly twelve moons had passed when Kwang threw himself at the feet of the emperor once more and pleaded thus: "Sire, money is still scarce. The people want you to issue paper money in order to augment the circulation of silver coins."

The emperor, who was a wise man, answered: "Kwang, you are talking like a fool. You ask me to restore poverty that I abolished in this country twelve months ago. I have given people the right to put their silver where their mouth is. If money is still scarce, they have only themselves to blame. Let them bring their jewelry to the Treasury, and we shall give them silver coins, pound for pound, and ounce for ounce. If they really think that money is scarce, they have to prove it not by words, but by deeds.

"Remember, Kwang, it is not the abundance of money that makes the people prosperous, but the unencumbered fruits of their own efforts. By the same token, it is not the scarcity of money that impoverishes them, but exploitation that you now try to advocate."

And Kwang went off, tearing his beard, as he lamented: "O Wo! O Fu! O Pe! O Li! And all the two-letter named gods of Cathay! Take pity on our people! For there has come to us an emperor of the Austrian School, who believes that people can lift themselves out of their misery by their own bootstraps! The emperor is deluded by the idea that wealth is created by coolies! He no longer believes that the source of all wealth lies in the power to regulate the money supply!

BEAT SCARCITY

There will always be people who complain that money is scarce. Today, there is no answer to these complaints. In a true sense of the word, everything of value is scarce. The only way to abolish the scarcity of the dollar is to make it lose all its remaining value. And there is a real danger that this is exactly what we are doing.

Money and money-substitutes have never been so abundant as they are today in the United States. Yet, if we are to believe the officers of Continental Illinois, and the directors of the savings banks in Ohio and Maryland, money is excruciatingly scarce in this country.

The only way to stop the vicious agitation against the scarcity of money is to put the power of issue where it belongs, namely, into the hands of the people. This means free coinage of gold. When this is done, every citizen who believes that there is too little money in circulation, can do something about it. He can take his old jewelry or his newly mined gold to the U.S. Mint, and convert it into the gold coins of the realm. After this fundamental right—guaranteed by the Constitution but abolished in 1933—has been restored to the people, all cries about the scarcity of money can be exposed as frivolous gibberish.

LATTER-DAY SLAVES

The principle of free coinage also exposes the exploitation to which the people of the United States have been subjected by the mandarins in the Treasury and on the Federal Reserve Board. The Constitution abolished bondage embodied by seigniorage in this country, but the bureaucrats have reimposed a more cruel seigniorage through the back door.

The rate of extortion in the Celestial Empire of old was 2:1, as silver in the hand of the emperor was worth twice as much purchasing power as the same silver in the hands of the people. Today the rate of extortion in the United States is 33:1. As reported in The New York Times on July 21, 1985, Michael Brown, a spokesman for the United States Mint in Washington, D.C., explained that the Susan B. Anthony dollar, introduced in 1979, cost 3 cents each to make, allowing the government to pocket a profit of 97 cents. Thus, resources in the hands of the Treasury can create 33 times more purchasing power than the same resources in the hands of the people. The extra purchasing power is not created out of the thin air: it is simply extorted from the people.

Mr. Brown used these figures of support his argument against melting down half a billion Anthony dollars which nobody seems to want. If the coins were melted down for the metal, the government would have to take a loss. "And we don't want to add half a billion dollars to the deficit," Mr. Brown was quoted as saying.

The rate of exploitation in the United States would be much higher if the calculation was based on the cost of printing bonds, which the Treasury can turn into cash at the Federal Reserve banks.

THE MOLOCH OF MANAGED MONEY

Irredeemable currency could be made to work in a free country only if every citizen were given the right to print and to dispose of his bonds on the same terms as the Treasury. But this would make the bonds and ultimately the dollar lose their remaining value. Therefore the regime of irredeemable currency can never be made to work, nor can it be made compatible with freedom.

The usurpation of the Constitutional right of free coinage, and the reimposition of bondage embodied by the seigniorage, makes free citizens into slaves of the government.

Moreover, the unemployed are like the innocent female infants in China, earmarked to be sacrificed on the altar of the Moloch of Managed Money.

CUOMO'S ENTERPRISE BILL BOOSTS A PROVEN CONCEPT

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, recently I participated in a news conference with Gov. Mario Cuomo of New York outlining his proposed opportunity zones legislation. This legislation, like the Federal legislation, is designed to encourage community self-help, and they will only be designated in those areas that can demonstrate that they will make the best use of the local talent and voluntary associations. The State program builds upon the proposed Federal legislation by providing a complete package of incentives to revitalize distressed areas. In addition to tax incentives, opportunity zones will include low-interest loans, low-cost power, job training, and technical assistance.

A recent article in Crains New York Business by Dick Cowden, director of the American Association of Enterprise Zones outlines the virtues of Governor Cuomo's State legislation and I recommend it to my colleagues.

CUOMO'S ENTERPRISE BILL BOOSTS A PROVEN CONCEPT

Despite premature reports of the federal legislation's demise, prospects for an urban initiative oriented around enterprise zones actually improve over time as more states pass enabling acts.

Since 1982 a majority of states have adopted some form of zone policy. In the coming weeks California and Oregon will activate their first sets of zones, and late last year Michigan's state legislature established a pilot project in Benton Harbor. Recently Gov. Cuomo weighed in with a proposal for "opportunity zones"—a variation on the theme.

His quiet nod to establishing zones in one of the few large states that has yet to do so is already giving a strong boost to renewed activity in Washington. Housing Secretary Samuel R. Pierce has called for staff recommendations on a possible new federal strategy. The question is whether the administration will again trot out its four-year-old bill for 75 federally designated zones or simply reinforce the states' already field-tested policies.

Zones have become popular because, dollar for dollar, they are a bargain for cities trying to rejuvenate decayed areas at a time of declining federal funding. They typically offer firms a variety of tax incentives that often make acquiring and renovating inner city properties more attractive than moving to suburban sites. To date no one has complained of damaging revenue losses; if the zones attract a new company, the state and local government are more than happy to temporarily forgo the taxes.

Enterprise zones, as implemented by the states, have highlighted an important national issue that Congress and the administration will eventually have to resolve. At stake is the question of what role, if any, the federal government has in promoting redevelopment of declining communities.

Ironically, the Reagan administration, whose credo has been that local ills are best remedied locally, acknowledges a federal responsibility by proposing zones.

By twice killing Senate-passed zone bills, the House of Representatives has stepped out of character to deny federal help for inner cities. Opponents contend that tax abatements proposed in the federal legislation might be used as a reason to further cut existing urban programs. But such arguments have not rung true with officials in charge of operating state-designated zones. They see lawmakers from both parties, under pressure to cut the deficit, preparing to slash budgets—zones or no zones.

In fact, Gov. Cuomo's proposal may relate to the states' anticipation of less federal economic development funding, as well as to their own emerging interest in promoting growth. As outlined in his 1986 State of the State message, Cuomo's policy would provide business financing, job training, lowered energy rates and tax incentives.

Even without a federal designation system, as proposed in the original legislation, some incentives could be keyed to state-designated zones. One suggested means would be to retain incentives now slated for extinction under the tax-reform bill in areas that meet given criteria of distress and that have combined state and local support for redevelopment. Another method would give statutory and administrative priority to the states' zones in a way that provides a safety net for poorer areas as Washington cuts urban funding.

Whatever course is chosen, the goal should be to complement state and local actions that promote reinvestment in decaying areas.

ISSUE OF CONTRA FUNDING

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, continuing in my effort to bring pertinent information on the issue of Contra funding to the attention of my colleagues, I trust they will find this March 13, 1986, George Will article from the Globe-Times of interest.

SENSORY DEPRIVATION OVERPOWERS IN MOSCOW

(By George Will)

Moscow.—To watch dusk descend on Moscow is to watch a city vanish. It is as though it sinks into the sandy soil that limits high-rise construction in this horizontal capital. To see Moscow at night is to be struck by what you do not see, and to long for neon—the electronic exuberance that is freedom's signature in the form of capitalism's crackling energy.

A wit, seeing Times Square for the first time, said: It must be beautiful if you can't read. That is somewhat true of Moscow, bedecked with red banners proclaiming slogans that are punctuated by the obligatory exclamation mark. It is a city without what we call "commercial clutter." It is a city where mass appetites are not expressed and satisfied in the populist democracy of the marketplace.

An American in Moscow can suffer an ailment diagnosable as "PSD"—Pointer Sisters Deprivation. The absence of popular expression of the sensual side of life is a telling facet of the Soviet system. In the West, the social atmosphere may be overdosed with aphrodisiacs, However, a sojourn in an antisensualist society such as this underscores a theme of Orwell's "1984": Eroticism is feared by a regime that feels threatened by any realm of privacy or flicker of spontaneity.

The sensory deprivation here is highlighted by exceptions to it, such as a performance of the Bolshoi Ballet in the ornate theater which, like almost all things pleasing to the eye, was built before 1917. A sumptuous performance of "Sleeping Beauty" is attended by 2,500 of le tout Moscow and a few visitors. The performance seems all the more ethereal and remote because it is such a stylized, tantalizing glimpse of life lived beyond the gray walls of ideological categories.

"Sleeping Beauty," an echo of an earlier age, was performed the evening of the day the Communist Party congress echoed with Gorbachev's thoughts on matters cultural. He denounced literature, art and scholarship in which, "under the guise of national originality, attempts are made to depict in idyllic tones reactionary nationalist and religious survivals contrary to our ideology, the socialist way of life, and our scientific world outlook." He said "the people" need "only a literature that is ideologically motivated," and not "showy verbosity on paper, petty dirty-linen-washing, time-serving and utilitarianism." This is Gorbachev, voice of the "bold new generation," expressing Stalinist values with Khrushchevian crudity.

The Soviet Union is Third World country with first-class missiles at the disposal of a regime with a mind that never even rises to the second-rate. The morning of the day Gorbachev spent declaiming about the glittering high-tech future of the "qualitatively new" Soviet experience, a visitor sought a bit of breakfast in a lobby refreshment area in a hotel so grand, by Soviet standards, that only a few privileged Soviet citizens are allowed in.

Visitor: I'd like some buttered toast.

Waiter: There is no toast today.

Visitor: What do you have?

Waiter: Cheese or ham sandwiches.

Visitor: I'll take a cheese sandwich.

Waiter: The cheese is not fresh.

Valdimir Bukovsky, the exiled dissident, says that Soviet public-health problems—high infant mortality, low birthrates (below replacement rates among some nationalities, including Russians), increasing birth defects—indicate that the Soviet crisis has gone beyond mere disillusionment and apathy to "biological exhaustion, a fatigue of human material."

Certainly the sullenness and rudeness that Westerners living here find so wearing reflects the grinding-down experience of going around with an empty bag, jostling with others in the search for the necessities of life, potatoes here, perhaps some meat over there. And the inessentials? There are hundred of people outside a store because it has received a shipment of wallpaper and who knows when there will be more. The communist aristocracy is, of course, exempt from these rigors. That aristocracy is another tradition. A commander of a Soviet ship in a 1937 naval review was addressed as "Arch-Comade."

The vigor of a society can, in the short run, be stimulated by revolutionary ardor or wartime discipline. But over the long haul, social vigor is a function of fun, in this sense: People will be more energetic, creative, productive, fecund when they are enjoying themselves. A capacity for enjoyment is grounded in self-esteem. That is difficult to develop in a society in which the individual is considered a mere manifestation of this or that collective category ("worker," "peasant," "vanguard"). Individual attributes and achievements are made to seem trivial in comparison with ideological goals—such as "new Soviet man"—by which the collectivist society is lashed into discipline.

The Soviet regime, too, lacks self-esteem. It aches for "respect" from the world." But it sends five KGB agents to confiscate the books of an 85-year-old woman. Perhaps three agents could have done the job, but the regime is proud of running a full-employment society.

PROTECTION IS AN ABUSE OF PATRIOTISM

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I am concerned that my colleagues, with the best intentions, will succumb to pressure from various quarters to enact what a recent editorial by Harold Evans in U.S. News & World Report called an "abuse of patriotism." I am referring to protectionist measures designed to insulate various industries from the effects of foreign imports.

Historically, protectionist measures have been a dismal failure at saving jobs and maintaining a sound economy. We must not forget the lessons taught by the disastrous Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930, which contributed to the Great Depression.

Protectionism is a costly method of trying to save jobs. If the President had supported the ITC recommendations for the shoe industry, the average cost per saved job would have been $50,000 to $80,000, in an industry where the average yearly salary is $14,000. Also, shielding industry from market signals with import restrictions allows firms to delay painful measures to modernize, leaving them less competitive once protection is removed. In the end, instead of saving jobs and fostering growth, protectionism discourages innovation and efficiency, further delaying the day when American products will compete more favorably with imports.

Tariffs are costly to consumers as well. In 1984, restrictions on clothing, sugar, and autos cost consumers an extra $14–$20 billion for those products, according to a report by the Republican Study Committee. This same report states that quotas are equivalent to a 23-percent income tax surcharge on low-income families. Mr. Evans cites economist Michael Munger, whose data shows that the average family of four pays between $1,500 and $2,000 a year due to protectionism. Tariffs are a hidden tax paid by all consumers, including those least able to afford it. Ultimately, protectionism sacrifices the general interest in a poor and unsuccessful attempt to aid the special interests.

Protectionism invites retaliation by our trading partners and will substantially affect consumers by limiting product choice and denying them access to low-priced goods. Rather than running to the false security of protectionism, we need to attack the real sources of our trade imbalance. We should devote our energies to our fundamental problem: deficit reduction through sound fiscal policies. Once we begin to address our own shortcomings, we can attack unfair trading practices when and where they exist.

Mr. Evans' editorial appeared in the February 3, 1986, issue of U.S. News & World Report. I commend the article to your attention and include it here.

AN ABUSE OF PATRIOTISM

If all the economists in the world were placed end to end, they wouldn't reach a conclusion. That has been the jibe ever since Adam Smith invented the dismal science. So here is an oddity. There is today one thing on which economists resoundingly agree. Yet on this single issue the economists, having stumbled on a common view, are spurned by the people and the politicians.

The issue is protectionism. Economists are at one in saying quotas and tariffs that restrict trade are bad for the country and the world. They are right. Textile workers in Georgia and shoemakers in Missouri and steelmen in Pittsburgh respond with Grover Cleveland's slogan in 1887: "It is a condition which confronts us, not a theory." The condition, as they see it, is factories closed because of our imports of steel from Europe, blouses from India and so on. They are right, too.

It is Congress that is wrong in its answer to their plight, and the public that is wrong—yes, the public—in going along with the majority in the House and Senate who have dreamed up 300 bills to tax and limit imports.

Protectionism is a perfect word for describing the fogged and ugly reality entailed in mugging free trade. It wouldn't get very far on its own, but it hitches a ride on another ism that is honest and noble: Patriotism. None of us likes the idea of fellow citizens being jettisoned from their crafts, and when they seem to be the victims of cheating foreigners, emotion replaces economic reason. Congressman disguise their demagogy with high-minded expressions of concern for the trade deficit, another real issue for which protectionism is the wrong answer.

The truth is the protectionism doesn't protect, and it isn't patriotic. It preserves some jobs for a time, but it postpones innovation. Textiles have been protected for 25 years and still cannot offer secure livelihoods. Protectionism does not protect prosperity; it imperils it. Import taxes and quotas lock up labor and capital and add to inflation. The textile worker, like everyone else, has to find $600 more for a U.S. car because of quotas on automobiles. Altogether, thanks to protectionism, consumers paid $4.5 billion more for cars in 1984, $1 billion more for footwear. An American family of four, according to economist Michael Munger, pays between $1,500 and $2,000 a year because of protectionism. That is more than most families pay in federal income tax.

It is patriotic to buy a "Made in the U.S.A." jacket out of good feeling. Do it with a smile. It is altogether different to have government interfere with free choice. It is un-American. And it is a funny form of patriotism that punishes the poor. The duties on shoes, clothing and sugar have the same effect on families with incomes of $9,350 as an income-tax surcharge of 25 to 66 percent.

But what do we do about jobs, the foreign-trade deficit—and shouldn't we get mad at the Japanese anyway? The answer is to expand free trade, not diminish it. Nine million new jobs have been created in five years of relatively free trade. Five million American jobs in exports are at risk from retaliation in a trade war. The world is dangerously poised, just as it was when Congress "patriotically" passed the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act in 1930 and triggered the Great Depression. As for textile jobs and the like, the answer is money. It costs $74,000 to protect one job in the television-receiver industry where $22,900 is the average wage, $110,000 to protect one job in steel. Put that sort of money into retraining. Make it easy for workers to move and to take their pensions.

The Japanese? Of course we should get tough—where they are provably unfair. The Institute for International Economics has shown that if Japan dismantled its import barriers it would cut America's trade deficit by $5 billion to $8 billion—but this would be canceled out if we took down our barriers, too. It is not the Japanese who are to blame for our trade deficit.

Grover Cleveland was right. But "the condition" he challenged was high tariffs; protectionism was the theory then. Delusion is a better term for it. President Reagan sees that. He has vetoed one bill. He is giving a strong lead for the new trade talks in Geneva. He deserves the support of every American against the fallacies flying a false flag on Capitol Hill.

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM JONES

HON. JOSEPH J. DioGUARDI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. DioGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to William Jones who will be honored at a gala party on March 22 for 25 years of dedicated service to the Conservative Party.

Mr. Jones was one of the founders of the Yonkers Conservative Party and has served on many committees and appointments since that time. Some of his more prominent achievements are; city leader—Yonkers Conservative Party for 6 years, mayoral appointment to the human rights committee for 2 years, mayoral appointment to the parks and recreation board for 2 years, third ward leader for 10 years and sixth ward leader for 2 years. He rose to offices of treasurer—for the last 16 years—and president—for the last 6 years—of the Conservative Club of Yonkers.

Mr. Jones was a pioneer of the Conservative Party. He was a Conservative before it was fashionable to be a Conservative, never compromising his ideals despite the odds he was up against. He ran Conservative candidates who were badly defeated yet he never lost sight of the goals of his party. The Conservative movement has made great strides over the past three decades because of people like William Jones, who recognize the beauty and greatness of American liberty and pledge their lives to defend and promote it.

Thank you Mr. Speaker

COMPREHENSIVE TEST BAN IS VERIFIABLE

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a very important article which appeared in the Wall Street Journal today. This article, which I am having reprinted below, states that by using a new seismic testing device, the United States is capable of detecting Soviet nuclear explosions which amount to a fraction of a kiloton.

The repercussions of this are twofold. First, U.S. geology experts are now in near unanimity that the Soviets have not violated an earlier, unratified treaty limiting the force of nuclear explosions. But far more important, this development puts to rest the administration's charge that a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty with the Soviet Union would be unverifiable.

I, thereby, urge my colleagues to read this article and join with me in urging the President to adhere to the resolution recently passed by the House, House Joint Resolution 3, and to begin serious and prompt negotiations toward a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty.

WHITE HOUSE CLAIMS OF SOVIET TEST BAN CHEATING ARE CHALLENGED BY NEW BOMB DETECTION SYSTEM

(By John J. Fialka)

One day last summer, the Soviet Union triggered a tiny nuclear explosion at a test site in eastern Kazakhstan. The blast amounted to a fraction of a kiloton, a mere hiccup in a world where 150-kiloton weapons are tested regularly. (A kiloton is the energy produced by exploding 1,000 tons of TNT.)

But the explosion registered as a strong, clear signal at a new seismic testing station in Norway, 2,800 miles away. The result meant that, after 20 years and at least a half billion dollars' worth of effort, the U.S. capability to detect and measure Soviet tests had suddenly grown by as much as tenfold.

The matter of how much the U.S. really knows about Soviet testing is an arcane but politically charged issue that was revived last week when Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev announced his country will continue its eight-month-long moratorium on nuclear tests until the U.S. tests its next weapon.

Despite a recent House resolution calling for negotiations on a nuclear test ban, and increasing criticism from the scientific community, the Reagan administration continues to oppose the Soviet proposal. The administration argues that a comprehensive test ban would be unverifiable and that the Soviets have probably violated an earlier test-limitation treaty.

IMPROVED DETECTION HARDWARE

But the new, improved detection hardware being developed by the U.S. has produced data that convinces many experts the U.S. has consistently overestimated the yield of Soviet tests and that U.S. accusations of Soviet cheating may therefore be false. The same overestimates also may have led the Pentagon to overstate the size of some of the weapons in Russia's vast nuclear arsenal.

What's more, the improvement in the equipment has been so great that some experts believe a test ban would now be verifiable, despite the administration's denials.

The device in Norway, operated jointly by the U.S. and the Norweigian governments, was designed as a prototype of an unmanned seismic test station that might be used in or around the Soviet Union if U.S. and Soviet arms-control negotiators ever agree on a test ban or further testing limitation that would permit verification inside each other's country. The U.S. is currently negotiating for sites in a number of other countries, including China, according to government officials.

What's different about the Norway device is that it measures high-frequency shock waves that usually vanish beyond 1,200 miles from a blast. Seismic signals extending beyond that range, which have normally been used by the U.S. and other countries monitoring Soviet tests, tend to carry less useful information.

Data from the Norway experiments, according th U.S. scientists, confirm previous suspicion that testing in the Soviet Union tends to amplify shock waves because much of Russia sits on a thick, resonant bed of granite. Meanwhile, most U.S. anaylses of Soviet testing have been extrapolated from U.S. explosions in the Navada desert where the soft, underlying layers of sediment tend to muffle or understate the power of nuclear shocks.

One of the studying this anomaly, according to Lynn R. Sykes, a geologist at Columbia University, is a "near unanimity" in the U.S. geological community that the Soviets haven't violated an earlier, unratified treaty that confines nuclear tests to a maximum of 150 kilotons. The Reagan administration position, as recently announced by President Reagan and Kenneth Adelman, director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, is that there has been a "likely violation" of the treaty in a number of Soviet tests.

Mr. Sykes goes further to agree that the new seismic test station in Norway could lead to the deployment of a network of stations that would give the U.S. "high confidence" that it could verify Soviet compliance with a nuclear test ban.

The assertions of Mr. Sykes and other experts have set off a few shock waves of their own, especially at the nation's weapons laboratories and at the Nevada test site, where bomb designers and weapons engineers have traditionally opposed test ban proposals. These opponents insist they can't reliably maintain the nation's nuclear arsenal or move ahead with the president's Strategic Defense Initiative, also known as Star Wars, without regular testing of weapons and new materials.

In the same laboratories however, there are people who are promoting the potential of the new seismic equipment. The Norwegian device, which is called the Norwegian Regional Seismic Array, was designed by scientists at the Energy Department's Sandia Laboratory in New Mexico and its Livermore Laboratory in California.

"What we have said is that you can't support the hypothesis that they (the Soviets) have violated the treaty," says Milo Nordyke, who heads the verification program at Livermore. Mr. Nordyke agrees with Mr. Sykes that the U.S. has overestimated Soviet test results by using Nevada test data, but he thinks there is more work to be done before the U.S. could field a system that could deter Soviet cheating.

Mr. Nordyke notes that many of the procedures that would be used by a U.S. verification team in the Soviet Union were accepted by Soviet negotiators during the late 1970s, when the U.S. negotiators came close to completing a comprehensive test ban. (The draft treaty was withdrawn after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.)

One result of the negotiations was that a number of U.S. scientists, including Mr. Nordyke, were given the daunting task of figuring out how U.S. inspection teams could wire the vast Soviet land mass for sound, if such a treaty were actually ratified. They developed a network of five relatively simple, unmanned, automatic seismic stations to measure the shocks from U.S. nuclear tests. To make sure they could survive the winter in Soviet Siberia, near the nuclear test sites, they are located in such places as Yellowknife, in the Canadian Northwest Territories, and in upstate New York.

The stations, covered by white, fiberglass bubbles, are designed to sense slight movements of the earth and to radio them to the U.S. via satellite. Any tampering with them or their sensitive seismographs would automatically destroy their computer memory and trigger an alert signal to the U.S. control center.

According to one of Mr. Nordyke's colleagues at Livermore, Willard J. Hannon Jr., the argument among geologists isn't whether these machines and the more sophisticated version in Norway could do the job, but over how many of them it would take to establish a reliable verification system in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Hannon envisions a network of at least 30 of the devices installed at various places in the Soviet Union. They would be combined with a U.S. inspection team that had the right to do periodic maintenance on them and to request permission to visit areas where suspicious, unexplained explosions are detected.

PROPOSALS ON THE TABLE

While this may seem far-fetched to some people, Mr. Hannon notes that proposals to carry out parts of an effective verification system are already on the bargaining table. One element fell into place last August when President Reagan invited Soviet experts to come to the Nevada Test Site and measure a U.S. shot. One device that could have been used, according to Mr. Nordyke, is a cable buried near the blast hole that would allow the Soviets to determine the exact yield of a U.S. weapon.

If the U.S. were allowed to reciprocate, Mr. Nordyke believes that both sides could calibrate their seismic equipment and develop a common data base that could end complaints of cheating. Mr. Gorbachev promptly rejected this offer, but more recently he made one of his own that has U.S. experts wondering just how much the Russians will accept.

"We declare unequivocally that verification is no problem, so far as we are concerned," said the Soviet leader, adding that a reciprocal test ban could be monitored by multinational, on-site inspection teams, if necessary.

While Soviet negotiators haven't disclosed any details of such a plan, U.S. scientists and engineers point out that technically, if not politically, the two sides are coming closer.

THE EFFECTIVE SCHOOLS AND EVEN START ACT

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, for several years now this Nation has been involved in a very serious effort to reform certain aspects of its education systems. These efforts have led to a volume of activity at the State and local school levels to improve the functioning of schools and to provide reasonable resources with which to implement these improvements.

At the Federal level education programs of proven success have seen serious erosions in their funding. This factor has affected the ability of these federally funded programs to deliver educational services to those eligible students who have critical educational needs. It is, of course, imperative that all sectors of this society, including government, recognize and respond to the expressed demands of its citizenry for a well-functioning education system. There are such systems in the Nation, operating effectively, and within the framework of excellence and equity. These education systems are providing students with the learning tools that will competently prepare them for the kind of economic competition this Nation faces worldwide.

In this regard, I am committed to providing the necessary leadership in this Congress which will help to bring greater excellence and equity in the Nation's schools. This is why I have introduced bills in this Congress and the last Congress designed to improve school effectiveness. This is why I am an advocate of the effective schools movement. This is also why I have joined with my colleague from Pennsylvania, Congressman WILLIAM GOODLING, in authorizing and introducing the Effective Schools and Even Start Act. This bill is unique because it is designed to enhance a child's very early pre-school education; it is designed to provide basic education skills to that child's functionally illiterate parent; it is designed to help that parent learn under a supervised program ways to teach a 3- to 7-year-old child; it is designed to help school administrators, teachers, and other school staff, parents and community, learn how to organize a school's effectiveness through the school's analysis of all of its functions, and to then develop and implement plans which will vastly improve those functions.

Mr. GOODLING and I believe that we are on the right track with this bill, because there is supportable research, study, and demonstration that the elements of school effectiveness, parent education, and early childhood education programs, work to improve overall school improvement efforts.

This bill will not require new funding because it calls for the utilization of chapter 2 funds and adult education funds. The bill articulates a reasonable targeting of these funds at the State and local level, with the State still retaining control and administration of the funds for the effective schools portion of the bill. We have been encouraged by the reception that this proposal has received in the education community. We are looking forward to working with our colleagues in this most important area of endeavor, and urge their support of the effective schools and even start bill. The text of the bill and a section-by-section analysis are presented for our colleagues' review and comment.

H.R.—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Effective Schools and Even Start Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) successful education of the Nation's children depends on effective learning that occurs at home and on effective teaching in the Nation's schools;

(2) increasing the academic skills of children before they begin school and increasing school effectiveness will enhance the learning and achievement of children throughout their educational careers;

(3) parental involvement in preparing their children for school will improve a child's ability to obtain an even start in school and assist in early identification of problems which might hinder a child's readiness for school;

(4) research indicates that many parents are not full partners in the education of their own children because many of them lack basic literacy skills;

(5) participation by parents in the education of their children can be increased by helping them to acquire specific skills and strategies needed to work with their children;

(6) there are schools that are effectively teaching the Nation's children, and school children are increasing their learning and achievement in schools that have been identified as being effective;

(7) there is an increasing body of experience and knowledge built on research which indicates that school effectiveness can be increased; and

(8) where school improvement programs (based on effective school principles and practices) have been instituted, student academic achievement often increases, especially in schools serving poor, minority, or educationally deprived students.

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE SCHOOLS PROGRAM.

(a) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this section to assist State and local educational agencies in increasing school effectiveness through effective schools programs to improve student achievement, student behavior, teaching, learning, and school management.

GROWTH AND REBUILDING IN THE BRONX

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I want to share with my colleagues an article from Crain's New York Business describing the economic and social vitality growing in the Bronx. As the article points out, the Bronx deserves a second look. Look at the strong business climate; look at the new construction of houses, apartments, and businesses, and look at the population growth in the Bronx.

Simply put, the Bronx is back! Investments are coming into the Bronx. People are coming back into the Bronx! And communities are being rebuilt in the Bronx. The article in Crain's paints a picture of a Bronx on the move. A Bronx shedding the image of devastation and destruction; on the contrary, it is becoming a Bronx of delight and development. I hope my colleagues will read the Crain's article.

CAROL PASCO'S BRONX—AND WHY YOU NEED TO KNOW ABOUT IT

(By Mark Liff)

Carol Pasco's Bronx is little like the Bronx I remember while growing up. I was born on the Concourse (Bronxites don't call it Grand Concourse or Grand Boulevard, like those Hagstrom maps and foreigners) and grew up off West Farms Square.

Gerry Byrne, my boss and publisher of Crain's New York Business, grew up a home run's distance from Yankee Stadium (with Bob Fane of Young & Rubicam, the ad agency). We all remember our blocks and the street games we played: stoop ball and stickball. But we need to see Carol Pasco's Bronx to understand what the borough has become.

We need Carol Pasco's Bronx because we've been brainwashed by the image of Fort Apache. That's what cops in the 41st precinct called their South Bronx outpost 15 years ago—and that's what everyone thought the whole Bronx was like. Those same cops in the four-one now call their place Little House on the Prairie, because it's about the only thing still standing there.

Carol Pasco's Bronx is far more than that little patch of turf, which also is struggling to come back. Carol Pasco's Bronx truly is a borough of rebuilding and of hope. Carol Pasco does public relations for a living. You wouldn't think there would be enough fee-paying clients in the Bronx to count on one hand. But sit down with Carol Pasco and you'll see quickly that you're wrong.

Sit down with Carol Pasco for antipasto and veal picante at Joe & Joe's, on Castle Hill Avenue. Joe & Joe's is a good barometer of the borough's strong business climate: It's jammed with local business persons at lunch and loyal devotees at dinner, with good reason—huge portions, low prices and owners who take an interest in their customers. There aren't many of these local places left.

Family-owned Joe & Joe's has been around for 46 years; some of the staff goes back decades. The restaurant reflects the borough's rebuilding. A computerized meal/inventory system was installed in February. And the "Bronx Room" was fixed up to add 47 great memory-tugging photos of the Bronx in the old days. So who says the Bronx isn't up to date? Go see for yourself.

Sit down with Carol Pasco in her office—a refurbished two-family house—on Williamsbridge Road and talk about some of her clients: Dick Gidron, who has the biggest, black-owned Cadillac dealership in the country; Jose Serrano, the state senator who gave Stanley Simon a scare last year in the borough president's race; the Bronx Chamber of Commerce. They're all comers. (For those into machine politics, Stanley Friendman's Bronx organization clubhouse is directly across Williamsbridge Road from the Pasco place.)

Sit in her car and drive up Fordham Road toward the Concourse. See the commitment Bank Leumi has made to help rebuild the once-thriving business hub. Everyone took the No. 20, 36 or 1 bus to Alexander's there on Saturdays, then perhaps took in a movie at the Loew's Paradise, where lights sparkled overhead like twinkling stars.

Sit down with Carol Pasco at Throgg's Neck and the former Shorehaven beach club and see the pricey condos going up on the waterfront. And those one-family homes in Pelham Gardens (the cognoscenti know that's off Williamsbridge Road) can now go for $165,000.

There's much growth and rebuilding in the Bronx. Lillian Roberts, the state's industrial commissioner, recently reported that 2,000 new construction jobs were added there.

No borough has taken the pasting the Bronx has. It deserves some good ink. It merits a second look from businesses and potential residents alike. And a chance to rebuild.

REMARKS OF HON. DAVID BONIOR IN RESPONSE TO PRESIDENT'S RADIO ADDRESS

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, on March 1, our colleague, DAVID BONIOR, of Michigan, delivered an eloquent Democratic response to the President's weekly radio address.

DAVE convincingly made the case against granting the administration's request for $100 million in aid to the Contras fighting in Nicaragua. At a time when we are slashing funding for vital domestic services and cutting out constructive foreign initiatives, this House must look hard at a request for additional money for a dead-end war that can't be won.

The Contra war does nothing to address the root causes of violence in Central America—poverty, injustice, and oppression. It increases, rather than reduces, foreign intervention in the region. The way to move toward peace and democracy in Nicaragua is, as DAVE BONIOR says, to implement "a program of peace, not war."

I commend his remarks to my colleagues' attention:

Hello, I am Congressman Dave Bonior from Michigan.

This week, the president has once again asked the American people to provide increased funding for the Contras fighting to overthrow the government in Nicaragua.

It is not the administration's first request.

Back in 1981, the administration requested $19 million. Last year, they requested $27 million. And this week, the president requested $100 million; a huge, nearly four-fold increase.

And if this request is granted, it will surely not be the last.

Today the Contra war is already in its fifth year.

That is a long time. My daughter, who may enter college in just two more years, was still in grade school when the war begin.

Five years is longer than the U.S. involvement in World War I or World War II or the Korean War. Only one modern war has lasted longer, the Vietnam War.

Yet today, the Contras do not hold a single town in Nicaragua, not one. We are caught in a cycle of failure, pouring more and more U.S. tax dollars into an uncontrolled and unending war.

Mr. President, you call the Contras freedom fighters and compare them to our founding fathers. Listen to someone who has spent time behind the lines with the Contras.

Christopher Dickey, a respected foreign correspondent, describes them this way in his recent book:

"The Contra commanders . . . are men addicted to violence. Their brutality is indiscriminate—their victims include government officials (health workers, agricultural specialists, teachers, all carefully selected targets for torture, rape and murder) . . ."

A just released report by Amnesty International, winner of the Nobel Peace Prize for its work on human rights, describes the Contras' treatment of the people they capture:

"Witnesses have described . . . execution style killings, in which captives were bound, tortured and their throats slit . . ."

Is that a description of George Washington or Thomas Jefferson? With this campaign of terror, is it any wonder that the Contras have not sparked a popular, democratic movement inside Nicaragua.

Mr. President, you tell us that the Contra war is necessary to defend our allies in Central and Latin America. Yet just two weeks ago, leaders from the eight leading countries in the region came to Washington with a clear message. "Latin Ministers Urge U.S. to Halt Contra Aid," the headlines ran.

Yes, Americans have reason for concern about the direction of the Nicaraguan government—its censorship of the press, and its conflicts with the church. And we have serious security concerns both for ourselves and for Nicaragua's neighbors—the military build-up, Nicaragua's close ties with Cuba and the Soviet Union.

But our allies in the region and the neighbors of Nicaragua those who have the greatest stake in the issue—have proposed a solution. They have developed a bold statement of principles that has been signed by all the affected Central American countries, including Nicaragua.

It calls for the verifiable reductions in military strength on all sides. It calls for the elimination of foreign military advisers in every country, including the Cubans and Soviet Bloc advisers in Nicaragua. And it calls for each country to halt efforts to export revolution. And it calls for democracy.

Guatemala is a country that knows the price of freedom, because it has just elected the first civilian president in decades. His courageous call for peace has given new life to this proposal.

Argentina is also a country that knows the price of freedom, because it has just succeeded in replacing a military dictatorship with a new democracy. Argentina's foreign minister calls this proposal "the only peaceful road to resolve the problems" in Central America.

Here is a program of peace, not war.

But it requires first that the administration stop the Contra war. Without that first step, success is impossible.

There is a decision to be made. The choice is ours, and it must be made now. We can opt for more Contra terrorism, or give peace a chance. We can listen to our allies and the neighbors of Nicaragua, or charge ahead with a war that no one else wants.

It was not armed intervention that brought democracy to the Philippines, but diplomacy. It was not the denials of election fraud that brought democracy to the Philippines, but a hard-headed recognition of the abuses rampant in the Marcos government.

We need to apply those lessons to the Contra war.

My daughter was in grade school when the Contra war began. If we add another five years to the five years that have already run, the war will still be underway as she prepares to graduate from college.

My generation lived its young adult life under the shadow of the Vietnam War—a shadow that ultimately claimed 57,000 lives.

I want something better for my children, and for your children. Peace is possible. Let's end the Contra war.

GOLD AND DEBT

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the Lehrman Institute is a private foundation that was established in 1972 to encourage an interdisciplinary approach to the study of public policy. It sponsors individual research and group studies that stress the historical origins and long-term implications of contemporary economic, social, and foreign policy issues.

Prof. Antal E. Fekete of the Memorial University of Newfoundland in St. John's, has been asked to contribute a paper to the institute's critical economic issues seminar series. His paper is a new departure in theoretical economics, revealing the role that gold plays in supporting a country's debt structure, and in controlling its growth.

GOLD AND DEBT

(By Antal E. Fekete)

The most important economic property of gold is not to be found in gold's mythical power to stabilize the price level. Rather, it is to be found in gold's power to stabilize interest rates at the lowest possible level consistent with the economy. To understand how it works, we must first consider the proposition that individuals are willing to carry gold in their balance sheet without any promise of return. This is implicit in the mechanism known as the Fullarton effect. It was John Fullarton who observed in 1842 that if the rate of interest falls too far (falls below the rate of marginal time preference, we might add), then the bondholders will keep selling their bonds, and stay invested in gold, thus forcing the rate of interest to return to more attractive levels (i.e., to the rate of marginal time preference). Thus gold furnishes the mechanism whereby bondholders can validate time preference as the lowest rate to which yields on bonds may fall.

Note that the Fullarton effect fails to operate under the regime of irredeemable currency precisely because individuals would not carry more than a nominal amount of cash, and banks are forced to pay interest on their checking account deposits. In this situation bondholders have no way to validate their time preference. Staying invested in cash would be tantamount to jumping from the frying pan into the fire. Holding cash is a form of extending credit at zero interest, and would be counter-productive if your aim is to force an increase of interest rates.

In other words, the regime of irredeemable currency corrupts the mechanism which makes the rate of interest a positive quantity, and opens the way to wild currency and interest rate manipulations by the monetary authority. John Maynard Keynes understood this very well and did his best to oust gold from his system.

The property of gold that individuals are willing to carry it without any promise of return, in virtually unlimited quantities, has far-reaching consequences. Gold is the only monetary asset which at the same time is not the liability of someone else. Thus gold is the ultimate extinguisher of debt. Without it debt can be shifted but not extinguished. This suggests that gold has a unique role to play in the checks-and-balances mechanism of the debt-structure, that is, in the mechanism regulating the rate of interest. Other monetary assets, whatever qualities they may have, lack this regulatory capacity. The removal of gold from the system will throw the credit markets to the winds. The bond market under the regime of irredeemable currency is all sails and no anchor. As interest rates catch the chill-fever syndrome, the allocation mechanism for capital goods—without which capitalism cannot operate in the long run—gets destroyed. Not only do interest rates get destabilized, but their volatility is also increasing. Bond-speculation, rather than alleviating the problem, is aggravating it.

We have seen that, under the gold standard, there is a lower limit, determined by time preference, below which the rate of interest cannot fall. Now we shall see that, likewise, there is an upper limit, determined by marginal productivity, above which the rate of interest shall not rise. Indeed, if there was a tendency for the rate of interest to rise indefinitely, the owners of capital goods would sell out and invest the proceeds into bonds, in order to benefit from the higher yields. This activity of the capitalists tends to push up bond prices, that is, to push down the rate of interest, and keep it at a certain level we may call the marginal productivity of capital. This analysis assumes that wage rates are rigid, but the restriction can be removed without changing the argument essentially. If the marginal productivity of capital does in fact depend on the marginal productivity of labor, and vice versa, then we may pair off capital goods and laborers and argue in terms of units consisting of such pairs. The marginal productivity (of these units) is just the upper limit above which the rate of interest may not rise.

Moreover, the spread between marginal time preference and marginal productivity cannot be arbitrarily wide. In substance, this spread depends on the cost of shipping capital goods from one manufacturing center to the next. In more detail, let the rate of marginal productivity be substantially higher than the rate of time preference in a certain manufacturing center. Then it would be in the interest of capitalists to keep importing capital goods to that center. In the end, the wider availability of capital goods would close the gap between the rate of marginal productivity and the rate of marginal time preference, and the variation of the rate of interest would be confined to the narrow band between those two rates.

However, once more, the regime of irredeemable currency corrupts this fine mechanism, by removing the upper limit which caps the variation of the rate of interest, as we shall now see.

The value of irredeemable currency is a plaything in the hands of currency managers and in the hands of speculators. On average, it keeps depreciating. This depreciation may be camouflaged by the fact that various currencies may depreciate at various rates, because then one currency may appreciate relative to any other which depreciates faster, even though in absolute terms all the currencies depreciate. This was the case with the dollar during the 5-year period ending in February, 1985, giving rise to the agitation that the value of the "strong" dollar should be brought down (meaning that the depreciation of the dollar be stepped up.)

Since all the pressures work for faster depreciation, and no force works for stabilization, the effect is continual depreciation. Under these conditions, periodic confidence crises are inevitable, as the depreciation of certain currencies get out of control. Everybody becomes a seller, and there are no buyers of these currencies. The monetary authorities in charge may try to revive confidence by allowing the rate of interest to soar. In the United States, the Fed can do this by the simple device of slowing down its open market purchases of federal securities. The reduced demand causes the price of these securities to fall, and the result is a corresponding rise in the rate of interest. Note that this is a sheer monetary play, which fails to address a single one of the underlying causes of the confidence crisis. Yet it can happen that this monetary trick actually stems the confidence crisis. Speculators reason that bonds are cheap and ready for a correction. The rally in the bond market brings the flight from the currency to a halt, and may even reverse it. It would, however, be dangerous to build a theory on this confidence trick, even if it works repeatedly. There is simply no guarantee that the speculators in the bond market will change their mind, once bond prices have fallen far enough. Even if they change their mind, the damage may be too great and the destruction of the value of the currency may just follow the destruction of bond values.

The question that concerns us here is what happens to marginal productivity under the monetary regime of high interest rates. As the theory shows, rising interest rates push up marginal productivity, which renders a lot of capital goods and a lot of hands submarginal. A great destruction of capital occurs, destroying a great many employment opportunities. Yet the process remains hidden, for the time being, as the owners of submarginal capital are locked in. They would like to be in bonds, but nobody would buy their capital equipment at this time. Their best strategy is to continue production until their capital goods wear out. At that point they would scrap their capital goods, lay off their workers, and invest the proceeds in high-yield bonds. Thus idle productive capacity and widespread unemployment does not follow on the heels of the regime of high interest rates, but they certainly follow with a lag, which reflects the amortization cycle of capital goods. It is clear that this lag is but a stay of execution. Capital maintenance is suspended, no replacement for aging capital goods is contemplated, and worn capital is mercilessly scrapped. Capital destruction is widespread.

The causal relation between the regime of high interest rates and capital destruction as well as unemployment is not widely recognized. Fed officials act as if they were free to use the carrot-and-stick approach of lower and higher interest rates, in order to "squeeze the inflationary expectations out of the system", regardless of the permanent damage they are causing to capital and labor. In other words, they are using the sledge hammer to do the "fine tuning". Worse still, there is another deleterious effect of the regime of high interest rates: it makes the burden of the debt worse.

We have seen that the regime of irredeemable currency has no mechanism for extinguishing debt, short of default. Debt is merely being shifted around, from the individual debter to the banking system, and from the banking system to the government. But there is no meaningful way the government can retire its debt. When the Treasury pays off the bondholder with Federal Reserve notes, it simply substitutes one form of debt for another. This means that the system has lost its ability to liquidate malignant debt before it starts to metastasize. The total debt can only grow, rain or shine. Even if there is no new net borrowing, the debt would still increase by the amount of interest payable. And the higher the rate of interest, the faster the growth of debt.

These factors conspire to make the total debt grow at a double-digit rate, even if interest rates and the rate of inflation are single digit rates. According to data released by the Council of Economic Advisers, total debt was increasing in the United States at an annual rate of 12.7% in June, 1985 and 14.8% in December, 1985. The question arises whether these increases are healthy. The following table may give us some clues.

[In billions of dollars; D = total debt; ΔD = annual gain in D; GNP = gross national product; ΔGNP = gain in GNP]

	GNP	ΔGNP	D	ΔD	ΔD/ΔGNP
1978	2,250		3,157
1979	2,508	258	3,544	387	1.5
1980	2,732	224	3,882	338	1.5
1981	3,053	321	4,256	374	1.2
1982	3,166	113	4,650	394	3.5
1983	3,402	236	5,177	527	2.2
1984	3,775	373	5,927	750	2.0
1985	3,989	214	6,741	814	3.8

The table clearly shows that the Fed's high interest rate policy has failed to curb the growth of debt. More ominously, while it took less than a dollar and a half of additional debt to produce one dollar worth of goods and services in 1978–1981, it took more than twice as much, or $3 a new debt, to produce the same $1 worth of additional goods and services for the nation in 1982–1985. It should be clear from this that the new debt is not healthy. It is not producing the income necessary to liquidate it. Much of the new debt has no economic justification, other than the postponement of the day of reckoning. We are facing a runaway debt tower, which must grow even faster just to eke out the same meager livelihood for the nation. This growth has its own momentum, as demonstrated by the feed-back effect of increasing as well as decreasing interest rates on the debt. Paradoxically, both work for accelerated growth. Rising rates make the debt grow faster because interest payments do not come out of production but out of borrowing; while falling rates do the same as they encourage new borrowing.

In addition to the inordinate size of the debt and its self-accelerating growth, the construction of the debt is also flawed. The flaw can be exhibited through the composition of the interest-bearing public debt held by private investors, in March, 1985 (see Treasury Bulletin, Spring 1985):

[In billions of dollars]

Maturity:
30 years and over	19
20 to 30 years	55
10 to 20 years	58
5 to 10 years	144
1 to 5 years	367
Within 1 year	464

Thus 75% of the interest-bearing public debt held by private investors is maturing within 5 years, 18% matures in 5–20 years, and the remaining 7% in 20 years or longer.

These ratios are the very opposite of what they should be. For a safe construction of the debt, its bulk should have maturity of 20 years or longer, and a small fraction should have maturity 5 years or less. The fact is that debt maturing in 5 years or less is 'near-money'. At any rate, holders of this part of the debt think of their assets as being very liquid, and they act accordingly. Any indication that they are wrong about the liquidity of their holdings would cause panic. But if this part of the debt is 75% of the total, it will be impossible it localize the panic.

A "healthy" debt-pyramid may look like this:

Let us compare this inverted debt pyramid to a glacier sliding down very slowly, but nonetheless inexorably, from the mountain top to the moraine lake at the bottom where the ice melts and feeds the lake. The glacier has its own dynamics which fits in with the ice melts and feeds the lake. The glacier has its own dynamics which fits in with the climatology of the seasons. Mountain dwellers at the moraine lake think it is safe to build houses and hotels on the lakeshore, in spite of the incredible mass of ice overhanging at the upper echelons of the glacier. But they know that their dwellings are safely isolated from the bulk of that slowly moving ice, and it will take years and decades before that part of the glacier moves closer to their homes. They are not afraid that the glacier might all of a sudden slide into their moraine lake, causing avalanches and floods which would wipe out their village. Their sense of security is well-grounded in the fact that the bulk of the glacier is remote, and lies at higher grounds with lower temperatures, reducing the possibility of an unexpected slide.

Of course, if the glacier had an inverted shape, meaning that the bulk of the ice was in the immediate proximity of the moraine lake where the temperature was milder during much of the year, the picture would change drastically for the mountain dwellers, from the point of view of their safety. They would live under the constant threat of a slide, and mild weather would be a threat for them. They would be well-advised to move to safer grounds, before it is too late.

The simile with the two different shapes of the debt pyramid is quite apt. The debt pyramid is not static, but is moving, almost imperceptibly, towards the pool of money. It would be disaster if an avalanche occurred and the whole debt became money all at once. Principles of safety and prudence suggest that the bulk of the debt pyramid should be isolated from the pool of money by a maturity of several decades, and only a minor part should be near-money, maturing within a few years. If this is the cause, the economy is safe from slides and other disasters. Otherwise, there is a constant threat which is getting greater as time goes by, and the economy cannot function properly under such a threat.

The reason why our debt structure became unbalanced and assumed its present threatening shape is clear. It is our departure from the gold standard. Before 1933, the average maturity of the federal debt was almost 30 years. By 1985, it became 4½ years. There is no way to predict when the avalanche comes. But if the average maturity of the debt keeps shrinking, the slide is inevitable, and the consequences are incalculable.

There is no other way to avert the threatening debt crisis but by converting the entire debt, public and private, to gold-bonded debt. This will achieve two objectives immediately: (1) stable and low rates of interest, which are compatible with the marginal productivity of capital and labor in this country; (2) a lengthening of the maturity structure of the private and public debt. The conversion could be done during a one-year period, as envisaged by the bill H.R. 3794, introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman Dannemeyer.

The first day of the one-year conversion period is designated October 1, 1986 (D-day), and the last day, October 1, 1987 (R-day). Starting on D-day, Eagle bonds would be offered with maturity no less than 25 years and a coupon rate no higher than 2½%. These gold bonds would be used to refinance the entire public debt (worth $2 trillion at last count), as a long-term, low-interest debt. In this manner the federal government would yield the ground of short and medium term debt to the private sector and to other levels of government.

An important feature of the bill is that it does not call for fixing the statutory price of gold until after the conversion of the debt is complete. This will guarantee that the price of gold arrived at is sufficiently high in order to carry our present debt burden without defaults or forced debt liquidation. There is no way to predict what the price of gold will be on R-day. But history indicates that if we resumed while the rate of interest was still too high, then we would jeopardize the success of the operation. As the rate of interest declined further, bond prices would keep increasing which would depress commodity prices and would trigger a deflation. But if we take care of the interest and maturity structure of the debt before we fix the price of gold, then we avoid forced debt liquidations, and success is virtually guaranteed.

Even though we cannot predict what the gold price will be on R-day, we may make certain observations. If the Eagle bonds are not selling well on D-day, then the Treasury will be forced to enter the gold market and buy, because it must have sufficient gold reserves to meet the maturing debt after R-day. Treasury purchases of gold will tend to move the gold price higher, until sufficient incentives have been offered to bondholders to make the conversion to the Eagle bonds. On the other hand, if the Eagle bonds are well-received on D-day, then there will be less upward pressure on the gold price.

In order to have a somewhat clearer idea of what the gold price may be on R-day, consider the fact that there are some outstanding Treasury bonds with 25 years maturity and with a coupon rate of 10%. If the rate of interest were to decline to 2½%, then the holders of these bonds would experience a capital gain of at least 200%. Therefore, if we want to have a conversion on a voluntary basis, then the capital gain accruing to holders of gold should be comparable. Thus, a rule of thumb is that the price of gold on R-day will be in the vicinity of $1,000 per ounce.

The question arises whether a 200% increase in the gold price will be inflationary. The answer is that it need not be and it won't be, unless we allow the Fed and the banking system to build a new credit expansion on the gold flowing into the monetary system. The basic provisions of the Federal Reserve Act of 1913 must be enforced, in particular: (1) the Federal Reserve banks must divest themselves of all their holdings of government securities, (2) they must maintain gold reserves of at least 40% of their deposit and note liabilities, (3) the remaining assets held against the deposit and note liabilities must consist of self-liquidating, short term commercial paper. Gold flowing into the monetary system should be coined and the gold coins freely paid out by the banks. The best way of preventing inflation is to press gold coins (gold certificates) into service, and to keep the earning assets of the Federal Reserve banks in a most liquid condition.

The commercial banks will have to get out of investment banking, because illiquid paper is no longer eligible for rediscount. They must also discontinue the practice of paying interest on checking account deposits.

The usual argument to justify the thesis that a high official gold price inevitably leads to inflation is based on the false notion that holders of gold would reap a windfall profit and they would go on a spending spree. This argument is naive in the extreme. Inflation cannot follow resumption, except as a consequence of inept fiscal and monetary policy. Holders of gold are the people whose propensity to save is the highest. They are least prone to go on a spending spree, no matter how high the new official gold price may be. They have, for the first time in half a century, the opportunity to invest their capital safely and profitably in a gold standard environment. They will use their income, and not their capital, to satisfy their urge of gratification.

Critics of the Dannemeyer bill have questioned the assumption that bondholders holding non-callable government bonds paying interest at, say, 10%, will voluntarily exchange their bonds for gold bonds paying interest at only 2½%. The answer is that the same incentive mechanism is at work as the one making convertible bonds attractive. When a corporation issuing convertible bonds wants the bondholder to convert earlier rather than later, it will prescribe a schedule of rising conversion value for its stocks. Moreover, the slope of the rise will influence the length of the conversion period: the steeper it is, the shorter the period will be. Likewise, the conversion to Eagle bonds is governed by the rising gold price between D-day and R-day. The Treasury is more than able to control the steepness of the rise by its open market operations.

It is important to remember in this context that Treasury purchases of gold are costless. The money to pay for the gold is not appropriated by Congress (the only example of government acquisition having no budgetary consequences). The Treasury's account with the Federal Reserve banks will not be depleted in consequence of gold purchases, as the Treasury is simultaneously depositing an equal amount of gold certificates. This completes the analogy with the company issuing convertible bonds. The company can set up an arbitrary schedule of conversion values for its stocks, because the company creates those stocks at no cost to itself.

The critics of the Dannemeyer bill have also questioned whether it makes sense to talk about 2½% interest when nobody, certainly no government, has succeeded within living memory to borrow at such low rates. The answer is that the governments are prisoners of their anti-gold ideology. Several finance houses have borrowed, during the past five years, hundreds of millions of dollars at interest rates as low as 1%. (The purpose of the loan, in each case, was the sinking of a new gold mine.) The amount of monetary gold in private hands is estimated at 50,000 metric tons (or $570 billion when gold is valued at $350 per ounce). The owners of this gold are paying at the rate of ¼ of 1 percent per annum in carrying charges for the privilege of holding monetary gold. This is the equivalent of negative interest. If they exchanged their gold for Eagle bonds, they would be earning a return of 2½%, instead of losing ¼ of 1%, for a net gain of two and three-quarters percent, and they would become the owners of the "best paper" in the world, the gold bonds issued by the United States of America. This paper has been absent from the financial markets of the world for more than half a century. Its return would be received by the financial community with a tumultuous welcome. There can be no question about the ultimate success of the Eagle bond program.

A number of foreign governments, including Germany and Japan, would follow the monetary leadership of the United States and resume. They would have everything to gain, and nothing to lose, if they did. They would enormously strengthen their public credit, would stabilize their domestic money markets, and would open up new vistas for their export industry and trade. Only weak and authoritarian governments, apprehensive of the good will of their own citizens and creditors, would keep their markets in straitjacket by hanging on to depreciating currencies. In doing so they would act against the interest of their own people who, as a consequence, could not partake the triumphant economic revival in the most civilized part of the world.

Another frequently heard objection is that the U.S.S.R. could sabotage the international gold standard by gold dumping. Well, it is welcome to try. Red gold is a red herring. It costs real resources to produce gold, even in the U.S.S.R. Gold is a form of wealth, indeed, a very desirable form of wealth. The government of the U.S.S.R. would give up gold only in exchange for another form of wealth more desirable or more useful to it. At any rate, an abundant gold flow reaching our shores would not be a disaster for us: it would be a good sign, a welcome sign. It would further reinforce credit markets, boost trade, production, capital accumulation in this country. An increased gold flow is a sign of increasing world confidence in the economy of the United States. One need not be afraid of and need not apologize for having earned that confidence. The specter of unfriendly governments dumping gold in order to embarrass the United States is purely imaginary.

Finally, a few remarks may be in order, to guard us against repeating the humiliation of August 15, 1971, the day President Nixon repudiated the obligation to pay gold on demand at the rate of $35 per ounce to foreign creditors of the United States. The gold standard, once established, must not be abused and compromised as it was, by the Roosevelt Administration, in devaluing the dollar for no good reason and to no good purpose, in 1933-34. Congress must not abridge the citizen's right to convert his gold into gold coin of the realm at the Mint, nor his right to hoard, to melt, or to export the gold coin of the realm in his possession. Congress must not pass legal tender laws. Fiscal policy must serve one aim, and one aim only: to maintain the credit of the government at the highest possible level. The purpose of taxation is to raise revenue to cover essential public expenditure, and not social engineering or economic fine-tuning. Borrowing should be undertaken by the government only if it is clearly seen that there are revenues in sight necessary to retire the debt. Government debt must be financed through long term bonds, whose value must be secured by the establishment of a sinking fund. The use of Treasury bills must be severely limited in time and in amount as well. If the rate of interest were to rise as a result of natural disaster or war destruction, then the government debt should be refinanced at the higher rate. Profligate and frivolous government spending must be exposed as waste at best, and vote-buying at worst. Monetary policy has one aim, and one aim only: to keep units of various forms of money in circulation on a par with the unit of value. It is not the task of monetary policy to influence the rate of interest, short or long. The idea that the money supply can be manipulated by open market purchases and sales of government bonds must be abandoned. Inflation, and hence deflation, can be averted if the country is firmly on the gold standard and does not allow monetary policy to be used for political purposes. Every inflation in the past, whether in wartime or peacetime, was the direct result of a faulty monetary policy allowing interest rates to join prices in an upward spiral, in order to accommodate political objectives. The humiliation of August 15, 1971 was a consequence.

REMARKS OF HARRY K. WELLS ON RECEIVING AWARD AS BUSINESS LEADER OF THE YEAR

HON. HELEN DELICH BENTLEY

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is sometimes difficult to see ourselves clearly. A trenchant view of what we do requires some distance. Last month, Harry K. Wells, chairman of the board of McCormick & Co., received an award as the Business Leader of the Year from a group of his peers.

In accepting that award, he made observations on our Nation, its goals, political process, and immediate needs with such clarity that they deserve close attention from all of us.

I offer those remarks for the RECORD, in the hope that their wisdom and vision will be of benefit to all of us.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS OF HARRY K. WELLS, CHAIRMAN, MCCORMICK & CO., INC., RECIPIENT OF BUSINESS LEADER OF THE YEAR AWARD FROM BUSINESS AND COMMERCE POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE, FEBRUARY 20, 1986

Thank you.

This is a great honor . . . and one that I am most proud to receive.

I accept it on behalf of hundreds of people like you who have a long and abiding love for our democratic form of government, our individual freedoms, and our free enterprise system.

One only has to witness the recent events in the Philippines to understand how precious, how rare, and how special our heritage of freedom really is.

February seems to deserve the title of Freedom month. It's the time of year when we celebrate the birthdays of great national figures like George Washington and Abraham Lincoln although I must confess the government has done its usual good job of confusing us about which date or dates we are supposed to salute these good people.

No wonder we have problems, if our elected officials can't even resist tinkering with the birthdays of two of our biggest national heroes!

It also was supposedly in February that one of our folk heroes, Will Rogers, said "Thank God we don't get all the Government we pay for!"

The problem of trying to figure out how we can pay for our government has stirred one of the most important debates in recent times.

Because of this debate, I believe the upcoming months may be some of the most crucial in the economic history of this country.

Both the White House and Capitol Hill are struggling with issues affecting the nation's economic future.

How much for defense? How to increase some services and decrease others? Should entitlements be reduced and how much? Should there even be such a thing as entitlements? Can other expenses be cut or delayed?

All are critical issues which will affect the bottom line on how much we can cut the deficit.

And there's no question—we must cut the deficit because we already have had more government than our grandchildren can pay for!

We may be able to have instant coffee, instant orange juice, and instant retrieval of information on computers but there is no "quick fix" for over 20 years of "runaway" spending and we shouldn't expect it.

Our government is too big, too slow moving, and the debt is too large to expect that. But we must start and we must start by electing people to office who are dedicated to reducing the cost of government. This is why PAC's such as this one tonight are so important. This represents a first big step toward doing what we in business should be doing in combining our resources and our strength.

I've been disappointed that business even through political action committees has not registered a more effective effort to build public support for the various actions necessary to reduce the deficit.

Instead some corporations are actually fighting one another attempting to protect their own special tax breaks at the expense of other business sectors.

Some of these companies say they're all for cutting back on entitlements but they want their own special entitlements to remain in effect and remain untouched.

Many are so concerned with protecting their own interests that they support candidates from both parties just to be sure they back a winner, one that they can then go to to push their own special interest.

If we continue these kinds of self-serving actions then business will deserve no better reputation than our critics are eager to give us. And the results we'll achieve will be exactly what we have earned!

Certainly we all realize that we need some overall governmental policies and regulations to keep our society united in a democratic and orderly system.

Certainly there is a proper role for government at every level—city, county, State, and Federal.

But it is also certain that we've gone too far—far too far the other way.

Wonder what one of the chief architects of our freedom would say if he could see what we've done with his dream of democracy?

Although he wrote long volumes on other subjects, Thomas Jefferson used only 40 words to describe what the overriding national policy ought to be. He said:

"A wise and frugal government which shall restrain men from injuring one another and shall leave them free to regulate their own pursuits on industry and improvement and shall not take from the mouths of labor the bread it has earned."

What he was saying is that there shall be a public sector called government and a private sector called business made up of the pursuits of the people. The role of the public or government sector was to encourage and to assist the private sector in pursuit of creating a unified society—not to impede it!

Contrast Jefferson's 40 words with the current code of Federal regulations containing only the basic standing rules set down by the bureaucracy which now takes up almost a whole library of shelf space in Washington.

These are regulations composed by appointed officials and civil servants who through their rulemaking write more law than elected Members of Congress.

The real danger is that these regulators now call the shots for you and me everyday in almost every way and they don't even need our vote to survive.

Matter of fact, they know that if they write enough regulations they can survive almost forever because the greatest job security system ever devised is to keep writing and rewriting regulations so that they as administrators have to be there to interpret what they mean.

What is even more tragic useless and wasteful regulation by Federal agencies costs us billions and billions of dollars each year.

How did we get this way? Well we got this way because most of us in business sat around thinking that if we handled our own businesses successfully and acted properly as good citizens people would automatically understand how our system of free enterprise worked and would appreciate us for the many fine products and services we provided.

If you don't think that is true, just consider in the current tax bill debates some personal tax deductions including interest paid on home mortgages are being referred to as tax expenditures to the taxpayer, an interesting turn of phrase! Clearly indicating the idea, it's the government's money that they are expending on you—a pretty scarey prospect for a country that believes in free enterprise and democracy.

Unfortunately while we in business were busy building and nurturing the greatest economic system the world has ever known, others were working against us under the misguided notion that the public and the private sectors were the same. Somehow those in the public sector began to feel entitled to the earnings produced by the private sector. Somehow they have the idea that our profit is their money and what we keep they in fact are giving back to us!

Those of us in business sat back while the social and economic initiative was assumed by the public sector since they were sure that only the government knew what the country needed—that only they could be trusted, that only they could solve the country's problems, that only they knew how and where to spend taxpayers' money—our money.

Those of us in business watched while they decreed larger and larger budgets. We watched while they put forth an endless succession of unworkable welfare schemes and vast public investments in utopian projects which have created endless bureaucracies dedicated to running the government at the public's expense.

I'm sure I don't need to recite the list of things that don't work. Almost everything the government has tried to administer in the private sector has ended up a disaster—Amtrak, the post office, public housing, welfare, social security, education, Medicare, job programs. They can't even protect the integrity of our dollar and they're supposed to do that!

We must help people see the difference between government's proper role as guide, a setter of policy, and a protector of public safety, and the improper role of government as a doer of things it is ill-equipped to do and should not do.

Now is the time for us to help everyday Americans realize this difference between the private and the public sector.

And now is the time to help them understand that government can't solve all of our problems by merely throwing more and more money at them or by writing new and more complex regulations.

We all need to realize that sooner or later we have to pay for each new law and regulation and usually it's the working American who has to pick up the tab either in higher taxes or higher prices or both! Our government doesn't make anything, doesn't produce anything, except new ways to spend our money!

What can we do about it?

A lot! And those of you in this room who deal with people, and people problems, everyday can really do something about it, if you make up your minds to do it.

As managers we've made the mistake of assuming that because our employees worked in business they also understood how business works. We made the same mistake with politics because they had a course in civics. We assumed they understood government.

We have to look no further than the current financial mess the country is in to see what a tragic blunder this has been.

What kind of nonpartisan political action programs are you promoting? Government on all levels isn't going to get any better unless we all get active on all levels in helping it get better. I believe as businessmen and women we ought to become the "new activists" in government.

What kind of economic and political education programs have you developed for your employees? Don't you think they ought to know what makes your business operate successfully? How it makes a profit and where that profit goes?

No one has a better story to tell than we do in American business but who's going to tell it unless you and I do?

Who's going to translate it into terms everyday Americans can understand unless you and I do?

No one has a better system than our free market system but who is going to sell it unless you and I do?

No one has a better system of government than we do but who's going to redirect its course unless we do?

No one has a better built-in audience than you do, through thousands of employees and their families. But who's going to tell them unless you do?

Obviously, I intend to continue to be an activist for business and I challenge each of you to join me.

And let's encourage others to join us—shareholders, employees, and customers toward making America regain its image as the world's best example of both economic and individual freedom.

I believe responsible leaders of both parties yearn really yearn for business to commit its full strength to the economic principle of free enterprise we've all talked so much about over the last 20 years.

As a group we seem to be better at saluting principles than we are at supporting them.

Instead of crossing our fingers and hoping for the best roll of the dice we all need to join together in an all out effort to let everyone we can influence in government know that we want responsible budgets and that we want to bring deficit spending down—way down.

One of the early leaders of our American Revolution wrote a creed which I think ought to be posted on the bulletin boards of every business in this country. See if you don't agree with these words by another of our early heroes, Thomas Paine:

"I do not choose to be a common man. It is my right to be uncommon if I can. I seek opportunity not security. I want to take the calculated risk to dream and to build, to fail and to succeed. I prefer the challenges of life to the guaranteed existence, the thrill of fulfillment to the stale calm of utopia. I will not trade freedom for beneficience nor my dignity for a handout.

"I will never cower before any master nor bend to any threat. It is my heritage to stand erect, proud, and unafraid, to think and act for for myself, to enjoy the benefit of my creations, and to face the world boldly and say: 'This with God's help I have done. All this is what it means to be an American.' "

Thank you for the honor you've given me tonight.

And thank you even more for listening so politely to these words.

Good night.

PEACE CORPS "VETS"

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend to my colleagues an article published in the Pittsburgh Press written by Earl Kohnfelder about the 25th anniversary of the Peace Corps. This piece describes the admirable achievements of both the Peace Corps program and one of its former volunteers, Representative Tom Murphy.

As the article describes, the Peace Corps has made great strides over the last 25 years "to help people help themselves" in impoverished countries. Not only has the Corps made a difference in its host countries, but it has also given its volunteers an experience shared by few. This program has created a generation of new leaders. One who has made a mark on Pennsylvania is State Representative Tom Murphy. An old friend of mine, Tom Murphy, is a man of integrity and true dedication to public service. Again, I hope my colleagues will take the time to read this excellent piece.

The article follows:

[From the Pittsburgh (PA) Press, Mar. 2, 1986]

PEACE CORPS 'VETS' DRAW ON 25 YEARS OF HELPING

(By Earl Kohnfelder)

Tom Murphy's journey to the state House began 7,000 miles from his North Side home, in the primitive jungles of Paraguay where he and his wife taught natives how to keep drinking water clean and reduce a high infant mortality rate.

It was 1970 when Murphy and his wife, Mona, both 27 at the time, signed up for the Peace Corps and spent a year and a half in the hot, humid jungles without electricity or running water.

"My bent in life was always toward public service," said Murphy, who is serving his fourth term in the House, "but my experience gave me a sense of wanting to organize people to a point where they had control over matters affecting their lives. "The Peace Corps gave me a lot of confidence and directed my interests more toward politics."

The Peace Corps, which officially celebrated its 25th anniversary yesterday, had as much lasting impact on the volunteers as it had on the millions they helped in impoverished countries.

It's doubtful President John F. Kennedy realized how much the Peace Corps would affect those who served when he created the agency—showcase of his New Frontier—with an executive order March 1, 1961.

In his inaugural address six weeks earlier, Kennedy stated the Peace Corps philosphy: "To those peoples in the huts and villages . . . struggling to break the bonds of mass misery, we pledge our best efforts to help them help themselves . . ."

His only promises to the volunteers were adventure and subsistence wages.

Within five years, 15,500 Peace Corps volunteers were in the field financed by a $114 million budget.

With the romanticism of the 1960s giving way to realities of the '80s, today's Peace Corps, leaner and less glamorous, is no longer fashionable. About 5,400 volunteers are working on grass-roots, self-help development projects in 60 nations. At least 2,300 are in Africa.

Programs are more diversified and better planned than ever. Most Peace Corps projects are requested or initiated by the host countries.

In the past 25 years, 100,00 volunteers have served the Peace Corps—more than 400 of them from the Pittsburgh area.

A great number of the Pittsburghers have moved on, but about 25 former volunteers here get together frequently for pot luck dinners.

Peace Corps symposiums have been scheduled by World Affairs Councils in more than 20 American cities to celebrate the anniversary, which is being observed from Oct. 1, 1985, to Sept. 30. None has been scheduled for Pittsburgh.

The idea for the Peace Corps surfaced publicly in October 1960 when Kennedy spoke of a "youth service program" he envisioned in a campaign stop at the University of Michigan.

Three days after signing the executive order he appointed Sargent Shriver as the Peace Corps' first director.

The following Aug. 30, Kennedy honored the first group of 51 volunteers in a Rose Garden ceremony at the White House. The next day, they stepped off a plane signing Twi-folk songs in Accra, Ghana.

Support declined as the Vietnam War took precedence over foreign spending. Volunteers began to be selected for specific skills because countries wanted engineers to design bridges, rather than eager, inexperienced young people to build them.

When the Peace Corps celebrated its 15th anniversary in 1976, there were 5,900 volunteers and trainees in 68 countries.

In January 1985, Peace Corps director Loret Miller Ruppe announced the agency had requested 10,000 inquires from people with agriculture-related backgrounds to help with famine areas of Africa.

Twice that number of inquiries were received.

It was in Africa that volunteer Laura Layton, a former Bethel Park resident, taught at an all-boys high school in Tunisia, and later at the University of Tunis.

That experience, she says, placed her on a path that led to the United Nations where today she's in charge of English language training.

Miss Layton said she decided after graduatign from Pitt in 1967 that joining the Peace Corps was "the most exciting thing to do."

She received the same beginning salary—$120 a month—as Tunisian teachers. Back in the United States, she said, the government was "putting away $75 a month for my repatriation when I returned."

Even though she joined the corps four years after Kennedy's death, she included her years of service as part of "the whole Kennedy period . . . a more idealistic, more liberal, more international time."

"Pittsburgh is a very insular part of the country. My experience taught me to be much more aware that people elsewhere are not the same, do not have the same ideas," she said.

Returning home, Miss Layton taught a year in the North Hills School District, then earned a master's degree at Columbia University before going to the United Nations.

Legislator Murphy said he and his wife were attracted to the Peace Corps "a little bit by idealism and a little bit by adventure.

He said the jungle in northern Paraguay where he and his wife spent all but four months of their stay was a four-day boat ride from the nearest road.

"They (Peace Corps superiors) brought you into the jungle and said 'do good.' We taught the people to build cement block houses. We lived in two rooms, without benefit of electricity or running water. We cooked over an open fire."

Murphy said their first assignment was in a small town 15 miles from Asuncion, the capital. "Mona was a dietitian and health educator. I was a sanitation engineer, meaning I taught them to build latrines. Our first task in the jungle was to take a census of the area. We helped to organize and build a running-water project."

Mrs. Murphy spend 8½ months of her pregnancy there, traveling to Asuncion for checkups. She arrived home in time to give birth to their daughter.

"In the jungle, there was a 50 percent infant mortality rate by 1 year of age from water-borne diseases," Murphy said. Babies would get diarrhea and dehydrate until they died. The people just felt they couldn't deal with that issue.

"We had to teach the people to protect their water sources. It sounded so simplistic, but it was very difficult getting them to understand that they could control the number of babies who die in their village."

Mrs. Murphy said she and her husband suffered "reverse culture shock" upon returning to Pittsburgh. "The training to prepare us for the Paraguayan culture was very intense, but they didn't prepare us for a return to this country.

"This nation changes a lot in two years as it is. After two years in such a remote place, it was very hard to adjust back again. We became so aware of how Americans waste so many things."

For Cynthia Vanda, part of the "third group ever" to be sent abroad in 1961, the Peace Corps shaped her personal and professional life.

She married the principal of the secondary school she was assigned to in Badagri, an old slave-trading port of the southern coast of Nigeria.

Ms. Vanda, who received a master's degree from Pitt's Graduate School of Public and International Affairs before joining the corps, is the women's advocate in Pitt's provost office and teaches a course on women in Third World development.

In training at Ibadan University, she said, the volunteers came under criticism by some of the students.

"We had an incident occur that made things touch and go for awhile. We weren't sure we were going to stay." Another Peace Corps volunteer wrote a postcard in which she said Nigerians ate, slept and went to the bathroom in the streets.

"Somehow the card was intercepted by some of the Nigerian students who promptly staged a protest against our presence. Nigeria had been independent for just one year and there was this great nationalist feeling among students who saw us as a neocolonial group.

"We volunteers were all told to go and stay at the homes of State Department people until it was decided how to apologize. We had some vociferous discussions with students, we argued and talked a lot, but it eventually blew over," Ms. Vanda said.

Her first of two teaching assignments at secondary schools was in Shagamu. "I found out very quickly how tough it was to be a good teacher. When I got out there and saw what a challenge it was, my respect and admiration for good teachers went up tremendously."

Her second assignment was at a school in Badagri, where she met her future husband. She returned with her husband—they're now divorced—to direct a technical assistance program at Pitt in which Nigerian teachers were trained to replace American teachers in their country.

Also carrying a master's degree from Pitt into the corps and returning afterward to her alma mater was Lynn Cohen, a volunteer in Liberia in 1980–82 who has been the area recruiter for the agency since then.

Now working toward a Ph.D. in international education, Miss Cohen said she derived great satisfaction from "becoming part of the community and from how they (Liberians) accepted me."

"Although they were poor and had little to share, they were so willing to share what they did have. They welcomed me into their homes to have dinner with them. If I became homesick, they went out of their way to make sure I was OK."

She instructed adults who had received a high school education and wanted to become teachers. "They came to class regularly and would stay after classes for additional tutoring. They had very little resources to learn with . . . no textbooks and very little paper to write on."

For many volunteers, the satisfaction of helping people in other countries kept them abroad after their Peace Corps service ended.

Common Pleas Judge Judith Friedman served in the Peace Corps from 1964 to 1966, helping to run a nursery school in eastern Turkey. "I enjoyed Turkey so much that I took a job as a secretary with the U.S. Air Force after my Peace Corps duty ended and didn't return home until 1970," she said.

After graduation from college, Mrs. Friedman, then Judith Anderson, turned down an opportunity for graduate work in medicine to join the Peace Corps. She had been accepted for a master's program at New York Medical College.

"For me, the Peace Corps was the right thing at the right time. I had just graduated from Mount Holyoke College (Massachusetts).

"That was back when they were still talking about the 'ugly American' and we wanted to dispel that idea. I loved languages and travel and the values the Peace Corps represented," said Mrs. Friedman, who met her husband Ed in Turkey.

She said her experience gave her an "understanding of another person's perspective, and of the valuable strength of this country that nobody appreciates.

"There are certain experiences that contribute to your personality, others you just discard. I haven't discarded my Peace Corps experience."

ANTIDUMPING LAW REFORM

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that would amend existing antidumping laws to make those laws an effective tool against dumping in the semiconductor industry.

Dumping, that is, the export of semiconductors below the cost of production, poses a threat to large segments of the merchant semiconductor industry. Dumping is a very likely tactic that will wrest world leadership in semiconductors from the U.S. industry during the next several years.

Preliminary decisions by the Commerce Department in mid-March show that the margin of dumping of semiconductors onto U.S. markets has ranged up to 188 percent. The objective of my proposal is to ensure that the U.S. semiconductor industry's existence is never again threatened—as it currently is—by a wave of dumped devices.

Current antidumping laws do not provide any financial compensation to U.S. companies which have been injured by foreign dumping. Nor is there any means under U.S. antidumping law to identify and take action against firms that repeatedly use dumping as a tactic for building market share. Our laws are simply not designed to deal with dumping in short-life-cycle, high technology sectors where competitive dominance can be achieved in a matter of months.

The changes I propose are as follows:

(1) A mechanism would be established whereby foreign producers found to have engaged in dumping which caused injury to U.S. companies would be assessed damages that would be payable to the U.S. Treasury and which U.S. firms could recover through U.S. District Court action.

(2) Multiple offenders, that is, firms found to have engaged in dumping in the U.S. market on three or more occasions would be excluded from the U.S. market.

(1) DAMAGES PAYABLE TO INJURED PARTIES

One of the major weaknesses of the current antidumping laws is that they enable predatory foreign firms to "buy" an industry—that is, to continue dumping, absorbing the antidumping duties until the U.S. industry is destroyed. Ultimately, the cost of paying duties is a small price to pay for industry domination. Moreover, under current U.S. antidumping laws, the U.S. government, not injured companies, retain the antidumping duties, and the duties are assessed against the importer of record, not the foreign producers. The importer often passes through the cost of the duty to the U.S. consumers. Thus, at present, foreign producers are not required to compensate their victims—instead U.S. consumers are paying the U.S. government.

The Antidumping Act of 1916 allows U.S. companies to seek damages in federal district court for predatory dumping. However, it has proven ineffective because of the necessity of proving predatory intent on the part of foreign producers.

My proposal would:

(1) Establish a damages civil remedy for dumping which causes injury to U.S. industries.

(2) Make those damages payable to the U.S. Treasury but accessible to U.S. firms through U.S. District Court action.

(3) Make this remedy enforceable in Federal District Court.

(4) Eliminate procedural delay and massive evidentiary burdens currently associated with court proceedings by making the final antidumping determinations by Commerce Department and the ITC conclusive proof of injurious dumping, e.g., limit the scope of the court's inquiry to the amount of damages to be assessed.

(5) Make the remedy enforceable against foreign producers of the dumped product, and their affiliates, not the importer of record.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Q. How would this remedy mesh with the imposition of antidumping duties by the U.S. government?

A. The two remedies would be complementary. Under the current system duties are essentially prospective, that is, after an affirmative finding they are imposed on products which enter the country after the final determination (plus those products which were the subject of suspension of liquidation after the preliminary determination). That remedy would remain in place. The new remedy would provide compensation for injury that occurs prior to the affirmative dumping determination.

Moreover, upon the issuance of final affirmative determinations by the Commerce Department and the USITC, petitioners would be authorized to make an election—they could opt for the imposition of antidumping duties, as under current law, or could forego those duties and preserve a right to seek additional damages if periodic annual reviews by the Department of Commerce revealed that dumping had continued following the original Commerce-USITC findings. These damages would also be awarded by the federal district court.

Q. How would the damages be calculated, on the basis of the margin of dumping?

A. No. Damages would be calculated by the court based on the amount of injury to the individual firm. The purpose of this remedy is to compensate the victim, as in other civil cases. This would avoid the problem posed, for example, if a foreign producer were able to inflict severe injury on a U.S. industry by dumping at comparatively low margins.

The court's injury determinations would be wide ranging, and would calculate injury to petitioner from dumping in third-country markets as well as in the United States. For example, if Japanese producers dumped semiconductors into East Asian markets, and these were incorporated into circuit boards and other products imported in the U.S., injuring the petitioner, such dumping in third country markets would form an element of the injury to be compensated.

Q. Won't this remedy violate the GATT?

A. The GATT does not prohibit the assessment of civil damages against private parties.

Q. What makes you think that federal district courts have the expertise to make quantitative determinations of injury in cases like this?

A. The federal courts in effect make such a determination in any civil case in which damages are awarded, including complex antitrust and other economic cases.

(2) EXCLUDE MULTIPLE OFFENDERS FROM THE U.S. MARKET

Some foreign firms have a history of dumping in the U.S. market, and of probing for loopholes in the U.S. trade laws. Japanese firms which were found to have dumped mobile phones in the U.S. were among the same firms that have been found to be dumping 64K and 256K DRAMS and EPROMS. The present disincentives for engaging in this kind of conduct—namely, the prospect of more dumping cases—is inadequate to deter repeated resort to dumping by some foreign producers.

My proposal would exclude a foreign firm which has been the subject of three affirmative antidumping findings in a six year period from further exports to the U.S. for a period of five years—"three strikes and you're out." Firms which have already been the subject of three or more antidumping findings at the time of enactment of the legislation would be considered, for purposes of exclusion, to have been the subject of two such findings.

Once a firm has been found to have dumped, it will be placed on a special monitoring list by the Department of Commerce. Imports of its products will thereafter be subject to special monitoring by the Department of Commerce. If Commerce determines, as a result of this monitoring, that dumping is occurring, it shall self-initiate an antidumping investigation.

Q. Isn't the concept of exclusion a wholly unprecedented concept?

A. No. The U.S.I.T.C. already issues exclusion orders in Section 337 cases, although these run against products, not producers.

Q. But is there any precedent in U.S. law for excluding from our market some producer on the grounds of unfair trade practices?

A. Yes. The Federal Aviation Act (49 U.S.C. § 11596(b) provides that if the Secretary of Transportation finds that a foreign government, instrumentality, or air carrier engages in unjustifiable, unreasonable, discriminatory, predatory, or anticompetitive practices against a U.S. air carrier, or imposes unjustifiable or unreasonable restrictions on access of a U.S. air carrier to foreign markets, the Secretary may take a variety of actions, including the "denial, transfer, alteration, modification, amendment, cancellation, suspension, limitation, or revocation of any foreign air carrier permit". Such permits are required in order for foreign air carriers to serve the U.S. market, and the suspension or revocation of such permits would effectively exclude a foreign airline from the U.S. market.

THE HIGH TECHNOLOGY ANTIDUMPING ACT OF 1986

ANTIDUMPING—RIGHT TO MONEY DAMAGES

(a) Any citizen of the United States who has been injured in his business or property by the dumping of a commodity by a foreign person or persons shall have a right to money damages as provided in this section.

APPLICABILITY OF SECTION

(b) This section shall apply only to high technology products with short life cycles, as determined by the International Trade Commission pursuant to paragraph (c) of this section.

(c) By no later than the date that is one year after the date of enactment of this section, the International Trade Commission, in consultation with the Secretary of Commerce, shall conduct a proceeding to identify the products to which this section shall apply, giving interested parties an opportunity to comment.

(d) The Commission shall establish procedures and guidelines for making subsequent additions to and deletions from the list of products established in the proceeding held pursuant to the paragraph (c). Such procedures shall permit an interested party to request an addition to or deletion from the list, and shall provide for a final determination by the Commission no later than six months from the date of such request.

ANTIDUMPING—ACTIONS BY INJURED PARTIES

(e) Any petitioner in an antidumping investigation brought pursuant to Title 19 of the United States Code, Subtitle IV, Part II, which is the subject of a final affirmative determination by the Department of Commerce and the International Trade Commission, may bring an action for civil damages in any district court of the United States in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover an amount equal to the damages by him sustained, the cost of the suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee, and such additional damages as the district court may deem appropriate, excepting however that no such additional damages shall exceed threefold the damages sustained by the petitioner. For purposes of enforcing the right of action created by this section, the district court shall have jurisdiction over any foreign person or persons who produce commodities to which this section applies which are offered for sale in the United States.

(1) Such an action will lie only against an entity which has produced some or all of the commodities which are the subject of the affirmative antidumping determination, and its affiliates and subsidiaries.

(2) In an action brought pursuant to this paragraph, the final affirmative determinations by the Department of Commerce and the International Trade Commission shall be deemed conclusive proof of the fact that actionable sales at less than fair market value have occurred.

(3) In calculating damages assessed pursuant to this section, the district court shall regard to the injury to the petitioner or petitioners as a result of sales at less than fair market value by the defendant or defendants.

(i) from the importation of commodities at less than fair market value;

(ii) from the sale of commodities outside of the United States at less than fair market value; and

(iii) from the importation of commodities incorporating commodities sold at less than fair market value.

(4) In calculating damages assessed pursuant to this section, the district court may give such regard to the final affirmative determination of the International Trade Commission as it deems appropriate.

(5) In actions brought pursuant to this section, process may be served on a defendant corporation not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business.

(6) In calculating whether additional damages are appropriate under this section, the district court shall give regard to whether products produced by the defendant have been the subject of previous affirmative findings of dumping, or whether the effect of dumping of a product has been to

(i) eliminate one or more U.S. companies from participation in the production of that product;

(ii) substantially deter research, development, and investment by U.S. companies in future generations of the product;

(iii) substantially injure or destroy the U.S. industry or a significant portion thereof.

(7) Following the award of damages pursuant to this section, the district court shall take such steps as are necessary to ensure that the judgment is satisifed, including:

(i) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to disburse to petitioner or petitioners such moneys as may be maintained in the special account established pursuant to paragraph (j)(ii) of this section from the collection of antidumping duties, up to the full amount of the award granted pursuant to this paragraph, provided that such payments are made only from an account consisting of the proceeds of antidumping duties assessed on the products which are the subject of the petition brought under this paragraph;

(ii) issuing a writ of execution against property, including merchandise, of the defendant; or

(iii) taking any other appropriate action within the power of the district court necessary to ensure full satisfaction of the judgment.

STAY PENDING REVIEW

(f) The federal district court shall stay the effectiveness of any order assessing damages which is based upon a final affirmative determination of sales at less than fair market value which is the subject of a pending review by the United States Court of International Trade pursuant to Chapter 95 of Title 28. Such stay shall remain in effect until

(1) Review by the Court of International Trade has been completed, any subsequent review of that Court's decision by the United States Court of Appeals has been completed, and the final affirmative determination remains in effect following such review, in which case the order of the federal district court shall take effect; or

(2) The final affirmative determination is remanded to the Department of Commerce or the International Trade Commission for further proceedings, and

(i) such proceedings result in another final affirmative determination, whether or not such final affirmative determination is identical to the original determination, and

(ii) any further review of the remanded proceeding by the United States Court of International Trade, and any subsequent review of that Court's decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has been completed; and

(iii) following such review the final affirmative determination remains in effect; in which case the order of the federal district court shall take effect;

(3) The final affirmative determination is remanded to the Department of Commerce and the International Trade Commission for futher proceedings and

(i) such proceedings result in a negative determination, and

(ii) any further review of the remanded proceeding by the United States Court of International Trade, and any subsequent review of that Court's decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has been completed, in which case the order of the federal district court shall be without force and effect.

ELECTION BY PETITIONERS

(g) Within three days of the issuance of a final affirmative determination of dumping by the Commission, petitioner shall make an election, in writing, to the Commission, that it chooses

(1) To allow the imposition of antidumping duties pursuant to 19 U.S.C. Section 1673e; or

(2) To preserve the right to seek damages from foreign producers of the commodity which is the subject of the affirmative determination of injury, and to allow the imposition of antidumping duties as provided in paragraph (j).

(h) In cases involving multiple petitioners, the election made by the petitioner or petitioners representing the largest portion of production of the commodity within the most recent twelve month period for which data is available, as determined by the Commission, shall govern.

(i) If petitioners making an election pursuant to paragraph (g) make the election provided in paragraph (g)(1), antidumping duties shall be imposed pursuant to 19 U.S.C. Section 1673e.

(j) If petitioners making an election pursuant to paragraph (g) make the election provided in paragraph (g)(2), antidumping duties shall be imposed pursuant to 19 U.S.C. Section 1673e, excepting however, that

(i) such duties shall only be assessed against the foreign producer of the article which is the subject of the affirmative determination, or its affiliates and subsidiaries;

(ii) the duties collected shall accrue to a separate account established by the Secretary of the Treasury, and payments from that account shall be made to the petitioner or petitioners to satisfy damages awarded in an action brought pursuant to paragraph (e) of this section in the manner directed by the federal district court having jurisdiction over action; and

(iii) in collecting the duties assessed against the foreign producer pursuant to part (i) of this paragraph, the appropriate customs officer shall take such measures as are necessary to ensure that such duties are collected, including, but not limited to,

(A) seizure and liquidation of merchandise owned by the foreign producer; and

(B) commencment of an action in any district court in which the foreign producer or its affiliates or subsidiaries, reside or are found or have an agent, for the purpose of levying against the property of the foreign producer, or its affiliates or subsidiaries.

CONTINUING DUMPING—ADDITIONAL DAMAGES

(k) If petitioners make the election provided in paragraph (g)(2) of this section, in each periodic administrative review conducted pursuant to 19 U.S.C. Section 1675,

(1) The Department of Commerce shall make a determination whether sales of the commodity in question at less than fair market value have occurred during the 12-month period which is the subject of such review, and shall publish such determination in the Federal Register; and

(2) pursuant to such procedures as it may establish for the purpose, the Commission shall, in conjuction with each periodic administrative review, provide an opportunity for interested persons who were not petitioners in the original antidumping investigation to join as petitioners. For purposes of this paragraph "an interested person" is any citizen of the United States who produces the commodity which is the subject of the investigation.

(1) Any petitioner in an antidumping investigation undergoing an administrative review pursuant to 19 U.S.C. Section 1675 in which an affirmative finding of sales at less than fair market value has been made pursuant to paragraph (k) of this section may bring an action for civil damages in any district court of the United States in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover the damages sustained by him, the cost of the suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee, and such additional damages as the district court shall deem appropriate, excepting however that no such additional damages shall exceed threefold the damages sustained by the petitioner.

(1) Such an action will lie notwithstanding any action which may have been brought by petitioner or petitioners pursuant to paragraph (e) of this section.

(2) In an action brought pursuant to this paragraph, an affirmative determination of continuing sales at less than fair market value by the Department of Commerce pursuant to paragraph (k)(1) shall be deemed conclusive proof of the fact that actionable dumping has occurred.

(3) In calculating damages assessed pursuant to this section, the district court shall give regard to the injury to petitioner or petitioners as a result of sales at less than fair market value—

(i) from the importation of commodities at less than fair market value;

(ii) from the sale of commodities outside of the United States at less than fair market value, and

(iii) from the importation of commodities incorporating commodities sold at less than fair market value

during the twelve month period which is the subject of administrative review conduced pursuant to paragraph (k)(1).

(5) In calculating whether additional damages are approriate under this section, the district court shall give regard to whether the defendant has been the subject of previous affirmative findings of dumping, or whether the effect of dumping of a product has been to

(i) eliminate one or more U.S. companies from participation in the production of that product;

(ii) deter research, development and investment by U.S. companies in future generations of the product; or

(iii) substantially injure or destroy the U.S. industry or a significant portion thereof.

(6) The district court shall ensure satisfaction of the amount of the judgment as provided in paragraph (e)(7) of this section.

ANTIDUMPING—EXCLUSION OF MULTIPLE OFFENDERS

(m) The Secretary of Commerce shall maintain a list of all persons producing commodities which have been the subject of a final affirmative determination pursuant to 19 U.S.C. Section 1673d. If the Secretary determines any such person has been the subject of three such determinations, the Secretary shall so notify the Commission, and

(1) The Commission, within 90 days of receipt of such notification, shall direct that any articles produced by such person, or by any entity owned by such person, or in which that person holds the controlling interest, be excluded from entry into the United States for a period of five years, except where the Commission determines that such exclusion, or a portion thereof, would prevent the importation of products which are not manufactured in the United States, or are not manufactured in quanities necessary to meet the requirements of the United States economy, or that such exclusion would otherwise be injurious to the national defense, to the public health and welfare, or to United States consumers; and

(2) The Commission shall notify the Secretary of the Treasury of its action under this paragraph directing such exclusion from entry, and upon receipt of such notice, the Secretary shall, through the proper officers, refuse such entry for a period of five years. (n) The Commission may modify, terminate, or suspend all or any portion of an exclusion order issued pursuant to paragraph (m)(1) where necessary to prevent injury to the national defense, to public health and welfare, or to the United States consumer; or if the articles subject to the exclusion order are not manufactured in quantities necessary to meet the needs of the United States economy. The Commission shall notify the Secretary of the Treasury of such modification, termination, or suspension, and upon receipt of such notice, the Secretary shall, through the proper officers, permit the importation of such articles as the Commission's order may direct.

(o) If any foreign person produces commodities which have been the subject of two final affirmative determinations pursuant to 19 U.S.C. Section 1673d,

(1) the Secretary of Commerce shall establish procedures for monitoring the importation of commodities produced by such foreign person, and

(2) if the Secretary determines, as a result of such monitoring, that a class or kind of foreign merchandise is being, or is likely to be, sold in the United States at less than its fair value, he shall commence an investigation pursuant to 19 U.S.C. Section 1673a.

(p) For purposes of paragraphs (m) and (o) of this section, persons who have been the subject of two or more affirmative determinations pursuant to 19 U.S.C. § 1673d on the date of enactment of this legislation shall be deemed to have been subject ot two such determinations.

DIVERSION OF THE AIRPORT AND AIRWAY TRUST FUND

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct the attention of my colleagues to a disturbing administration budget proposal that would directly impact the ability of our Nation's airports to improve security and efficiency. This past year has been one of the worst in aviation history with large numbers of casualties and airplane accidents that were caused by either lab inspection and maintenance or terrorist incidents. In 1985, 561 persons lost their lives in accidents involving U.S. aircraft. Internationally, a total of 1,893 persons died in air crashes involving non-Communist countries.

In this year of heightened awareness of the need for increased safety and maintenance of airports and airplanes, the airport and airway trust fund, which provides money for airport improvement grants and capital modernization, has been crucial in addressing the needs of the aviation community.

The airport and airway trust fund is maintained through the efforts of the traveling public by an 8-percent tax on airline tickets and a 12-cent-per-gallon tax on aviation fuel. The primary intent of this user fee concept has been to finance airport construction and further capital improvements that, in some cases, include installing such safety equipment as runway and approach lights, visual approach systems and weather reporting systems. A certain portion has been, since a revision of the law in 1982, redirected to pay for the Federal Aviation Administration's [FAA] operating expenses and salaries.

I am disturbed by a recent proposal initiated by the Department of Transportation to transfer 75 percent of the trust funds and redirect it to meet the cost of FAA's operations and maintenance costs. Under current practices, out of the nearly $3 billion received in the fund through the user fee, $925 million are tranferred to the States either in direct grants to the States or individual airport grants. In 1985, my own State of New Jersey received $17.74 million which was divided into a $7.4 million State grant and a $10.3 million individual airport grant for Newark and Teterboro airports. All of this would be jeopardized under this proposal as the funds would be, for the most part, directed toward meeting FAA's operating expenses.

Additionally, the administration proposes to single out this airport trust fund and make it the only Government dedicated trust fund that would not receive interest for money borrowed from the trust fund. The interest amounts to over $700 million every year. Rather than spending the money accumulated in this fund to finance the necessary safety improvements that have been so clearly demonstrated by the many unfortunate accidents this year, FAA is distorting the intent of the fund and ignoring the fact that airline users are paying these user fees and properly expect that the fees be used to assure their safety.

As chairman of the House Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism, I am concerned that an increased fear of flying due to large numbers of aviation accidents and terrorist incidents has had a negative impact on the international tourism industry. During a hearing held by my subcommittee this week, officials from the Commerce Department, the FAA and the Department of State, as well as representatives of travel agent and tour operator organizations, expressed their support for improving security at airports and on airlines. Though I have been assured that funding for airport security will not be jeopardized, I am concerned that such areas including improvements in airport safety construction and research and development of explosive detection devices will be seriously challenged.

This misdirection of funding has instigated concern among those that own and operate our Nation's airports and aircraft. Both the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association [AOPA] and the Airport Operators Council International have voiced their opposition and I would like to call attention to the concern that has been expressed. Not only does this midirection of funding set an unfortunate precedent for collecting user fees for one purpose and actually using the fees for another, but it will also have a detrimental impact on air safety in a time when we simply cannot afford to ignore the needs of this sector.

I am disturbed by the devastating impact of such a step and would urge my colleagues to work to defeat such a proposal. It it time to stop this raid on the airport trust fund and bring back an element of trust in the intent of this user fee and in the use of our aviation resources. The following New York Times article clearly illustrates the dimensions of the problem:

WHITE HOUSE REPORTED SET TO ASK FOR FUND SWITCH

(By Reginald Stuart)

WASHINGTON, March 18.—The Department of Transportation plans to ask Congress to transfer $115 million in the agency's budget to the Federal Aviation Administration and the Coast Guard to help the two agencies avoid temperarily laying off thousands of workers in the coming months, sources in Congress and the department said today.

The aviation agency would get $80 million and the Coast Guard $35 million from money appropriated for mass transit, Amtrak and the airport improvement program, the sources said.

The programs from which the money would be taken have been unpopular with the Reagan Administration, which has repeatedly advocated the elimination Federal money for Amtrak and of operating subsidies for local transit systems.

The proposal from the Department of Transportation is expected to be approved Wednesday by the White House Office of Management and Budget, after which it would go to Congress.

OPPOSITION IS PROMISED

Congressional supporters of mass transit and Amtrak who are familiar with the proposal said it would meet stiff opposition in both houses.

Sources familiar with the proposed transfer to the aviation agency's operating budget said that $43.7 million would come from the agency's Airport Improvement Program, which is supported by a trust fund; $27.5 million from the Urban Mass Transit Program that awards funds to cities for operating and capital projects based on population, and $8.7 million from the Amtrak budget. A breakdown on the source of the $35 million transfer proposed for the Coast Guard was not available.

Officials of F.A.A. have told Congress that the new deficit-reducing law required the air safety agency to reduce its spending by $171 million in the current fiscal year and that all but the $80 million had been achieved through economic measures.

Without the additional money, the agency had warned that it would have to lay off 20,000 to 25,000 workers, about half its work force, for eight to 10 weeks over the next 30 weeks. The agency had said workers directly involved in safety-related activities, such as air traffic controllers and those in maintenance inspection, would not be affected.

"I have a very real operational problem," said Donald D. Engen, Administrator of the agency. He said he was optimistic that Congress would approve the proposal.

An Amtrak official said the budget of the Government-subsidized passenger railroad had been reduced to $592 million from the $616 million initially approved by Congress because of the deficit-reducing law.

An official of the America Public Transit Association, the trade association for mass transit systems and their suppliers, said the organization would strongly oppose the transfer.

In a separate development, Mr. Engen said today that he felt some members of Congress might be confused about the status of the force of air traffic controllers but that it was not his agency's intent to mislead lawmakers.

DECEPTION QUESTION RAISED

The question of deception was raised Monday by Representative Guy V. Molinari, Republican of Staten Island, in hearings on the air traffic control system by the Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigation of the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation. Mr. Molinari, a longtime critic of the F.A.A., suggested that the agency was misleading lawmakers by including more than 1,000 clerks in what many lawmakers had thought was a count of air traffic controllers. The agency included the workers as part of the "controller work force."

"We're aware they had created this new category but not that they were including that number in the count of controllers," said Representative James L. Oberstar, Democrat of Minnesota, the subcommittee chairman. "That was an astonishing revelation and it raises more serious questions about the condition of our air-traffic system than we started out with."●

SUPPORT THE NEW GI BILL

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, I have been impressed with the early reports concerning the new GI bill. The Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee on Education, Training and Employment received testimony last November regarding the successes of this new program. As a recruitment tool, each of the services testified regarding the high quality of individuals which were enlisting. For example, the Army indicated before our subcommittee that 70 percent of all new recruits enlisted to participate in the program. This figure illustrates the effectiveness of this program as a recruitment tool.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to view the new GI bill in the context of other Federal education programs. In the current fiscal year, more than $3 billion will be spent for Pell grants, in addition to millions of dollars for other educational grant and loan programs. Since those individuals receiving the grants are not required to make any commitment for military or any Federal service, some have coined the phrase that we have a GI bill without the GI.

It is my firm belief that we should continue to give the higest priority in the granting of educational benefits to those who will serve in our military service—both active and reserve. The preliminary data, which has been given to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, indicates that the GI bill is a considerable success. This is good news. Moreover, I want to underscore my continued support for this effective program.

A SALUTE TO WALTER BRADBURY

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor to bring to the attention of my colleagues the outstanding achievements of Mr. Walter Bradbury, former Scoutmaster of Boy Scout Troop No. 91 in Frackville, PA.

On April 6, 1986, Troop No. 91 will be holding its annual Boy Scout banquet. The banquet is a special occasion, but this year's celebration will be especially important. On this date, the Scouts will honor Walter Bradbury for 60 years of dedicated service to Scouting.

I want to commend Mr. Bradbury for his hard work and service to Scouting. He has brightened the lives of countless young men by providing them the opportunity to participate in and learn the fine ideals of the Boy Scouts. I can think of no better way to ensure the success and security of our future than by entrusting our children to the Scouting program under the capable and outstanding leadership of men like Mr. Bradbury.

I am very happy for Mr. Bradbury and he can be justifiably proud of this fine achievement. I know that all of my colleagues will join me in congratulating Mr. Walter Bradbury for 60 years of service to Scouting and in wishing him the very best in the future.

U.S. LABOR MOVEMENT IN THE PHILIPPINES

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD a copy of a February 27 article from the Detroit News discussing the role the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines [TUCP] played in reinstituting democracy in the Philippines.

The TUCP has strong ties with our own labor movement, and like the AFL-CIO, it too has worked and fought for the dignity of the working class. As the article correctly begins, this is a great unreported story of the behind the scenes struggle for democracy in the Philippines. I urge my colleagues to take a moment to read this most important essay.

[From the Detroit News, Thursday, Feb. 27, 1986]

SOLIDARITY IN THE PHILIPPINES

(By Charles D. Gray)

As democracy advances in the Philippines, the great unreported story concerns the role played by the 2.75 million-strong Trade Union Congress of the Philippines (TUCP), a group with strong ties of kinship and solidarity to the American labor movement.

The TUCP joined the National Citizens Movement for Free Elections (NAMFREL) in the fight for a truly free and democratic election. From the ranks of the TUCP came at least 7,000 volunteers to help NAMFREL's vote monitoring effort. While other unions joined the Communists in urging workers to boycott the election, the TUCP embarked on a nonpartisan voter turnout campaign, the only one besides that of the Catholic Church. Those with an interest in seeing the election fail, notably the Communists and corrupt military officers, were so infuriated that the workers posted guards to defend themselves. Despite boycott calls, murder, intimidation, and fraud, the voter turnout was the largest in Philippine history.

TUCP General Secretary Ernesto F. Herrera said that "the people's right of suffrage has been desecrated with rampant vote-buying, terrorism, and ballot-snatching. . . . No less than a genuinely mandated leadership is needed to let the center hold and put the nation on the road of reconciliation and renewal."

Herrera won the AFL-CIO's 1985 George Meany Human Rights Award for the leading role he played in the fact-finding panel that called for the indictment of top army leaders and Marcos cronies in the Benigno Aquino assassination. He has every right to be worried. Twenty years of corruption and ineptitude have resulted in economic disaster for Filipino workers. Political strife follows. On one side, desperate people are seduced by Communuists who say, "things will be better after the revolution." These poverty-stricken Filipinos do not know what happened to ordinary workers in Vietnam and Cambodia "after the revolution."

On the other side was the oligarchy that Marcos represented, backed by a military that by its abysmal behavior during the elections lost what shreds of credibility it still had. The utter ruthlessness of the Marcos machine was revealed in the "10,000 to 0" vote counts that were returned from some of its strongholds. It sought no compromise.

The struggle of the Philippine labor movement to preserve a democratic center didn't start with this election. Several years ago, recognizing that traditional trade union techniques were insufficient to meet the economic and political crisis engulfing their members, the TUCP and its allies among rural workers' organizations embarked on a series of innovative social assistance programs for workers and their families.

These programs include low interest loans for credit-starved small farmers, skills training for landless rural workers (particularly sugar-workers), health care programs for families living in the remotest barrios, special apprenticeship programs, and financial outreach assistance for the small entrepreneurs who are so much a part of the Philippine scene. At a time when 300,000 sugarworkers are unemployed and the Philippine sugar industry is in a state of collapse, the sugarworkers' union is actually gaining members.

These activities serve several goals: They address workers' immediate needs; they promote free trade unionism and (often directly) help union organizing drives; they give people hope, and an independent democratic alternative both to the violent Communist insurgency and the dismal status quo. But these activities are not risk-free. At least 27 trade unionists have been murdered in the past 18 months, many by Communists, others by the military or their allies.

Using grant monies primarily from the U.S. Agency for International Development and the National Endowment for Democracy, the AFL-CIO's Asian-American Free Labor Institute (AAFLI) has been helping trade unions operate in countries where the climate for democracy is much worse than in the Philippines. But American workers might ask: Why is the AFL-CIO expending tax dollars overseas when many U.S. unionists are enduring the most difficult economic times since the Great Depression?

Samuel Gompers, the first prgsident of the American Federation of Labor, denounced American colonialism in the Philippines. Indeed, the AFL-CIO consistently criticizes the human rights abuses of dictatorships of both the left and the right. Where men and women are organizing, the American labor movement feels involved.

Admittedly there is a degree of self-interest in labor's activities. American workers are hurt by the exploitative labor policies of countries with export-oriented economies. Teaching the basics of organizing and collective bargaining to workers earning a dollar a day is a step—albeit a small one—toward correcting the gross imbalance in living and working conditions, that underlies so much of the world's problems.

Ernesto Herrera accepted his George Meany Human Rights award at the AFL-CIO convention last October. In his speech, this courageous fighter for human rights, crippled by polio early in life, outlined his view of the situation in his country:

". . . we are fighting an uphill struggle for democratic unionism. The dictatorial Marcos regime cannot possibly like us. Nor can the Communists in the guise of unionists, (or) pseudo-unionists, (or) their armed supporters . . . but we cannot cower or compromise. We cannot accept a faked democracy. Nor can we join hands with the Communists. Simply put, we know what we want. We believe in unionism unadulterated with Communism. We believe in authentic democracy. We believe in human rights."

This is a philosophy—and a trade unionist—that the AFL-CIO can and does support. We believe our activities are an act of solidarity in the finest tradition of the American labor movement.

OHIO TO PURSUE EQUITABLE PAY PRACTICES

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, the great State of Ohio is again showing its leadership. On Wednesday, March 19, the Governor of Ohio announced that he would implement the findings of a 2-year study which determined the extent to which the civilian classification system conformed with the principles of pay equity.

The study, undertaken by the Ohio Bureau of Employment Services Women's Division in consultation with a private compensation group, was divided into two parts. First, the State analyzed the 12-year-old compensation program to determine whether men and women performing jobs equal in value received equivalent pay. The study found, in fact, that the Ohio civilian pay system compenstated its employees fairly. Second, the State conducted a thorough review of the classification system. The study found that while the system is basically sound, the job classification should be updated to reflect the jobs common to the 1980's and beyond.

The new classification system will ensure that jobs are not compensated on the basis of gender, but, rather, on the basis of skill, effort, responsibility, education, and other legal, compensable factors, In announcing his decision to implement pay equity, Governor Celeste stated:

Ohio's families have a stake in pay equity because they depend on women's wages. The new pay structure will provide fair treatment for all state workers, improve the status of working women in Ohio, and bring to state government the most current personnel management techniques.

I commend my own State of Ohio for having the foresight to examine its civilian pay structure, identify its weaknesses, and begin to implement improvements. I only wish that the Federal Government would act in such a positive manner and agree to enact my Federal pay equity study. As you will recall, my Federal pay equity legislation, H.R. 3008, passed the House last October by a vote of 259 to 162. The bill has yet to be considered by the Senate. I am hopeful that the Senate will act favorably on the bill so that the Federal Government can join those States that have demonstrated their commitment to eliminating discrimination in the workplace.

I am very proud of Ohio and Governor Celeste for reaffirming the State's resolve to treat its workers fairly. Pay equity is an idea whose time has come.

THE SCHACHT FAMILY—A FAMILY OF ACHIEVEMENT

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, today, I would like to recognize the achievement of Daniel J. Schacht, of Concordville, PA. On Thursday, March 13, 1986, Dan was recognized for achieving the highest rank in Scouting, the "Eagle Scout Award."

Dan has been in the Scouting program from Cubs to Webelos and on through Scouts. In becoming an Eagle Scout, he will join the ranks of a very select group. The individual tasks which he had to complete challenged him mentally, physically, and psychologically. The sum of those achievements and the perseverance they demanded illustrates the high caliber and motivation of this young man.

But there's not just one Eagle Scout in the Schacht family. Dan's two older brothers, Steven and Eric, also achieved the rank of Eagle Scout—Eric in 1978 and Steven in 1981. And in 1982, I had the honor of appointing Eric to the U.S. Military Academy at West Point from which he will graduate this May.

These three young men are a tribute to their parents, Al and Judy Schacht, and to their Scout leaders. I am proud to congratulate Dan Schacht for his outstanding contributions to his community, as well as those of his two brothers. I am honored to have individuals like Dan, Steve, and Eric in my congressional district and I am sure my fellow Members of Congress join me in wishing them good luck in their future endeavors.

LESSONS FOR PRIVATIZATION IN THE UNITED STATES

HON. RICHARD ARMEY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, privatization is an exciting new approach that can help us deliver Federal goods and services more efficiently and effectively. It can save us money and, in the long run, help us reduce the size of government in general.

The National Center for Policy Analysis has put together an excellent study of privatization, entitled "Privatization Around the Globe: Lessons for the Reagan Administration." Compiled by Peter Young, this study examines a wide variety of successful privatization efforts around the world.

The report begins by analyzing the British experience with privatization. A British Treasury release recently stated that privatization "ranks among the most radical reforms of the UK's economic and industrial structure since 1945."

Under Margaret Thatcher's direction, the British Government has sold $28 million of public-sector assets and is currently selling assets at the rate of about $5 billion a year. Also, nearly 400,000 jobs, representing one-third of the total public-sector jobs, have been transferred to the private sector. Conservative Party Chairman Norman Tebbit stated that in 1979 Britain had the largest public sector in the Western world, but by 1990 it will have the smallest.

The NCPA report also looks at privatization in developing countries. It points out that State-owned telephone and telegraph companies are being sold to the private sector in Bangladesh, Mexico, Thailand, South Korea, Malaysia, and Sri Lanka; State-owned banks are being sold to the private sector in Thailand, Singapore, Bangladesh, Malaysia, South Korea, Chile, the Philippines, and Taiwan; railways and bus services are being privatized in Thailand and Sri Lanka; highways are being privatized in India and Malaysia; shipping and shipbuilding are being privatized in Singapore, Bangladesh, and Sri Lanka; and the list goes on and on.

There is even a movement toward privatization in Communist countries. State-owned houses are being sold to the tenants in Cuba and China. The Chinese are encouraging medical doctors to set up private practice, and Hungary is now producing over one-half of their food in the private sector. Even the Soviet Union is making some noises about the virtues of private ownership.

But what does this mean for the United States? The theme of the NCPA report is that privatization can be used successfully in the United States. The report argues:

> The task of the Reagan administration should be to conduct a fundamental reexamination of the scope of the public sector in America and to devise intelligent and saleable privatization policies.

There are two criteria to the above prescription: Intelligence and saleability. Unfortunately, we live in a highly politicized environment so the "saleability" criterion often outweighs intelligence. However, I believe we can devise privatization projects that meet both needs.

For example, I believe that we could proceed immediately with a sale of Federal housing units to the tenants, what I call urban homesteading. Federal housing projects cost the Government billions of dollars to build and maintain, and often end up in shambles after a few years. Why not sell these units to the occupants for a token sum? The tenants will surely take much better care of the units if they own them. The net result is positive all around, both for the tenants and the Government.

Recently, I chaired a hearing held by the Grace Caucus Task Force on Privatization which focused on privatization options facing the Reagan administration. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget. James Miller III, was one of the many experts who testified in favor of privatization. Dr. Miller praised the NCPA report, and remarked that such a study will hopefully inspire Americans to jump on the privatization bangwagon, which has already been rolling for several years in other countries around the globe.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend NCPA and Peter Young for putting together this excellent account of privatization efforts around the world. I recommend it to anyone interested in delivering a myriad of Federal goods and services in a more efficient and effective manner. Our chronic deficits have demonstrated the compelling necessity to discuss new approaches. I believe privatization is an idea whose time has come. Let's not miss the opportunity to put it to work for the American people.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I was absent from the floor of the House of Representatives for the last vote of the day on March 19, 1986. Had I been present, I would have voted in the following fashion:

Roll Call No. 60: H.R. 2453—Older Americans Act Amendments, the House agreed to the conference report on the measure to amend the Older Americans Act of 1965, to increase the amounts authorized to be appropriated for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987 for commodity distribution, "yea".

I am a strong supporter of the conference report which would increase the authorization level for meals served under the Older Americans Act.

In 1984, Congress reauthorized the Older Americans Act through fiscal year 1987 at levels for commodity support for congregate and home-delivered meals based on projected participation rates. Since then, the Department of Agriculture revised its projections to reflect the dramatic increase in the number of senior citizens receiving meals. The USDA has estimated that 8 to 18 million more meals are being served to senior citizens across the country this year. If the authorization level had not been increased, the per meal reimbursement rate to State and local offices of aging would have had to be cut back and hundreds of older Americans in my congressional district as well as throughout the country would have lost important nutritional benefits.

This is a wonderful program which permits senior citizens to receive one balanced meal of the day. Moreover, the congregate meals give many lonely senior citizens the opportunity to meet and socialize with others in the community.

I am delighted to see that the House of Representatives voted to make up this funding shortfall and ensure the continued effectiveness of this important program.

LATIN AMERICAN STRATEGIC STUDIES INSTITUTE

HON. BILL McCOLLUM

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to my colleagues attention the valuable contribution the Latin American Strategic Studies Institute [LASSI] has made to our understanding of Central America.

LASSI's primary concern during its first year of operation has been to establish an information base for the American public on the historical background, contemporary issues and future trends in Latin America. Our recent debate on aid to the Contra forces in Nicaragua has definitely underscored the need for accurate, unbiased information. LASSI's goal has been to fill that gap and I'm pleased to report that they have indeed succeeded in this venture.

Father Thomas Dowling, Cornelius Barrington and the rest of the staff at LASSI provide a professional service which had not existed previously. I, personally, would like to take this opportunity to commend their efforts to date and wish them continued success in the future.

COMMUNIST REVOLUTIONS: RUSSIA AND NICARAGUA

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, anyone who cares to look can easily see the historic parallels between the Nicaragua revolution of 1979 and the Russian revolution of 1917. The overthrow of a hated despot by all elements of society working together, followed by the gradual squeezing out of the moderates by the Communists. Their cry of imminent foreign intervention to justify an immense military buildup used to divert domestic attention and, together with martial law, to quell domestic dissent. Repression of the church, and the press, formation of the neighborhood committees to identify those not committed to the government's "ideals," and gradual elimination by execution or imprisonment of "enemies of the people." Russia since 1917—and Nicaragua since 1979—it's all there to see, and it's all the same.

Now, four new, fragile democracies, in El Salvador, Panama, Honduras, and Guatamala, are facing the threat of subversion from the only totalitarian government left in Central America, Nicaragua.

Our President's policy is to prevent that threat from succeeding. There are over 15,000 men willing to fight for pluralism and freedom in Nicaragua. Some say that's not enough. Perhaps, but Castro had only 4,000 when he overthrew Batista. And the Nicaraguan guerrillas—which then included Eden Pastora and Arturo Cruz—numbered only 5,000 when they overthrew Somoza.

Mr. Speaker, there are 15,000 willing to fight and die to contain the Nicaraguan threat. There are some here who would turn their backs on these brave people and give Communist subversion on our doorstep a free hand. I'm not one of them.

LEGISLATION TO MAKE FISHING INDUSTRY SAFER

HON. MIKE LOWRY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that I believe will make the fishing industry safer.

According to U.S. Coast Guard figures, an average of 250 U.S. fishing boats sink each year. Furthermore, the death rate for fishermen is seven times the national average and twice that of the next most hazardous profession. I am greatly disturbed by these statistics and I am sure that insurance underwriters are also troubled by these statistics. I hope that this legislation, and similar legislation that I understand will be introduced in the near future by other Members, will be the first step in reducing the casualty rate for fishermen.

This bill will require that all fishing vessels be equipped with an emergency position indicating radio beacon [EPIRB]; liferafts or lifeboats sufficient to accommodate all crew and passengers; and survival suits to enable all crew and passengers aboard the vessel to survive for at least 4 hours immersion in waters in which the vessel operates. In addition, certification by a marine surveyor is required before a vessel enters a new fishery if such transition would require significant changes in equipment or operational techniques. To enforce these provisions, the exemption for fishing vessel inspections is repealed.

Some may argue that the requirement for additional equipment will only increase the cost of fishing. I believe just the opposite. I believe these costs will offset by lower insurance costs in addition to saving lives. In addition, this bill will also have an effect on reducing the Federal deficit because Coast Guard search and rescue costs would be reduced if all fishing vessels had EPIRB's. According to the Coast Guard, the cost of the average search and rescue operation is greater than the cost of buying EPIRB's for all fishing vessels.

Clearly something must be done to address the safety and insurance problems in the fishing industry. Congress can no longer afford to do nothing on this issue. I look forward to working with other Members to resolve these problems in this Congress.

NEED MORE PUBLIC SUPPORT FOR FAMILY PLANNING

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, Saturday, March 22, marks a very special anniversary for those of us who are staunch supporters of family planning programs: It is the 14th anniversary of the Supreme Court decision guaranteeing all people access to contraception.

In its landmark 1972 decision, Eisenstadt versus Baird, the Court struck down a Massachusetts law designed to prevent contraception. The Court made clear in the Baird decision that it is unconstitutional to limit access to contraceptives. Yet today, opponents of family planning still attempt to do just that by trying to gut domestic and international family planning programs.

It is critical, now more than ever, that people let the rightwing extremists know that this isn't the 13th century. Chastity belts simply are not a reasonable form of birth control in 1986.

The so-called right-to-lifers have expanded their agenda to include outright destruction of the very programs which prevent unwanted pregnancy. It is especially sad because the people who suffer most from these attacks are the people most in need of family planning services—the poor in developing countries and here at home.

As a member of the Appropriations Committee, I have fought numerous antifamily planning amendments in committee and floor debates. It's unfortunate that the people who draft these destructive amendments seem to have no positive goals. Their personal beliefs about contraception are archaic, and they want to impose these beliefs on the rest of the country.

Justice Brennan, in writing the Baird opinion, made reference to the very private nature of an individual's decision whether to have children. Brennan wrote that:

If the right to privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child.

It has been 14 years since the Supreme Court ruled that limited access to contraceptives violates equal protection under the laws. The anniversary of that decision reminds us that the goals of antifamily planning zealots are blatantly discriminatory, as well as an invasion of privacy.

We must also remember the practical benefits of family planning programs. In any given year, each Government dollar invested in family planning saves at least $2 in health and welfare costs related to unintended births the following year. Among teenagers, this savings is even larger, estimated at $2.90. Further, counseling and contraceptive services improve maternal and child health care, particularly for low-income women and teenagers.

There is a tremendous need for greater public endorsement of federally supported family planning programs. People need to make their voices heard. Before the Baird decision, there was no such thing as equal access to contraception. If the people throughout country don't let Congress know they support Federal family planning programs, there won't be equal access in the future.

TRADE DATA BANK BILL

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation directing the Department of Commerce to set up a trade data bank. The bill:

Requires the Secretary of Commerce, through the International Trade Administration, to develop and maintain a system to monitor and organize commercial information dealing with international trade. This information would be of assistance to private businesses and State agencies engaged in export activities.

This trade information system would augment existing information gathering efforts of the ITC and utilize state-of-the-art equipment to monitor, organize, analyze, and disseminate information on foreign countries.

Secretary of Commerce shall consult with State export agencies and the private sector regarding the establishment and maintenance of the trade information system.

Requires the Secretary of Commerce to establish a program to provide international trade advice and assistance to individual firms located in the United States.

Fees shall be charged to reimburse the Commerce Department for such services. A schedule of these fees shall be published in the Federal Register.

I call upon my colleagues to join me in the effort to combat our growing trade deficit by making state-of-the-art trade data information available.

A CARIBBEAN VIEWPOINT ON THE CARIBBEAN BASIN INITIATIVE

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues are aware that from its inception, I have had grave reservations about the impact of the Caribbean Basin Initiative. I have attempted to have legislation adopted that would at least get some organized Caribbean advice about how to make the Caribbean Basin Initiative be truly effective, and have met with resistance at every step. I recently was sent an article from a paper aimed at the Caribbean audience. The article concerns the Caribbean Basin Initiative, and I insert it into the RECORD as a contribution to the ongoing debate on the CBI:

CARIBBEAN ECHO, FEBRUARY 28, 1986

CBI—A FAILURE

President Reagan at long last concedes that the Caribbean Basin Initiative [CBI] plan is of no worthwhile meaning to the Caribbean Islands—a fact we projected on these pages as far back as 1984.

It does not take a genius to see that the basin plan lacked foresight together with understanding.

What puzzles us however, is the fact that leaders like Seaga, and Eugenia Charles, failed to observe the shortcomings of this brainchild of President Reagan.

We have no doubt that the President was misdirected by his peers, hence today he is placed in the position of having to accept the real truth.

The Caribbean islands are known to be predominantly of an agricultural setting, which should mean that whatever plan is presented, agriculture must be the focusing point for it to be meaningful.

Yet for all, the only product connected to agriculture—sugar, met with pressure from all angles. The other product, made again from sugar cane—which is rum one can see the price skyrocketing to heights that is so unaffordable that customers decline to buy it.

CBI, according to the original presentation was intended to ease especially the export tariffs, but instead it tightened the grips making exports to America from the Caribbean even harder.

The various Caribbean governments fell for the garb of the tongue, and the glibness of men like George Schultz, who mesmerized them into spending enormous sums, which they could ill-afford, masquerading all over the United States hoping to benefit from this lame-duck plan.

There is no way, with the present projection, the Caribbean islands can or will benefit and the leaders need to address themselves to the hard facts of it all.

The lesson learned from CBI must be a painful one, and our concern goes out for the small businessmen who took the dive over the last two years, after being led by their leaders to believe that somewhere along the line, they would benefit. Lack of foresight seems to be the apparent failure of the leaders, and such irresponsible doings should never be allowed to continue. Leaders owe a responsibility to their people and, therefore, when plans are being presented by foreign governments, they need to carefully study them before jumping like blind bats and further committing their people.

Mr. Seaga, with all his brilliance, misled his people, and so did Ms. Charles, and all the others who gave their support to this plan. At the same time, credit must be given to Prime Minister John Compton, of St. Lucia who although having given his support questioned it in many circles. But like a lone wolf, his voice and feelings went unheeded.

Now that Mr. Reagan paid them the honour of saying his plan is a failure, they need to look more diligently for a real plan that will inject some kind of booster to the respective economies through exports.

PRESIDENTIAL SUPPORT OF CLEAN COAL TECHNOLOGY WELCOMED IN NATION'S COALFIELDS

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, according to reports in the press, yesterday, President Reagan endorsed the January 1986 "Joint Report of the Special Envoys On Acid Rain" compiled by Drew Lewis, on behalf of the United States, and William Davis, on behalf of Canada.

The major recommendation of this report, which the President has now embraced, is that the U.S. Government should implement a 5-year $5 billion emission control technology commercial demonstration program with the Federal Government and the private sector sharing the costs on a 50/50 basis.

Many Representatives of coal-producing regions, such as myself, have been working for the establishment of just such a program for some time now, and in fact, last year, the Congress appropriated approximately $400 million for a clean coal technology program. Our efforts on this matter did not meet with an enthusiastic response from the Reagan administration, and I am pleased the President, through his endorsement of the Special Envoy report, will now be working with us, rather than against clean coal technology funding.

Let me make one thing perfectly clear. Those of us from the Nation's coalfields do not fear new combustion technologies. We are, in fact, in the vanguard of the effort to develop more efficient and environmentally sound methods of burning coal.

We also do not fear the close examination of the causes and effects of acid deposition. We have always stated that this phenomenon must be addressed from the coolheaded perspective of scientific fact rather than from the emotionalism of innuendo.

For example, a close reading of the most recent National Academy of Sciences report, "Acid Deposition, Long-Term Trends," brings to light many of the points I have been making for years. The report concluded that the trend of acid deposition in the Northeast "has been one of modest decrease" although it stated some increases were found in the Southeast and, to a lesser extent, the Midwest. However, with respect to the latter two regions, the buffering capacities of the soil greatly reduce the occurrence of acidified surface waters, according to other scientific documentation.

The academy report found that existence of sulfates in lakes in northeastern United States, in relation to the amount of sulfates present in wet deposition in that region, decreases with distance from major source regions. This substantiates the arguments I have been making that long-range transport of sulfur emissions from the Midwest is not the major cause of any acidification of lakes in the Northeast.

The report found that while anthropogenic, or manmade, sources of emissions are related to acid deposition in the Northeast, data from New York, New Hampshire, and Wisconsin suggest that lake acidity levels are not determined by acid deposition alone and may "result from other human activities or natural causes."

And finally, the report found no conclusive evidence that acid deposition alone is adversely impacting the Nation's forests.

Mr. Speaker, let us move forward with developing new coal combustion technologies for they will benefit the consumer by providing more efficient and economical electrical generation along with their environmental benefits. Let us not adopt some sort of arbitrary and costly point source emission reduction plan. Science does not support this approach. It would not work.

TRIBUTE TO IDAHO FARMERS AND RANCHERS ON NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY—MARCH 20, 1986

HON. RICHARD STALLINGS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, Thursday, March 20, is National Agriculture Day. I want to congratulate all of Idaho's farmers and ranchers on this national day honoring American agriculture for their continuing dedication to our State's most vital industry.

In these days of economic distress, it seems even more important for us to pause and reflect on the tremendous contributions our farmers and agribusinesses have made to our great State and the country as a whole. It is not by accident that agriculture has become our largest industry, contributing more than 20 percent to the Nation's gross national product. The importance of agriculture to our State and national economy is due entirely to the tireless and often unrewarded efforts of hundreds of thousands of individual farmers. Agriculture is, without a doubt, our greatest source of national strength.

I believe we should view this day of celebration as a new beginning, to restore our faith in the traditional family and community values of rural America and to rebuild the economic vitality of our agricultural industries. But first we must recognize the severity of our continuing economic problems and willingly accept the challenges ahead of us. Above all else, I believe it is absolutely essential that our Idaho farmers and ranchers receive adequate market prices for their products. The availability of affordable credit must also be assured, with a full recognition that credit is no substitute for economic profitability.

We must commit ourselves to forward-thinking farm policies and programs that are flexible, based on reality rather than political philosophy, and are responsive to current real world conditions as well as future changes that will have a direct and fundamental impact on our agriculture producers. We must also demonstrate our commitment to U.S. competitiveness by aggressively adopting a unified agricultural trade policy and by expanding market access for U.S. products.

I believe all Idaho farmers and ranchers are committed to these goals and will continue to use all of their resources in this effort to improve net farm income and halt the demise of our rural economies and communities. Together, I believe we can and will make a difference in reshaping the future of our agriculture which is truly the "heartbeat of America."

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

HON. THOMAS J. TAUKE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, the designation of today, March 20, as "National Agriculture Day", provides all of us with the opportunity to recognize the enormous contributions which American farmers and their families make to the national economy and to the quality of life in the United States.

America is unquestionably the world's greatest producer of agricultural commodities. This is due partly to our advanced technology, but more importantly, this is the result of the sweat and dedication of millions of farm families and other Americans involved with the agricultural industry. These men and women are the bedrock foundation of our great republic, and today I rise to say "Thank you" to each and every one of them.

Nevertheless, we cannot pay tribute today without acknowledging that all is not well today on American farms. Unfortunately, National Agriculture Days do not provide the cash need for spring planting, don't eliminate the effects of weather, don't ensure decent prices for farmers' products, and don't help pay the enormous financing costs which many of this Nation's farmers are now bearing.

America's and the world's agricultural economies are going through a dramatic transition, and these changes are inflicting a terrible cost on many farmers. Besides acknowledging our debt of gratitdue to American farmers, however, I want to pay special tribute to those men and women who are making extraordinary contributions in assisting farmers through these changes. I am speaking specifically of the workers in our county agricultural stablilization and conservation service offices.

I know personally that the administrators and support staff of these offices are making substantial personal sacrifices to ensure that farmers receive the service and consideration that is due them. These dedicated employees are keeping their offices open late at night and working through the weekends in order to process the paperwork, study the new farm program rules, and share their knowledge with area farmers.

Like the farmers themselves, these workers seldom receive the gratitude they deserve, and their important contributions are often underestimated and sometimes even disparaged. We should be aware that they are in a difficult position, especially considering the recent changes in farm programs that have been dumped in their laps by the USDA bureaucracy. And they haven't been helped by the recent congressional activity to change certain sections of the 1985 farm bill approved just 3 months ago.

People like Donella Watkinson in the Linn County ASCS office and Debbie Wilson of the office in Elkader, IA, have exemplified the patient and dedicated public service which all Americans expect and deserve. Please join me, therefore, in saying "Thank you" to Donella, Debbie, and their colleagues in the county ASCS offices across this country for a job well done.

THE REWARD INCENTIVE GRANTED TO HONEST TAXPAYERS ACT (THE "RIGHT" ACT)

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the reward incentive granted to Honest Taxpayers Act, a bill which would provide limited compensation to honest taxpayers for the time and expense incurred by such taxpayers in being audited by the Internal Revenue Service. The payments contemplated in this bill would be funded solely from the revenues raised if any Federal tax amnesty program is adopted by Congress. The bill provides that all revenues raised by any Federal tax amnesty program would be used exclusively to fund such compensatory payments to honest taxpayers.

Under this legislation, an individual taxpayer who is audited by the Service in a "substantial audit," would receive compensation of up to $500 when either there is no audit adjustment or the audit adjustment is relatively insignificant. An individual taxpayer would receive compensation of, first, the lesser of $500 or one-half of the tax shown on the return for an audit adjustment of less than 1 percent, second, the lesser of $300 or one-fourth of the tax shown on the return for an audit adjustment of less than 2 percent, and third, the lesser of $100 or one-tenth of the tax shown on the return for an audit adjustment of less than 3 percent. No compensation would be paid, however, if any part of the underpayment for the taxable year were due to intentional disregard of rules or regulations, or fraud.

In introducing this bill, I would like to make it very clear that I am not endorsing any of the proposals for Federal tax amnesty before the House. In fact, I believe the concept of Federal tax amnesty is ill-conceived and poor tax policy. It represents a slap in the face to those citizens who have honestly paid their taxes year after year. It is an affront to those good citizens which comprise the bulk of the taxpaying public, to enact a tax break for the tax cheaters. There are those who have suggested that amnesty is part of the answer to our deficit problem, that it is a quick way to raise some easy money. In fact, tax amnesty is an extremely inefficient way to raise revenue. According to a preliminary estimate by the Joint Committee on Taxation, tax amnesty would raise at most $1 billion. The U.S. Treasury has also released an estimate only slightly higher. The modest revenue gains that we can expect from tax amnesty in the short run are almost certainly outstripped by the long-term costs resulting from the erosion of current voluntary compliance levels as taxpayers begin to expect future tax amnesties, and honest taxpayers lose faith in the system. The message it says to honest taxpayers is "Don't be a chump and pay your tax, is you wait long enough, the Congress will come back with another amnesty proposal." That's the wrong message.

Notwithstanding these problems, if a tax amnesty program is adopted by the House, I would urge my colleagues to adopt this bill as an integral part of any such amnesty program. We owe it to the honest taxpayers that make a voluntary assessment system, such as we have in the United States, possible.

RADIOACTIVE WASTE

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, last year I joined several of my colleagues in opposing the Department of Transportation's irresponsible decision to transport radioactive wastes through the city of New York—the most densely populated area in the Nation.

We argued that it is utterly senseless to select a route that endangers the safety of the greatest possible number of citizens. Hundreds of trucks overturn on the Long Island Expressway each year. Shipping the waste by barge would pose less danger to fewer people.

Unfortunately, the Department has continued to allow radioactive material to roll through our city streets. It contends that the risk of an accident is "infinitesimal."

Mr. Speaker, last weekend this "infinitesimal" risk became a reality. A tractor-trailer hauling radioactive waste ripped apart as the driver attempted to squeeze the rig under elevated train tracks in Queens. Had the cargo been high-level rather than low-level waste, the result could have been catastrophic.

This latest accident shows that DOT is clearly more concerned about uniformity and convenience than about overall safety. We should recognize that the worst case scenario sometimes does occur, and that accidents involving radioactive contamination do happen.

Mr. Speaker, let's prevent a full-fledged tragedy. Let's do what's safest for the largest number of people, and stop trucking radioactive material through our neighborhoods. Most of all, Mr. Speaker, let's eliminate the risk that, in the city of New York, is not infinitesimal, but instead is almost an everyday occurrence.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

HON. JOHN J. DUNCAN

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, it all started one night in March of 1983. I was comfortably seated in front of the television set, contentedly feeding myself oreo cookies, when suddenly my father walked into the room. "Family," he says, "we're moving overseas!" I couldn't believe it. We were actually leaving the continent of North America, leaving behind the United States—leaving McDonald's, MTV, and the Boston Celtics. I cried, I screamed, I even ran away, but to no avail. Two months later we were on the plane heading for our new destination.

In time, I came to accept my new home, but I'm ashamed to say, it wasn't for awhile later that I realized I had missed the United States for all the wrong reasons. Oh, sure in the beginning I longed for a Burger King or even K Mart, but as I grew older, I found there was also the American flag, freedom of speech, and a democracy. Also, what became most important to me as an inspired American youth, was the wide spectrum of opportunities available to me only in America.

New windows and new scopes can be found in all endeavors of American life. Since we're aided not only by the awesome advances in technology, but also by the democracy of our Government, we youth of today are faced with ever-expanding challenges—and unbridled horizons. Horizons available only in America.

For instance, there is the opportunity of education. In the United States today there are thousands of colleges, all willing to cater to aspiring young students. The colleges even offer help for those in financial trouble, through scholarships and literary contests.

There are work-study programs, and community involvement programs, all designed to support the rising young scholar. Athletic programs promoted by schools project the "sound mind and body." Contests sponsored by universities and corporations encourage healthy competitiveness between young people, a necessary ingredient for the growth of our Nation.

And there are still more opportunities for our youth in other varied professions. In the world of science, there is no end to the swirl of questions surrounding our world. A young mind is always welcome. In the world of physiology, the studies made on the brain everyday increase the questions, therefore the horizons. In the world of computers the introduction of technology has made this field perhaps one of the greatest potentials for youth.

Another of the many admirable attributes of the United States is the heavy emphasis placed on human individuality. Only in America can we be what we want to be, say what we feel and do as we say—no restrictions, no limitations. As built into the American tradition, the horizons offered in the United States are available to all of us regardless of race, creed, or color. There are young people in such professions as law, medicine, sports, and even politics.

But there are still many horizons that are yet untouched. That most mysterious frontier ever space has still to be fully explored. Perhaps, it is time for my generation to begin our own explorations. I have a suggestion.

To increase the ever-expanding numbers of opportunities available only in America, I hope the United States will add one more to its list. That is, allow the next civilian in space to be an American youth! In this way, could the United States show how far the American youth are able to go, how much they can achieve. The sky is no limit. I know I'd gladly volunteer myself! It would be a small step for me, but a giant significant step for the young people of America. It seems like a million years since I first boarded the plane that took me overseas. But I can say of my beloved nation, what Robert Emmet once said of his Irish homeland, "My country is my idol."

I have come to realize that everything I do or have stems from my American roots—my ideas, my rights, my golden opportunities, my choice of horizons. Everything I live for comes only from America. I will give something back.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, On St. Patrick's Day, Americans of all backgrounds become honorary Irish. It is a day to come together to celebrate the unique spirit of the Irish and to pay tribute to their many contributions to the civic, cultural, social, and commercial institutions of our Nation.

In this spirit, I was privileged to join with thousands of New Jersey Irish—real and honorary—on Sunday, March 16, for the 51st anniversary Newark St. Patrick's Day parade. The parade is the oldest and largest in the State. This year's grand marshal was Mr. J. Brendan Vesey. Ms. Sheila Lenihan served as deputy grand marshal. Mr. Thomas P. Giblin served as general chairman. Mr. Giblin, vice president of the Essex County Board of Chosen Freeholders, is the son of Mr. John J. Giblin, a former grand marshal (1951).

The parade this year is dedicated to the memory of Daniel O'Callaghan. Mr. O'Callaghan, 19, chose to live as a Good Samaritan and paid for that decision with his life. Early one Sunday morning in 1984, young Danny saw four youths in a truck being attacked by a band of teenagers. He rushed to their rescue and was also attacked. Three days later he died. By his braver deed, Danny showed us the true meaning of being a good Irishman.

The success of this year's parade did not come about because of the luck of the Irish. Many fine people worked long and hard, among them: Bella Nugent Laughlin, first vice chair; Thomas P. Gerrity, second vice chair; James P. McCarty, treasurer; Helen M. Washington, recording secretary; Mollie Murphy, corresponding secretary; John A. Kenney, financial secretary; Gerald P. Lenihan, adjutant; Terrence O'Reilly and Mary Vesey, sergeant-at-arms; Dennis Lenihan, historian; Michael K. Farrell, judge of elections; Rev. Msgr. John J. Maloney, chaplain; and Michael McCormick, chief of staff.

Like many other immigrants, the Irish came to America seeking opportunity and fleeing misfortune. In the 19th century, many Irish immigrants toiled hard building the railroads that linked the coasts of our growing land. Others worked the mines and factories. And they often had to fight nativist mobs that brandished anti-Irish, anti-Catholic slogans.

But these early Irish-Americans prevailed because of their faith in the American dream, and the strength of conviction, love of liberty, and spiritual resourcefulness that they brought with them from the Emerald Island.

As the patron saint of Ireland. St. Patrick has become a symbol of the Irish people—and for good reason. For his message was one of peace and justice, of faith and religion, of learning and commitment. When he arrived as a Christian missionary on the shores of Ireland over 1,500 years ago, he inspired a deep spiritual reverence in the people that can still be seen in the churches he built and the arts and letters that, to this day, continue to flourish.

THE UNPRICED MILITARY CONTRACTS REDUCTION ACT

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, Congressmen SIKORSKI and BRYANT, my colleagues on the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, are joining me today in introducing the Unpriced Military Contracts Reduction Act of 1986.

Unpriced orders and other unpriced contractual actions are military procurement contracts that authorize a contractor to start work before a price has been set. The Government is responsible for all costs incurred up until the time a price is negotiated and the contract is "definitized."

In an era of increasingly severe Federal budget restraints, we simply can no longer afford wasteful military procurement practices. The use of unpriced orders, letter contracts, change orders and other unpriced contractual instruments at the Pentagon has grown enormously in recent years. There is no doubt that such informal contracting procedures are now used excessively and for the wrong reasons in far too many cases. Billions of our constituents' tax dollars are being squandered. It is time for Congress to step in and impose some responsible controls that will limit this type of contracting to situations where it is clearly cost effective and necessary.

For the past year, our Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee has been engaged in an extensive investigation of the use of unpriced orders and other unpriced contractual actions at the Department of Defense. Our investigation of one specific unpriced order last fall revealed, among other things, that the Air Force paid $8,800 for a pulley puller that a local machine shop could manufacture and deliver for $69.

Unpriced contractual actions at the Pentagon reached the unprecedented level of $27 billion in fiscal year 1985. This figure—a huge chunk of DOD's overall procurement budget—includes $11.5 billion at the Navy—triple the 1982 level—and $12.9 billion at the Air Force—double the 1984 level.

The Pentagon recognizes this problem and has pledged to deal with it. In a February 7, 1986, letter to Chairman DINGELL, Defense Secretary Weinberger says he is:

> Committed to reducing the number of unpriced contractual actions. Their rightful place is a tool to be used in support of urgent operational needs.

The commander of the Naval Air Systems Command recently summed up the problem with unpriced orders rather well:

> Cost-consciousness is usually absent when ceiling priced or unpriced orders are issued since there is very little motivation on the contractor's part to control costs due to the fact that "costs incurred" up to the time of negotiations are usually accepted by the Government.

A recent procurement management review at that same command noted that some naval plant representative officers have estimated that the Government pays as much as 30 percent more as a result of orders not being "forward priced." And, in the case of the "pulley puller," the extra and unnecessary cost to the taxpayers was obviously much more than 30 percent.

As Secretary Weinberger points out, unpriced orders should be limited to "urgent operational needs." Yet audit teams for both the Naval Audit Service and an Assistant Secretary of the Navy told our subcommittee staff that they believe the growing use of unpriced orders can be tied directly to the huge increase in procurement funds we have seen in recent years.

A recent Navy directive obtained by the subcommittee lists specific "criteria of urgency" that are deemed sufficient to justify the use of unpriced orders in the procurement of spare parts. One of the three specific "criteria of urgency" is "loss of funds," which means, according to the notice, if "appropriated funds" are "in danger of being lost due to imminent expiration of funding obligation date."

In a report prepared for Chairman Dingell, the subcommittee staff cited this notice as evidence that:

> The Pentagon is so awash with procurement funds that it must resort to wasteful and irresponsible procurement practices to spend its annual budget in the time allotted.

So, there's no doubt that the Pentagon—and the American taxpayers—have a big problem here. And our investigation has convinced us that the primary cause of the problem is that the Pentagon has failed to follow rules and regulations already on the books that are intended to prevent the excessive use of unpriced instruments.

In the "pulley puller" case, three regulatory safeguards intended to prevent abuses were in place at the time. First, Air Force Systems Command regulations make unpriced orders allowable only if the procurement is "urgent." Second, the contractor had a specific contractual obligation to recommend the most cost effective method of procurement. Third, Air Force regulations require that a final price on unpriced contracts be negotiated within 180 days.

All three safeguards were ignored or otherwise failed to work in this case and the system totally broke down. The result, among other things, was an $8,800 pulley puller. This sort of thing simply cannot be allowed to continue. While Secretary Weinberger and others agree and have pledged to curb these abuses, Congress is ultimately responsible to the people of this country for spending tax dollars wisely. And, in all candor, we are a little skeptical of the Pentagon's willingness or ability to clean up its own mess. Again, regulations have been on the books for years to prevent the sort of thing we say in the "pulley puller" case.

And these safeguards seem to fail consistently. A recent draft report prepared by the Defense Department's inspector general found that 42 percent of the letter contracts and unpriced orders reviewed "did not have documentation in the contract file to support the use of an unpriced action and 66 percent were not definitized in a timely manner." The report condludes that "these conditions existed because of the lack of adequate acquisition planning, administrative convenience and insufficient management attention."

Mr. Speaker, a whole host of internal Pentagon audits, dating back to 1979, have identified widespread abuses of unpriced orders and directed specific policy changes. Since unpriced orders have grown enormously in just the past couple of years, it's clear to us that these directives have generally been ignored. And what assurances do we have that new regulations, limitations or other safeguards implemented by the Defense Department will fare any better?

As a result, we believe Congress can and should step in. The most obvious place to start is to give some of the Pentagon's existing regulatory safeguards the force of law. And since the Pentagon has pledged to reduce the overall level of unpriced orders, there should be no objection if Congress decides to codify such reductions.

Accordingly, with the encouragement of Chairman DINGELL and the assistance of his staff, Congressman BRYANT and SIKORSKI and I have drafted the Unpriced Military Contracts Reduction Act. Let me briefly outline the major elements of our bill:

First, we would limit the percentage of appropriated DOD procurement funds that could be obligated for undefinitized contractual actions to 10 percent in fiscal year 1987 and 5 percent in fiscal years 1988 and 1989.

Second, we would prohibit undefinitized contractual actions unless the contracting officer certifies the urgency of the action. Specific criteria of urgency, which must be included in the certificate, are listed in the bill.

Third, we would prohibit progress payments on any undefinitized contractual actions when more than 40 percent of the work has been completed or the contract is more than 180 days old, whichever occurs first.

Finally, for undefinitized contractual actions entered into before the effective date of the act that have not been definitized and where more than 40 percent of the work has been done, further progress payments would be prohibited and the ultimate negotiated profit could not exceed 5 percent of the total cost.

Again, we are proposing to write into law some of the key regulatory restrictions that are already on the books to prevent excessive use of unpriced actions, as well as some of the recommendations for corrective action that are included in various Pentagon directives and internal audit reports. We know that our colleagues on the House Armed Services Committee share our concerns about the enormous growth of unpriced contracts at the Pentagon in recent years, and we look forward to working with them on this important legislation.

GHOST OF DUVALIER HAUNTS HAITI

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, the Duvalier appointed junta in Haiti is having its problems. It seems that the junta can't seem to identify and appoint ministers who are not strongly opposed by the people of Haiti. Opposition to the Duvalier junta appointments has been based on the relationship between the appointees and the Duvalier regime. American support of the junta and the resumption of aid has not strengthened the hand of the junta where they have been able to totally ignore the will of the Haitian people.

The Minister of Agriculture, Montaigu Cantave, and the Minister of Commerce, Odonel Fenerstor resigned on March 17. Both were under pressure to resign due to their close association with Duvalier.

In the latest shuffle, the Director of the Agriculture and Industrial Bank resigned under pressure 2 weeks ago. Bank employees had demanded the ouster of Leonce Thelusma because of his ties to the family of Michele Bennett Duvalier, the wife of "Baby Doc" Duvalier. The Duvalier junta, not wanting to lose one of its own, then appointed Thelusma as the new Commerce Minister. However, Thelusma's swearing-in ceremony was halted by Commerce Ministry employees who objected to the appointment.

Meanwhile, on the Washington scene, Pierre Sam has been appointed as Haiti's Ambassador to the United States. Once again, the junta has appointed one of its fellow Duvalierists. Mr. Sam served as Secretary of State for Agriculture and Secretary of State for Planning under Jean Claude Duvalier. Although the U.S. Embassy in Port-au-Prince describes Mr. Sam's service to Duvalier as "brief," his work with the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization ended in 1979. It is interesting to note that the U.S. Embassy is issuing statements on the background of Mr. Sam. One would think that that would be the proper function of the appointing authority.

While the Duvalier junta is working to keep its appointments among Duvalier loyalists, the military continues to behave in the Duvalierist way. On March 19, 1986, government troops opened fire on a crowd in Port-au-Prince killing at least four people and wounding at least one. The troops involved were from the Leopards who were the elite palace guard for Duvalier. The Leopards are commanded by Prosper Avril, a member of the Duvalier junta. This is the second known incident of Leopards shooting and killing since Duvalier left Haiti after appointing his caretaker junta. The other episode occurred on February 26, 1986. In that incident, three people were shot and a 16-year-old boy was killed. The Leopards appear to have filled the shoes of the Ton-Tons Macoutes who are actively being disarmed by the junta.

Things are not going well in Haiti. Although the Haitian people were overjoyed that Duvalier had physically left the country, their joy was brief. It is now quite clear that the Duvalier caretaker junta has simply taken "Baby Doc's" place for the moment. Duvalier policies and violence against the people of Haiti continue.

EXTENDED UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM ACT OF 1986

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, today, I am pleased to introduce the Extended Unemployment Insurance Reform Act of 1986. I am joined today by my colleagues, Messrs. CLINGER, LEVIN, STARK, BOEHLERT, Ms. KAPTUR, and Mr. SEIBERLING, in calling for an overhaul of the badly flawed Federal Extended Benefits [EB] Program.

To me, it seems only common sense that Congress should act now—while official unemployment levels are relatively low—to correct the serious problems with the EB system which became painfully apparent during the last recession and its aftermath. The system we have now is inflexible and ineffective. Only Alaska and Puerto Rico currently are qualified for extended benefits, despite the fact that long-term unemployment is a major problem in many other areas, including parts of my own State of Ohio.

The Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation Subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee, of which I am a member, made a good start last year to overhaul the EB Program when my earlier bill, H.R. 1072, was reported from the subcommittee about a year ago. I think now we should take the opportunity to build on the earlier effort to create an efficient, flexible EB Program that targets compensation to areas that need it most and is much more responsive to workers and their needs.

As with last year's bill, this bill would provide between 10 and 30 weeks of additional benefits to workers who have exhausted their 26 weeks of regular unemployment insurance in States with prolonged, higher-than-average unemployment. The bill would qualify States with the greatest levels of unemployment for the most weeks of additional benefits, and it would allow a State to choose between its insured unemployment rate and its total unemployment rate (which includes all the State's unemployed rather than just those receiving regular unemployment insurance benefits) to determine eligibility and benefit levels. The bill would also provide Federal financing for the program on a sliding scale, so that as the State's unemployment rate increases, so will the Federal share of its EB funding.

The new bill goes beyond the bill passed by the subcommittee last year. It provides for a test of sub-State triggers. The statewide triggers currently used fail to address the fact that "pockets" of extremely high and prolonged unemployment often exist in States with overall unemployment rates that fall below the "trigger rate" for extended compensation. Workers in these "pockets" need extended benefits, even though the rest of the State may not. My bill would authorize at least three States to conduct demonstrations of the sub-State trigger concept. Finally, my bill would provide incentives for training, retraining, and job search assistance.

I believe this plan I am offering today would provide an enlightened system which deals with the realities of long-term unemployment. I am very much aware that the problems of the unemployed get much less attention during a time when the unemployment rates are relatively low. However, I think Congress can and should deal with this issue calmly and thoughtfully while we have the chance.

SSI IMPROVEMENT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself, Mr. FORD of Tennessee, Mr. MATSUI, Mrs. KENNELLY, and Mr. BARTLETT, I am today introducing the Supplemental Security Income Improvement Amendments of 1986. This legislation will make the SSI Program more manageable, more effective and better able to serve the needy aged, blind, and disabled. A major goal of this bill is to improve the present unrealistic standards and administration of the program that now impede the efficacy, access, and above all fairness of the SSI Program.

On the 12th anniversary of the SSI Program, it seems appropriate to compare the program's performance with its original goals and expectations. SSI began in January 1974 as a federally funded means tested income assistance program authorized by title XVI of the Social Security Act. It is 100 percent federally funded. Its main objective is to provide basic support to needy aged, blind, and disabled individuals who meet nationwide eligibility requirements.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I have watched the SSI Program in the past few years become needlessly complex and rigid and have seen negative, unintended consequences of current law hinder the original purpose of the program. My bill does not propose comprehensive welfare reform, although that certainly would be a worthy goal. Nor does it try to correct all of the inequities in the program. Instead, it takes incremental—but no less important—steps toward a fairer, more reponsive and more manageable SSI Program. These are steps I believe we must take. My legislation contains several proposals that lead us in this direction.

First, it would treat certain income and resources in a more equitable fashion so that SSI recipients receive the benefits that they are entitled.

Second, the legislation would update the personal needs allowance for SSI recipients in medicaid facilities which has remained at $25 a month since 1974. This works out to 83 cents a day. My modest proposal would increase this amount to $35 a month.

Third, this bill modifies the eligibility requirements so that truly deserving individuals will receive their benefits in a timely fashion. On the other hand, it denies eligibility to aliens for 3 years after entry into the United States if the aliens are sponsored by an agency or organization.

Fourth, there are provisions which make it easier for States to provide emergency assistance to the poorest of poor in our country.

Fifth, the legislation would repeal the penalty against a recipient where the group living facility fails to meet relevant State standards and it calls for a study of alternative methods of promoting the establishment of effective enforcement of standards in these facilities.

Sixth, this bill seeks to provide better outreach and assistance to applicants and recipients of SSI benefits.

Seventh, there are provisions to make the program more responsive to the needs of blind recipients.

Lastly, the section 1619 work incentive program for severely disabled SSI recipients who want work is made permanent.

Taken together these proposals will make the SSI program fairer for recipients, easier for them to understand, more responsive to the truly needy and simplify the administration of the program. These are goals which I believe all of my colleagues can support. The following summary discusses these proposals in more detail.

SSI IMPROVEMENT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

TITLE I—GENERAL SSI AMENDMENTS OF 1986

Subtitle A. Treatment of Income and Resources

Sec. 101. Exclusion of interest and dividends from income.

Provides that interest and dividend income received by an SSI recipient on resources which they own would not be counted as income under the SSI program.

Sec. 102. Exclusion of certain temporary income in retrospective accounting.

Requires that temporary non-recurring income received in the initial month of eligibility or re-eligibility by SSI recipients may not be counted more than once under the retrospective accounting process.

Sec. 103. Exclusion of vehicle from resources.

Provides that in determining whether an individual or couple meets the countable resources test, there shall be excluded one vehicle.

Sec. 104. Determination in living arrangement.

Modifies the assumptions to be used in determining whether or not an SSI applicant is receiving in-kind assistance when living with others in such a way as to protect SSI applicants from an automatic ⅓ reduction in their initital Federal SSI benefit if at the time of application they are living with a relatively low income household.

Sec. 105. Exclusion of certain real and personal property from income.

Provides for excluding from countable income certain unearned income received in the form of real or personal property which would not be counted as a resource in the following month.

Sec. 106. Modification of penalties where assets are transferred at less than fair market value.

Current law provides a two year delay in eligibility for SSI benefits when resources are transferred at less than fair market value in order to qualify for benefits. Current law would be modified to give the Secretary of HHS the authority to waive the denial of benefits to the extent necessary to avoid undue hardship.

Subtitle B. Benefits for Residents of Medical Facilities

Sec. 111. Increase in SSI personal need allowance benefit standard for residents of medical facilities.

Provides for increasing the current $25 a month SSI personal needs allowance federal benefit standard for residents of medical facilities to $35 effective January 1, 1987. As under present law in the case of increases in the regular federal SSI benefit standard, States which currently supplement the $25 federal payment would be required to passthrough the increase in the federal payment and not decrease the State supplementary payment level.

Sec. 112. Federal administration of State supplementation of benefits standard for residents of medical facilities.

Provides that the Social Security Administration shall, at the request of a State, administer State supplementary payments to residents of medical facilities who are eligible for the Federal personal needs allowance.

Subtitle C. Provisions Related to Eligibility

Sec. 121. Payment of benefits due to deceased recipients.

Provides for payment of benefits on behalf of a deceased recipient to the ineligible spouse and the parent of a disabled or blind child. Present law provides that only an eligible spouse may receive the payment that was due a deceased SSI recipient.

Sec. 122. Modification of certain filing requirements.

Provides that certain disabled SSI applicants or recipients (widow/ers who at age 60 qualify for reduced title II benefits) will not be required to file for title II benefits before they reach age 65 if receipt of such benefits would disadvantage the individual, i.e. loss of eligibility for SSI and possibly, health services under Medicaid.

Sec. 123. Eligibility of members of a couple living apart.

Provides that an individual and spouse would be treated as individuals for determining eligibility and payments under SSI after three months of living apart. Current law requires that they be living apart for six months before they are treated as individuals under the SSI program.

Sec. 124. Eligibility of alien for SSI when sponsor is an agency or organization.

Expands the current law's limitation on the eligibility of aliens for SSI. Section 124 would deny eligibility for SSI to aliens for three years after entry into the United States if the alien was sponsored for entry by an agency or organization. Current law considers the income and resources of an individual who sponsored an alien's entry and deems the sponsor's income and resources to the alien but with allowances for the alien's living needs. As in present law, the proposal would not apply to those who become blind or disabled after entry, to refugees or to persons granted political asylum.

Subtitle D. Provisions Related to Emergency Assistance

Sec. 131. Modification of interim assistance reimbursement program.

Expands the interim assistance reimbursement provision to include payment of the appropriate amount of retroactive SSI funds to the State, when the State has provided financial assistance to SSI recipients whose SSI benefits were terminated or suspended and who subsequently are found eligible for those benefits. It would also include the use of the interim assistance mechanism when the recipient's SSI check has been lost or stolen and the State or local agency provided emergency assistance until the SSI check is replaced by the Social Security Administration. Current law only relates to assistance provided prior to receipt of retroactive benefits after initial application.

Sec. 132. Increased emergency advance payments for presumptively eligible individuals.

Provides that emergency advance payments which can be paid directly by a Social Security district office to those in need of immediate subsistence income be increased from a maximum of $100 to a maximum of the monthly regular SSI benefit standard and, if any, State supplementary payment.

Subtitle E. Provisions Related to Group Living Facility Standards

Sec. 141. Repeal of penalty against recipient where group living facility fails to meet applicable standards.

Repeals provision of present law that requires that Federal SSI payments be reduced dollar-for-dollar for any payments made by a State to provide medical or remedial care on behalf of an SSI recipient who is in an institution that is not approved as meeting relevant State standards.

Sec. 142. Study of alternative methods of promoting the establishment and effective enforcement of standards for group living facilities.

Provision directs HHS and GAO to analyze alternatives to current law and report findings by July 1, 1987.

Subtitle F. Provisions Related to Outreach and Notices to SSI Recipients

Sec. 151. Notice to recipients regarding overpayments.

Requires that when an individual has been overpaid, the Secretary must send the person a notice which contains certain specified information: the exact amount of and reason for the overpayment; the months in which the overpayment occurred; a statement of the manner in which, and the rate at which, the overpayment is proposed to be recovered; a statement of the individual's right to seek a review on the finding that the overpayment occurred; the right to seek waiver of repayment; and notice that if waiver or a hearing is sought, payment of full benefits will continue until a decision is made.

Sec. 152. Extension of outreach efforts.

Requires HHS to establish and conduct an ongoing SSI outreach effort similar to the onetime outreach effort provided for in the 1983 Social Security bill. Under the 1983 legislation which elderly and disabled social security recipients who, because of their low level of benefits, were notified that they may be eligible for SSI requires notification of the availability of SSI benefits to potentially eligible elderly and disabled Social Security beneficiaries at least once every 2 years. Provides specific authorization for the Secretary of HHS to contract with private nonprofit organizations, including but not limited to State agencies on aging and area agencies on aging for outreach activities. Also requires HHS to work with other Federal, State and private agencies to identify and notify people potentially eligible for SSI.

Sec. 153. Requirement of increased clarity and readability for written materials to be used by SSI applicants or recipients.

Requires that HHS take action to increase the clarity and readability of written materials to be used by SSI applicants or recipients. The amendment also requires SSA to contract with recognized experts to review current and future notices to determine if they are readily understandable by the SSI population, except to the extent it is determined not to be feasible. The objectives of simplicity and readability should not be permitted to overide concerns for completeness, accuracy, or legal sufficiency.

Subtitle G. Provisions Related to the Blind

Sec. 161. Special notice to blind SSI recipients.

Requires Health and Human Services to provide SSI recipients who are blind with the option of receiving special notice of official actions which may affect their SSI benefit rights. The SSI recipient will be provided the option to receive a supplementary notice of any action by SSA by telephone or to receive the initial notice by certified letter. The Secretary must attempt to provide all blind SSI recipients with the option to receive this supplementary notification within at least one year after the bill is enacted. It also requires the Secretary to conduct a study to determine the feasibility of providing supplementary notification rights to other individuals who may have difficulty in reading printed notices. These individuals may include the mentally impaired and persons for whom English is a second language.

Sec. 162. Technical amendments related to rehabilitation services for the blind.

The amendment also provides that the blind receiving benefits under the SSI program would, as is now the case for disabled SSI recipients, be allowed to continue to receive vocational rehabilitation services funded through the SSI program even if there is an improvement in their medical condition that results in their no longer qualifying for SSI.

Sec. 171. Effective date.

Except as otherwise specifically provided, the provisions of title I are effective October 1, 1986.

TITLE II—SSI WORK INCENTIVE PROVISIONS

Sec. 201. Section 1619 work incentive provision made permanent.

Makes permanent Section 1619 of SSI law, which provides special SSI benefits and/or Medicaid benefits for disabled individuals who are able to work in spite of the continuation of their disability. The 1984 Disability Amendments extended Section 1619 through June 30, 1987.

Sec. 202. Technical amendments to Section 1619.

Includes allowing recipients to regain eligibility for Section 1619 even if they have unusual one time income (other than earnings) which makes them otherwise ineligible for SSI; and restores certain needed references to the title XX social services programs.

Sec. 203. Notifications to SSI applicants and recipients related to potential eligibility for benefits under Section 1619.

Mandates that specific notification procedures are to be used by the Social Security Administration to inform disabled SSI recipients of the potential availability of special SSI benefits and/or Medicaid under Section 1619 when they first become eligible for SSI and again when their earnings begin to exceed $200 a month and periodically thereafter.

Sec. 205. Effective date of October 1, 1986.

IMPROVEMENTS TO USDA EMERGENCY LIVESTOCK FEED ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

HON. RICHARD STALLINGS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am joined today by four of my distinguished colleagues in introducing legislation that is designed to consolidate and improve existing emergency livestock feed assistance programs administered by the Secretary of Agriculture.

I don't believe I need to remind this body of the economic difficulties confronting most if not all American farmers and ranchers today, but I must tell you that these very hardships are being further compounded by the Department of Agriculture's implementation of our Federal farm programs. Nowhere are these contradictions in purpose and reality more noticeable than in the Department's emergency feed assistance programs.

By the very nature of their industry, Mr. Speaker, our farmers continually face uncertain markets, uncertain weather, uncertain yields, and uncertain prices, and yet they persist year after year in producing this country's low cost food and fiber. And when these farmers are hit by successive natural disasters that destroy their crops and threaten their livestock, where are our Federal disaster assistance programs?

There are no less than seven emergency feed assistance programs at the disposal of the Secretary, but rarely if ever, are any of these programs utilized with any effectiveness. To date, in my State of Idaho, only one program has been made available to our producers and that always seems to be "too little too late."

From all indications, the time has come to revamp and streamline these hodge-podge of emergency assistance programs into one workable and cost-effective program that truly helps our farmers and ranchers. The text of the bill follows.

H.R. 4455

A bill to consolidate and improve existing emergency livestock feed assistance programs administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Emergency Livestock Feed Assistance Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. ESTABLISHMENT OF FEED ASSISTANCE PROGRAM.

The Secretary shall establish an emergency feed assistance program for the preservation and maintenance of livestock in any State, where, because of flood, drought, fire, hurricane, earthquake, storm, hot weather, or other natural disaster, the Secretary determines that an emergency exists.

SEC. 3. APPLICATION AND DECISION-MAKING PROCESS.

(a) REQUESTS FOR DETERMINATION OF EMERGENCY.—

(1) All requests for a determination by the Secretary that an emergency exists shall be made by the Governor of the affected State.

(2) Each requested shall state the type and extent of assistance required and shall be accompanied by—

(A) a justification for the request; and

(B) information on the extent and nature of State and local resources which have been or will be used to alleviate the emergency.

(3) A governor shall make a request under this subsection after consultation with a special State emergency board which collects and compiles data regarding the emergency and to assist in the preparation of the request. The special board shall be comprised of—

(A) a representative of the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service;

(B) a representative of the Soil Conservation Service;

(C) a representative of the Farmers Home Administration; and

(D) a representative of the Governor.

(b) DETERMINATION OF EMERGENCY.—

(1) Before the close of the fourteenth calendar day beginning after the date of receipt of any request pursuant to subsection (a), the Secretary shall either—

(A) deny such request for a determination that an emergency exists; or

(B) notify the Governor that the request is under consideration and identify each assistance program being considered.

(2) Before the close of the twenty-fifth calendar day beginning after the date of receipt of such request, the Secretary shall—

(A) make a final determination that an emergency exists;

(B) determine the appropriate assistance program or programs under this Act to alleviate the emergency; and

(C) provide a justification of why other assistance programs under this Act are inappropriate forms of assistance.

SEC. 4. CONDITIONS OF ELIGIBILITY.

The Secretary shall provide assistance under this Act if the Secretary finds that any of the following conditions created by the emergency are present:

(1) The eligible farmer or rancher has suffered at least a 30 percent loss in feed normally produced on the farm for such farmer's or rancher's livestock, and does not have sufficient feed that has adequate nutritive value and is suitable for such farmer's or rancher's livestock (as of the date of the Governor's request for a determination of emergency under section 3(a)(1)) for the estimated duration of the emergency.

(2) The eligible farmer or rancher does not have and is unable to obtain through normal channels of trade without undue financial hardship sufficient feed that has adequate nutritive value and is suitable for such farmer's or rancher's livestock.

SEC. 5. ASSISTANCE.

The following assistance may be made available by the Secretary under this Act to eligible farmers and ranchers:

(1) The donation of feed held by the Commodity Credit Corporation to farmers and ranchers who are financially unable to purchase feed at market prices or to participate in any other program set forth in this subsection, including the cost of transporting feed to the affected area.

(2) Reimbursement of not to exceed 50 percent of the cost of feed purchased by farmers or ranchers for their livestock during the duration of the emergency.

(3) The sale of feed grain held by the Commodity Credit Corporation to farmers or ranchers for their livestock at a price established by the Secretary but does not exceed 75 percent of the current basic county loan rate for such feed grain in effect under the Agricultural Act of 1949 (or at a comparable price if there is no such current basic county loan rate).

(4) Hay transportation assistance to farmers or ranchers of not to exceed two-thirds of the cost of transporting hay purchased from a point of origin beyond such farmers' or ranchers' normal trade area to the livestock, subject to the following limitations:

(A) The transportation assistance may not exceed $50 per ton of eligible hay ($12.50 for silage).

(B) The amount of eligible hay may not exceed—

(i) 20 pounds per day per animal unit; or

(ii) the lesser of the farmer's or rancher's feed loss or the amount of additional feed needed for the duration of the emergency.

(5) Livestock transportation assistance to farmers or ranchers of not to exceed two-thirds of the cost of transporting livestock to and from available grazing locations, subject to the following limitations:

(A) Transportation assistance may not exceed $24 per head of eligible livestock.

INTRODUCTION OF HOUSE RESOLUTIONS IN OPPOSITION TO ADMINISTRATION BUDGET PROPOSALS ON REA AND FEDERAL POWER AGENCIES

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, today it gives me great pleasure to introduce with my colleague from Kansas, Congressman BOB WHITTAKER, two resolutions which express the House of Representatives' opposition to the administration's proposals to phase down and sell off the Rural Electrification Administration and to "privatize" five Federal power agencies—Bonneville, Western Area, Southwestern, Southeastern, and Alaska.

The administration is renewing its all-out attack on the rural electrification and Federal power marketing programs. The President's fiscal year 1987 budget, coupled with legislation being prepared by the administration, poses the most serious threat ever encountered by the rural electric and public power systems in the Nation.

REA: Last year, Senators DOLE, DOMENICI, and ABDNOR announced an agreement with the Office of Management and Budget (OMB). This agreement provided that the Rural Electrification Administration (REA) would not be phased out and that restrictive lending criteria and increased interest rates would not be imposed on REA loans. Despite that commitment only 10 months ago, the administration's fiscal year 1987 budget proposes to eliminate all REA lending programs by 1990, to reduce fiscal year 1987 REA loans by 40 percent and REA guarantees by 72 percent, to increase the REA interest rates to above the Government's cost of money, to add user fees to all new loans, to prohibit REA loans for new transmission and generation, to sell off the assets of REA's revolving fund and to rescind the $100 million reimbursement already provided to the REA revolving fund during fiscal year 1986. These draconian proposals leave no doubt that the administration's pledge to Senators DOLE, DOMENICI, and ABDNOR has been ignored.

Federal Power Agencies: The Reagan administration is proposing to sell the five power marketing administrations to private parties. These agencies—Bonneville, Western, Southwestern, Southeastern, and Alaska—sell power from Federal dams at cost to nearly 1,100 public power systems and cooperatives in 34 States which serve some 60 million customers. A sale of the Federal power agencies would constitute a lucrative giveaway to private investors and a terrible penalty to rural and public power consumers.

Now is not the time to penalize millions of public power and rural electric consumers by driving up utility rates by selling off the power administrations and crippling the rural electric and telephone cooperative systems.

The texts of the resolutions follow:

RESOLUTION ON REA

Whereas rural electric systems are consumer-owned utilities established to provide electric service to rural America, and most are consumer cooperatives owned and controlled by the people they serve,

Whereas rural electric systems serve about 10.5 million farms, homes, schools, churches, irrigation systems, commercial enterprises and other establishments in 2,600 of the 3,141 counties or county-type areas of the United States, as well as Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands,

Whereas Rural Electrification Administration borrowers have helped start and expand more than 20,500 new commercial, industrial and community facility projects which have produced nearly a million new jobs,

Whereas the Administration agreed last year that the Rural Electrification Administration would not be phased out and that restrictive lending criteria and increased interest rates would not be imposed on Rural Electrification Administration loans, and

Whereas the Administration's Fiscal Year 1987 budget also proposes to reduce Fiscal Year 1987 Rural Electrification Administration loans by 40 percent and Rural Electrification Administration guarantees by 72 percent to increase the Rural Electrification Administration interest rate to above the Government's cost of money, to add user fees to all new loans, to prohibit Rural Electrification Administration loans for new transmission and generation, to sell off the assets of the Rural Electrification Administration's revolving fund, and to rescind the $100 million reimbursement already provided to the Rural Electrification Administration revolving fund during Fiscal Year 1986: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, that the House of Representatives—

(1) opposes the elimination of the Rural Electrification Administration loan programs and restrictive lending criteria; and

(2) will work to preserve them in order that the rural electric cooperatives can adquately serve their member-consumers.

RESOLUTION ON FEDERAL POWER AGENCIES

Whereas energy generated at the 130 Federal hydroelectric facilities is purchased by more than 1,000 consumer-owned utilities in 34 states,

Whereas some 275,000 businesses and industries which employ 3 million people and contribute $240 billion per year to the nation's economy are served by these consumer-owned utilities,

Whereas 1.3 million farms in the United States are served by electric cooperatives supplied by Federal power,

Whereas all operation and maintenance costs and the Federal investment in hydropower are being systematically repaid to the United States Treasury, with interest, by Federal power customers, and power revenues also contribute significantly to the repayment of irrigation costs, salinity control and certain fish and wildlife mitigation programs,

Whereas current Federal power policies encourage diversity and competition in the electric industry by supplying local, consumer-owned utilities with power at rates that reflect the cost of production, and

Whereas the sale, transfer or other disposition of the power marketing administrations, or a change in the current repayment schedule would:

(1) threaten consumer-owned utilities and their customers with uncertainty of supply and significantly higher power rates,

(2) erode the present pattern of pluralism in the nation's electric utility systems,

(3) jeopardize the economic vitality of certain cities, states, and regions of the country by increasing electric costs for consumers,

(4) further depress economic conditions in rural areas and farm communities,

(5) renege on existing repayment agreements between the United States and Federal power users, and

(6) eliminate a reliable, long-term source of revenue for the United States Treasury: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, that the House of Representatives—

(1) supports continued Federal ownership and operation of the power marketing agencies;

(2) opposes their sale; and

(3) supports the continuation of existing Federal power marketing policies.

HONORING THE LEAGUE OF MUTUAL TAXI OWNERS OF NEW YORK

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend and congratulate the League of Mutual Taxi Owners on the occasion of its 50th anniversary, which will be celebrated on March 22, 1986.

The American entrepreneurial spirit is alive every day in thousands of men and women who drive our Nation's taxi cabs. For the last half century in New York City, these hard-working Americans have had a friend to turn to when they needed a head start. The League of Mutual Taxi Owners [LOMTO] began as a credit union organized to help people purchase taxi medallions so that they could start their own businesses. In five decades, it has grown from a small operation to a multi-million-dollar financial institution that aids prospective drivers from every ethnic background and from all over the world. Its funding is generated solely from the retired drivers of this fine organization.

Mr. Speaker, I take great pride in informing you of the outstanding contribution the League of Mutual Taxi Owners has made to New York City and its citizens. In providing thousands of people the opportunity to obtain independent work, LOTMO has helped them truly achieve the American dream.

The League of Mutual Taxi Owners represents 5,000 independent owner/operators in New York. Four hundred of these dedicated members will proudly attend a special dinner this Saturday, March 22, 1986. I would particularly like to take this occasion to congratulate the LOTMO's fine officers, including Al Zeff, president; Marvin Gold, vice president; and Phil Pollack, manager and treasurer. The commitment of these men, the other officers, and the entire membership, has certainly made New York a better place.

Mr. Speaker, I call now on all of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to join with me in paying tribute to the League of Mutual Taxi Owners for its fine work on the occasion of its 50th anniversary.

TRIBUTE TO CARL SPINALE

HON. GENE CHAPPIE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. CHAPPIE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize a constituent from my district, Mr. Carl Spinale, who is being honored at a special retirement ceremony on March 22 for his 35 years on the Oroville Police Force.

To the townspeople of Oroville, Carl has become a local celebrity because of his friendly manner and ability to relate to the downtrodden. He has received many awards for his community service, including Oroville's Police Officer of the Year in 1983 and Peace Officer of the Year on three occasions. Throughout his life as a merchant marine, fireman, and police officer, Carl has unselfishlessly dedicated himself to the well-being of his community and to his country. He is a man highly respected by his peers whose presence on the police force will be missed by all. I hope you will join me in congratulating Carl Spinale for his outstanding service to Oroville, and in expressing best wishes for his retirement.

UNIVERSITY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE OPPOSES AID TO CONTRAS

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, we are now engaged in an important debate on aid to the Contras. All of us have heard vociferously from the American public.

I wanted to share with my colleagues a statement released by the participants of a conference, called "The United States and Central America: A Five-Year Assessment," held at the University of Southern California in Los Angeles. The statement says, in part, "The undersigned professors and specialists strongly oppose this aid and the administration's emphasis on military solutions to the crisis in Central America . . . We encourage the U.S. Government to respond to the strong desire for peace in Central America and to promote efforts toward a negotiated rather than a military solution to the conflicts in the region."

This statement makes an important contribution to the debate on this issue, and I want to include it here for the RECORD.

Thank you.

THE UNITED STATES AND CENTRAL AMERICA: A FIVE-YEAR ASSESSMENT

The President has announced that he is seeking $100 million in military and nonmilitary aid to the contras fighting the Sandinistas in Nicaragua. The undersigned professors and specialists strongly oppose this aid and the Administration's emphasis on military solutions to the crisis in Central America. We have recently participated in a conference on The United States and Central America: A Five-Year Assessment held at the University of Southern California February 20-22, 1986, which brought together participants from Central America, Mexico and the United States, and Europe. While a diversity of opinions was expressed, there was universal concern regarding the present direction and future implications of U.S. policy in Central America, both for the region and for the United States. Some of the points of general agreement were the following:

1. In both El Salvador and Nicaragua, the administration appears to be seeking a military solution, which in the context of a military impasse in El Salvador and the weakness of the contra forces in Nicaragua, as well as the unwillingness of the U.S. public and Congress to support direct military intervention, translates into a long-term policy of low-intensity warfare. Such a policy has limited visibility in the United States, but is extremely costly for the people of Central America in terms of loss of life and human suffering, as well as the destruction of economic infrastructure, aggravating conditions of poverty and making more difficult the eventual task of economic reconstruction. It has also been widely recognized that neither a military victory by the Salvadoran armed forces nor the military defeat of the Sandinistas by the contras is likely, even in the long run. Military aid to the contras can only prolong the agony of the people of Nicaragua, and we strongly oppose such aid.

2. The Administration's search for a military solution has narrowed the debate and structured the agenda to exclude negotiations. The failure of the strategy of low intensity warfare to result in military victory will thus increase the likelihood of a direct U.S. invasion. The limitations of options follow in turn from a long-term assumption of U.S. policy: the need to maintain U.S. hegemony with respect to Latin America and particularly with respect to the nations of Mexico, Central America and the Caribbean, an assumption which conflicts with the principle of self-determination of nations, to which the United States subscribes.

3. The conduct of U.S. policy in Central America has been accompanied by violations of international law as well as domestic law. These violations, such as the mining of Nicaragua's harbors by the CIA, erode the legal and moral position of the United States and threaten to isolate it among the community of nations. It can also be argued that U.S. actions are undermining constitutional procedures and democratic processes within the United States itself. Examples are presidential circumvention of congressional debate through the misuse of special funding authority, the administration's failure to provide congress with adequate information regarding its actions in Central America, and similar procedures.

4. We encourage the United States Government to respond to the strong desire for peace in Central America and to promote efforts toward a negotiated rather than a military solution to the conflicts in the region. In January of this year, the eight nations of Latin America constituting the Contadora group and the Support group signed a document in Caraballeda, Venezuela calling for the resumption of bilateral talks between the United States and Nicaragua, an end to foreign aid for irregular forces and insurgent groups in Central America, and a resumption of the Contadora peace talks. Subsequently the Caraballeda document was endorsed by the five Central American countries. Genuine U.S. support for these and other efforts of Latin American countries would constitute a significant step toward peace in the region.

5. In the long run, the changing realities of Central America and of Latin America in general will require a creative rethinking of U.S. policy toward the region, one which goes beyond the narrow interpretation of options in terms of hegemony or withdrawal. Such a reassessment should by based on recognition that the legitimate security concerns of the United States are compatible with respect for the sovereignty of the Latin American nations and that the interests of the United States and the other nations of the hemisphere can be best advanced through mutual understanding and cooperation rather than through a policy of confrontation.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

HON. JIM CHAPMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, in light of the difficult times that our Nation's farmers are facing, I think it is more than appropriate that I join my colleagues in recognizing the importance of the American agriculture industry to the survival of our Nation.

Most Americans think of themselves as living in an urban society and holding city jobs. We don't often equate the terms "farmer and agriculture" with businessman and industry. Instead these terms conjure up pictures of smiling pioneers tilling the soil and merrily milking cows. But the fact is agriculture is this country's largest industry and its largest employer. It is our most productive industry and it is the cornerstone on which the national economy rests. Without a doubt, agriculture is the key to this Nation's survival—as well as that of many other countries.

Every time we sit down to break bread with our loved ones, or meet our friends and neighbors for coffee; everytime we put a shirt on our backs and slip our tired feet into a comfortable pair of shoes; everytime we open a favorite book to read to our children, we are sharing in the wealth of this important and productive industry. Agriculture touches nearly every element of our lives and it produces the one essential of life that we cannot live without.

Given this very basic fact, I believe that all Americans would be well served if they were given a clearer understanding of the role that agriculture plays in their lives and the many direct and indirect ways it affects their well-being. Today, March 20, has been chosen as the day that we as a nation can join together to learn more about this vital industry. Celebrations and seminars are being held in hundreds of communities across the Nation; from Oregon to New York; from North Dakota to Louisiana. These festivities and educational programs are aimed at sharing knowledge about the many facets of agriculture production and at honoring the millions of men and women who have contributed so much to this great Nation of ours.

Mr. Speaker, National Agriculture Day may be just a small step toward promoting better understanding between our rural and urban communities. But with this understanding can come the compassion and support to help each other through tough economic times. America's farmers need our support now. Farmers are the heart of America.

INTRODUCTION OF THE EVEN START—EFFECTIVE SCHOOLS ACT

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleague on the Education and Labor Committee, Chairman HAWKINS, in introducing the Even Start—Effective Schools Act. This bipartisan package contains two programs that hold great promise for educational improvement.

The last few years have been difficult ones for me. As a member of the Education and Labor Committee I am aware of the serious problems of illiteracy, school dropouts, and other educational failings which threaten the strength of our Nation. As a member of the Budget Committee I am also aware of the need to restrain Federal spending in all areas so as to reduce the deficit. The educational problems of the Nation are not going to wait for a balanced budget, so we must try to do more with the funds already available.

I would like to take this opportunity to describe this piece of legislation which I originally proposed as H.R. 2535, the Even Start Act. A recent study by the Department of Education, "What Works," stated that it is critical for parents to engage in reading activities with their children. However, this advice is just another reminder of failure to the millions of parents who cannot read. The Even Start Program would directly attack this cycle of illiteracy by bringing parents and children together to learn.

The goal of the Even Start Act is to help parents learn basic literacy skills while at the same time assisting them to become partners in the early education of their children. More specifically, adult basic education would cooperate with chapter 1 remedial education programs and Head Start to develop innovative approaches to working with adults and children. The first goal of the program would be the training of adults in basic literacy skills. Once this goal was attained, instruction involving the parent working directly with the child would take place. To participate in this program adults would have to be eligible for participation in an ABE Program and have a child aged 3 to 7.

This bill does not propose a specific structure for how these services would be delivered. Instead applicants are encouraged to design innovative and educationally sound proposals to attain the goals specified in the act. Proposals would be chosen on a competitive basis by a review panel appointed by the Secretary representing both rural and urban settings.

The value of a small program such as this is its ability to demonstrate new ways of achieving successful results. The evaluation and dissemination requirements in the bill ensure that we will know what was done, with what effects, and then be able to share this knowledge through established dissemination mechanisms.

Head Start, chapter 1 and ABE have all been successful programs in their own right. The Even Start Program attempts to build from their efforts to make even greater gains in the education of both adults and their children.

Both the even start and effective schools programs would be funded by already existing authorizations; $2 million from chapter 2 and $1 million from adult education would support even start demonstration projects. This is certainly not going to solve the illiteracy problem but it is a start and moves the field into an area with enormous potential. It is my hope that as the economy improves we will be able to build a national program on the success of these models.

CONGRESSIONAL BAY OF PIGS

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today with a dual purpose. First, I feel that it is necessary to warn my colleagues in this great body of the importance of Thursday's vote on the President's request for aid to the Contras. The fate of the House Joint Resolution 540 is truly in the hands of those Members who are undecided about how to deal with the Sandinistas. To those Members I would like to point out that we are dealing with Communists, who view negotiations solely as another option to be used to their advantage. This is exactly why negotiations without military pressure as a backup will only lead Nicaragua further down the road to totalitarianism.

Second, I would like to remind my colleagues of a similar situation some 25 years ago in which there were serious doubts about Cuba's drift toward communism. Today's doubts about America's commitment to defending democracy in the hemisphere are a direct result of America's self-doubts and the resultant abandonment of 1,500 Cuban patriots.

Voting down aid to Nicaragua's freedom fighters now will be unequivocably a "Congressional Bay of Pigs" for which Congressmen must be held accountable.

Mr. Speaker, I submit for the RECORD, "Nicaragua—The Lessons of History," an article by Phil Nicolaides. His article is a well-articulated approach from a historical perspective about the importance of passing the President's request for aid to the Contras:

NICARAGUA—THE LESSONS OF HISTORY

(By Phil Nicolaides)

BAY OF PIGS REPRISE

If the United States now pulls the plug on the Contras it will be a repeat of the Bay of Pigs—in agonizing slow motion. Twenty five years ago we turned our back on 1,500 Cuban patriots we had armed, trained, and promised to support in a bid to free their country from the scourge of communist oppression. This time we will be turning our back on some 20,000 Nicaraguans—after stringing them along for almost five years. Such a contemptible and cowardly betrayal will weigh heavily on our national conscience. But that is not all. We should not be too surprised to find that never again will any Latin people rise up against communism, putting their trust in American promises.

Liberals love to flagellate the U.S. for the shabby way we have sometimes treated our Latin neighbors in the past. Yet the worst we ever did in the much-maligned era of "gunboat diplomacy" pales by comparison to the monstrous crime they urge us to commit against the Nicaraguan people today.

LET NICARAGUA BE NICARAGUA

Five years ago we lit candles and held meetings protesting the brutal Soviet-inspired repression of Solidarity in Poland. The USIA hastily produced a television special, "Let Poland Be Poland," deploring the situation. We imposed a few economic sanctions. There was not much more we could do, everybody seemed to agree. Poland, after all, was a key member of the Warsaw Pact, thousands of miles away, and clearly in the Soviet sphere of influence. Thousands of Soviet troops were already stationed on Polish soil and tens of thousands were poised on its Eastern border.

But Nicaragua is in our "sphere of influence"—it is right on your doorstep. A large, highly-motivated guerrilla force has been fighting the communist regime there for several years. As in Poland, the church is a rallying point for massive popular opposition. This time we can do more than light candles, wear ribbons, and wring our hands. This time we are not limited to chanting "Let Nicaragua Be Nicaragua." This time we are in a position to make it happen by giving the freedom fighters—fighting our battle as well as theirs—the means to win.

If we fail to seize this golden opportunity to win a struggle so close to our borders, so vital to our own security, and so important to the cause of democracy, the message will go forth to friend and foe alike that we are neither dependable nor formidable and that all our talk of standing up for the cause of liberty is only hollow cant.

THE HIGH COST OF SELF DELUSION

Weakness and irresolution in the face of aggression, naive faith in "talks and agreements"—such behavior deepens the contempt and sharpens the appetite of predatory tyrants. Just before Hitler moved into Czechoslovakia's Sudetenland, Czech President Edward Benes went on the radio: "I firmly believe," he said, "that nothing other than moral force, good will, and mutual trust will be needed" to resolve the disputed issues with Hitler's Reich. American correspondent William L. Shirer, appalled at this naivete, wanted to warn Benes that he was "dealing with gangsters." Britain's Neville Chamberlain was equally gullible: "I got the impression," he wrote his sister, "that here was a man [Hitler] that could be relied upon when he had given his word."

President Roosevelt, grumbled to Ickes that Chamberlain's policies amounted to "peace at any price" and predicted the British and French would abandon the Czechs and then try to "wash the blood from their Judas Iscariot hands." I guess that remark—suggesting that a politician's motives might be less than pure and his character less than courageous—would qualify FDR as a "McCarthyite" before his time.

The British and French leaders who dealt with Hitler were sure they had impressed him with their reasonableness and moderation. Chamberlain even fancied he had created a climate of "confidence." In fact, Hitler had learned something very different: "He had discovered," as John Toland puts it, "how far a resolute man, unafraid of using force, could go against adversaries terrified of another world war."

Western concessions far from slaking Hitler's ambitions, encouraged him to take the greater risks which inevitably led to war. For many of our Democratic congressmen the bugaboo is "another Vietnam." But if they now fail to take the modest and timely action needed to dislodge the Nicaraguan beachhead of the Soviet Empire before it has been fully hardened, they will simply embolden the Kremlin to take greater risks to destabilize all the lands south of the Rio Grande.

At some time during that very dangerous and chaotic period, American troops would become involved. But it would not be "another vietnam." It would be the Last Battle for America.

POINT PLEASANT BEACH CELEBRATES 100TH BIRTHDAY

HON. JAMES J. HOWARD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, this year the 12th of June is especially significant for about 5,000 of my constituents who call Point Pleasant Beach their home. Residents of this beautiful ocean side community will pause for a special birthday celebration. It was on this date, 100 years ago, that the New Jersey legislature incorporated Point Pleasant Beach Borough.

When Ocean County broke away from Monmouth County in 1850, seven townships were formed, including Brick Township. Early communities in Brick Township included Bricksburg, now Lakewood, Burrsville, now Laurelton, and Point Pleasant. Growth in the Point Pleasant community led to the legislature incorporating the Borough of Point Pleasant Beach in 1882. Also in that year, the borough's first newspaper, the Beacon, was published. Following the incorporation of Point Pleasant Beach and over the next 40 years, Lakewood, Bay Head, Point Pleasant, and Mantoloking all broke away from Brick and became incorporated.

The arrival of the New York and Long Branch railroad in 1899 sparked development in the Point Pleasant Beach area. By the turn of the century and with the completion of the railroad, the community found itself providing needed relief for vacation travelers who found solace at sandy beaches and by a beautiful ocean.

Today, Point Pleasant Beach still welcomes vacation-bound visitors. Hotel, motel, cottage, or guest house accomodations all await sportsmen ready to take advantage of excellent fishing or recreational boating activities. One only needs to sample seafood at one of the dockside restaurants, stroll the boardwalk or be treated to the warm hospitality of borough residents to realize why millions have enjoyed a visit to the Jersey Shore.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Point Pleasant Beach can be proud of the fine community they and their ancestors have built. I know that I am proud to represent in Congress this beautiful ocean side community.

CITY OF GLASGOW, MO, CELEBRATES 150TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. E. THOMAS COLEMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this year the city of Glasgow, MO, celebrates its 150th anniversary. I have the honor of representing Glasgow in Congress and it is a pleasure to recognize this graceful town with many historic sites and its friendly people. Glasgow was established in 1836 by a group of businessmen who believed that its location on the Missouri River assured its future as a thriving metropolis. Glasgow suffered a severe bombardment and other disruptions during the Civil War and later experienced a decline in the river traffic which once crowded its wharfs with bales of hemp and barrels of tobacco and apples. Glasgow today serves the needs of the surrounding area. While it did not become the major city envisioned by its founders, it is a small but thriving community which preserves an amazing range of historically significant architecture. Although its citizens enjoy the 20th century conveniences enjoyed by all Americans, they also take justifiable pride in their 19th century homes, churches, and libraries. They have worked hard to preserve their town and those of us who have experienced its architectural delights are grateful to them. The town of Glasgow and its residents richly deserve our congratulations as they celebrate their sesquicennential and I commend them to my colleagues here in Congress.

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE RETIREMENT HOUSING FOUNDATION

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the privilege of attending the 25th anniversary celebration of the Retirement Housing Foundation—a California-based organization dedicated to meeting the housing needs of senior citizens.

I was very impressed by the work of this remarkable organization and believe their success can serve as a model for other organizations throughout the Nation.

Over the past 25 years, the foundation has provided dignity and comfort to the elderly. With dedication, aggressive work, and tireless energy, the founders of the Retirement Housing Foundation have grown, since 1961 from an organization with a mere $7,000 in property holdings to a major provider of elderly housing, health care, nutrition, and support services with more than 50 facilities located in 13 States. But the most impressive thing about the foundation is not its size—or even the range of quality services it provides. The Retirement Housing Foundation is worthy of such special notice because, as they have housed and served the elderly, they have nurtured dignity and independence. They have remained true to and deepened their commitment to enrich the lives of senior citizens.

While we are all concerned with meeting the growing need of caring for an aging population, the Retirement Housing Foundation is busy building solutions.

I sincerely hope their next quarter century is as successful as their first and that their standard for improving the quality of life for the elderly is widely emulated.

TO JUSTIFY $100 MILLION IN CONTRA AID IS DIFFICULT

HON. JIM ROSS LIGHTFOOT

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, today I intend to vote against the President's request for $100 million in aid to the Nicaraguan Contras, and I want to take a moment to explain to my colleagues my reason for doing so. Last year Congress approved the President's request for $27 million in humanitarian aid to the Contrcs. I supported that request, as did a majority of my colleagues, because I believe the Communist threat In Central America is real and that for our sake and for the sake of the Nicaraguan people we should take action to stop it. Since our approval of that aid to the Contras last year, the Sandinista government has continued its efforts to export its revolution to neighboring countries and has strengthened its ties to Cuba and the Soviet Union, whose ultimate goal is and always has been world domination. Meanwhile, the suppression of human rights continues, and the Sandinista government has consistently walked out on negotiations with the Contadora nations or refused to agree to reasonable proposals aimed at restoring peace and self-determination to Central America.

However, in Iowa we have our own group of Contras who are fighting for something they consider almost as valuable as freedom—and that is their rural American way of life. With a few exceptions, I've returned to my district every weekend since I was elected, and while I'm there I listen to a lot of very troubled people whose numbers continue to grow. I listen to the businessman on Main Street who is closing the store that his father and grandfather ran before him because the town is drying up. I listen to the struggling farmer who thought he saw some light in the end of the tunnel with the passage of the 1985 farm bill, only to find that the administration will interpret that bill in a way most detrimental to him. And I listen to the student who will keep bagging groceries this year because he decided that farming doesn't hold a bright future for him and he can't get a student loan to go on to college. I listen to all of these people, and all I can tell them is that things will get better because we're working in Congress to reduce the Federal deficit. I firmly believe that deficit reduction is the key to creating an economy in which these people will have a fair opportunity at making it on their own, and I can say that while looking them straight in the eye because I've strongly supported efforts to reduce the deficit.

However, Mr. Speaker, I cannot look my constituents in the eye and say that, despite the urgent need to reduce the deficit, I'm going to support sending $100 million to Central America anyway. I cannot look my constituents in the eye and say I'm sorry you're a legitimate borrower and can't get a loan from the Farmers Home Administration, but the Contras need money too. I cannot look my farmers in the eye and say I'm sorry the Commodity Credit Corporation is broke, but we still have to give the Contras $100 million. And I cannot look my constituents in the eye and say I'm sorry that economic conditions are so bad that I have to organize a districtwide food drive to feed the hungry, and then get on the plane back to Washington to vote $100 million for the Contras.

Mr. Speaker, the economic situation in the farm belt is very desperate, and I simply cannot justify $100 million, a fourfold increase, in aid to the Nicaraguan Contras at this time.

OPPOSING AID TO THE CONTRAS

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, today the House will vote on the administration's request for $100 million in aid to the Contras in Nicaragua. I will be voting "No" on this request.

I want us to find diplomatic solutions to the problems in Nicaragua—I don't want to send either men or money.

Much has been written on the President's request for aid to the Contras. One of the most thoughtful statements I've read recently was issued by a group of Maryland religious leaders including: the Most Rev. William D. Borders, Archbishop of Baltimore; the Rt. Rev. A. Theodore Eastman, Bishop of Maryland; Bishop Joseph H. Yeakel, United Methodist Church; the Rev. Herbert D. Valentine, executive presbyter of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), and the Rev. Douglas Miles, president, Interdenominational Ministerial Alliance.

The issues they raise, the points they make, are right on target. I know my colleagues in the House will benefit from reading them, just as I have benefitted and continue to benefit from their wise counsel.

[From the Baltimore Sun, Mar. 19, 1986]

AGAINST CONTRA AID

(The following statement, released today, is signed by the Major Christian Judicatories, including the Most Rev. William D. Borders, Archbishop of Baltimore; the Right Rev. A. Theodore Eastman, Bishop of Maryland; Bishop Joseph H. Yeakel, United Methodist Church; the Rev. Herbert D. Valentine, Executive Presbyter of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), and the Rev. Douglas Miles, president, Interdenominational Ministerial Alliance.)

As heads of many of the Christian Churches of Maryland, we find it necessary to speak out today to express our opposition to the Reagan administration's attempt to seek $100 million in aid for the United States-backed counter-revolutionary forces (known as contras) who are seeking to overthrow the government of Nicaragua. In our opposition, we stand in solidarity with the United States Catholic conference, the General Convention of the Episcopal Church, virtually every main-line Protestant denomination, and many Jewish organizations, which have appealed to the administration and the Congress to stop funding the contras.

We speak as pastors and religious leaders, who seek to bring a moral perspective to the issues involved in this question, and not just a purely pragmatic or national one. The formulation of foreign policy must involve a clear and constant assessment of our moral responsibilities as a nation and a people, and our government's policies must never be exempted from moral scrutiny. Our fear is that our government has decided upon a military solution to the problems in its relationship with Nicaragua and the wider Central American region. Our conviction is that the militarization of our relationship to Nicaragua and the other Central American nations will only result in an increased loss of life, and an exacerbation of the domestic problems of poverty and injustice which are at the heart of the turmoil in that region. Furthermore, we must seriously challenge the morality and the legality of our government's attempt to overthrow militarily another government with which we are not at war, and with which we have diplomatic trade relations. Such action can only serve to undermine the moral standing of the United States in the international community.

In 1985, the United States Catholic Conference stated its position that:

"The first requisite of a political and diplomatic solution is the recognition that a military solution is neither possible nor desirable. To pursue a military solution, even while proclaiming the goals of political settlements, is to fail the test of political realism and moral action."

Yet the continued militarization of our strategies and goals in Central America reflects the decisions of both the Soviet Union and the United States to make of that region a focal point of indirect superpower confrontation. Because of the interventionist policies of the United States, the Soviet Union and its ally Cuba, the fundamental human needs of the region for social and economic development are made subordinate to the geopolitical strategies of the superpowers.

Consequently, a very narrow political-military notion of security has come to dominate the relationship of the United States to the nations of Central America, as with developing nations in other parts of the world. This is reflected in the increasing militarization of our bilateral aid programs. From 1981 to 1984 congressional appropriations for security increased by two thirds, while development assistance programs remained almost unchanged. This militarization of United States relations to the developing nations of Central America, along with the often destabilizing economic practices of American corporate interests in these nations, has only helped to create and exacerbate the conditions of social turmoil and violence that continually perpetuate warfare and strife in that region. We believe that the administration's proposed aid to the contras can only add to these destructive developments.

Thus, we believe that the question of aid to the contra forces raises fundamental questions about the nature of our relationship to the developing nations of Central America, as elsewhere. It raises questions about our national values and priorities in subordinating the rights of other peoples to full and free human and national development to our larger economic and geopolitical strategies. We believe there is an intimate connection between the national attitudes and priorities which have caused us to militarize our relationships to the poor nations of Central America and the attitudes and priorities that have led to our subordination of the needs of our domestic poor to an ever-increasing military build-up.

In 1985 the General Convention of the Episcopal Church called upon the United States and all governments to cease aid to the contras, cease embargoes against Nicaragua, affirm and respect national sovereignty and self-determination in Nicaragua, and seek a negotiated settlement based on the points of the Contadora group.

We join with the near-unanimous sentiment of the nations of Latin America in urging a regional approach to a negotiated settlement to the problems of Central America. Last month eight of those nations (Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Mexico, Panama, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela) made the extraordinary move of sending their foreign ministers to meet with the Secretary of State Shultz to urge the United States to stop aid to the contras, reestablish bilateral negotiations with Nicaragua (which the United States broke off), and support the diplomatic peace initiative known as the Contadora process. Endorsed by all five Central American countries and by the European Economic Community and Japan, the Contadora process calls for a Latin American solution to Latin American problems so that the region may not be hostage to the East-West conflict. This solution must be based upon the principles of self-determination, which means that each Latin American country must be free to choose its own form of government. Implementing this solution would require commitments by all sides to:

Stop supporting guerrilla armies;

Freeze the region's military build-up;

Suspend international military maneuvers;

Progressively reduce foreign military advisers and bases until they are eliminated;

Support human rights and individual freedoms.

It is clear to us that the Administration's rejecton of the Contadora proposal effectively sabotages the entire process. We therefore urge:

1. Rejection by the Congress of all Administration requests for aid to the contras, whether military or so-called "humanitarian";

2. Genuine support, through deeds as well as words, by the Administration for the Contadora process. Such support should begin by resumption of bilateral negotiations between Nicaragua and the United States;

3. Prayerful reflection and action by all citizens, particularly those in our religious communities and congregations, to promote a deeper union and reconciliation between the peoples of the United States and those of Latin America.

THE SELF-EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY ACT

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, earlier this week, the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation held a hearing on how our unemployment insurance system might be changed to provide additional assistance to dislocated workers in this country. One of the specific legislative initiatives discussed was H.R. 1690, the Self-Employment Opportunity Act, which I introduced last year along with our colleagues, RICHARD GEPHARDT and CHARLES SCHUMER. This bill would authorize several State pilot projects where selected unemployed workers could attempt to create a new job of their own through self-employment—without forfeiting their right to unemployment benefits.

My colleague, DICK GEPHARDT, and I submitted a joint statement on the Self-Employment Opportunity Act for this hearing. We would like to have this statement printed in the RECORD at this time, and we urge all our colleagues to get behind this legislation.

JOINT STATEMENT—CONGRESSMEN RON WYDEN AND DICK GEPHARDT

Mr. Chairman, we want to commend you for scheduling this hearing today to discuss new ways to help solve one of the most wrenching social and economic problems of or time: the plight of dislocated workers. Such workers, many skilled, highly motivated and highly steeped in the American work ethic, have permanently lost their jobs due to the major structural changes our economy is now experiencing. From the steel mills of Pennsylvania to the coal mines of West Virginia, the textile plants of North Carolina, the assembly lines of Michigan and sawmills of Oregon, millions of working men and women are struggling to put their lives back together and regain their rightful status as productive members of our society.

We believe that the federal government can and should be doing more to assist dislocated workers. And we further believe that, if we look at existing federal assistance programs—like unemployment insurance—in a slightly different light, real assistance can be provided without major new appropriations, without adding to the deficit, without threatening the sanctity and primary purpose of these programs and without adding to the tax burden of employers or the general public.

Mr. Chairman, HR 1690, in a sense, does not fit within the announced subject of this hearing today, which is "alternative uses of unemployment compensation trust funds to assist dislocated workers." We are not talking about the trust fund's money. We're talking about an individual worker's money—earned benefits. Why should qualified and motivated workers have the eligibility revoked and those earned benefits taken away simply because they realize that their old jobs are gone forever and they want to try to create a job of their own? That is the bottom line question that HR 1690 seeks to answer. And the answer is that they should not.

For individuals selected by participating states for the self employment option, HR 1690 would remove the restrictions in current law—primarily "work search requirements"—that now prevent dislocated workers from attempting to start a business of their own without losing their eligibility for unemployment benefits. That, in the simplest and most concise sense, is what HR 1690 is all about. No more and no less.

The Self Employment Opportunity Act is an example of how Congress can—on an experimental, demonstration-project basis—find out, not if unemployment insurance trust funds should be used for alternative purposes, but if designated individual dislocated workers can use their own, earned unemployment benefits in a new way. It would give qualified workers whose jobs have disappeared forever a new option—the opportunity to create a job of their own.

We are not offering this proposal as a panacea for the problem of unemployment. Nor are we guaranteeing that it will work. We fervently, believe, however, that it is worth trying.

These pilot projects would be limited in three ways. First, the Department of Labor is directed to accept pilot project applications from at least five but no more than ten states. Second, in those states selected, no more than 5 per cent of the eligible unemployment compensation beneficiaries would be allowed to participate. And third, the demonstration projects would terminate in three years, to be followed by an evaluation of the results by the Labor Department.

The Labor Department is instructed to choose the most innovative and workable state pilot projects, and supplemental state assistance, if available, would obviously be welcome. Selected states would have to set up a screening process to evaluate individual small business proposals and would be encouraged to utilize existing or new small business management and technical support services to help these workers get started.

To encourage innovation and allow each state to most efficiently match individual needs and resources, we have drafted this proposal in a way that would give participating states the maximum amount of flexibility in setting up pilot projects. As presently written, this flexibility would extend to the method of paying unemployment benefits—including the possibility of a lump sum payment that could be used as seed money to leverage additional start-up capital. In the vast majority of cases, however, we expect that selected states would continue to pay benefits on a weekly basis, just as if these workers were not involved in self employment initiatives. Unemployment benefits could be used for food and shelter expenses while other resources—savings, loans from family members or friends, a working spouse's income—could be pooled to meet the start up costs of the business.

We would like to make it very clear that, if the Subcommittee feels that payment methods other than the normal weekly benefit check procedure should not be allowed—either to avoid any possibility of a windfall or misuse of benefits, or to ensure that the primary income maintenance purpose of the program is maintained for the protection of the participating workers—we would have absolutely no objection.

While federal efforts to come to the aid of dislocated workers should extend beyond the unemployment insurance program, we share the concerns voiced by many experts in this area about expanding the purposes of the trust fund itself beyond the primary purpose of income maintenance. Under our proposal, the trust fund would not be jeopardized because we are talking about benefits that have been earned by and are payable to individual unemployed workers. And no one would receive more under the self employment option than they would be eligible to receive under the standard program. In virtually all cases, dislocated workers exhaust their eligibility for unemployment benefits. As you noted in announcing this hearing, Mr. Chairman, dislocated workers are those "who are going to have to change careers and whose spell of unemployment can be expected to last a lot longer than the six months in which they can get unemployment benefits."

In addition, the states, as managers of the trust fund, will have sufficient incentive to make sure dislocated workers are properly identified and the fund is not used incorrectly. As a result of all these factors, the "experience rating" and tax burden of employers will not be affected by the self employment demonstration projects. Again, this program is intended to assist individual dislocated workers who are already eligible to draw unemployment benefits. There is no reason to fear that it would jeopardize the trust fund, employees rights or employers rights in any fashion.

This proposal is modeled after successful programs underway in Great Britain and France that have enabled hundreds of thousands of people to become self employed in the past six years. An encouragingly high percentage of these businesses are still operating after the first three years. One third of all new businesses in France in 1984 were started by unemployed workers.

While there are differences in government support mechanisms between the U.S. and these European nations, these results are encouraging—and sufficiently compelling to justify a similar, experimental program in this country. We are convinced that there are thousands of people in the unemployment lines today with the necessary skills and ingenuity to become self employed. And we need to broaden our perspective on who can successfully start a small business. Not all entrepreneurs are necessarily Harvard MBAs or computer science wizards.

Although the economy continues to grow, many parts of the country—and millions of Americans—are not enjoying the fruits of economic recovery. The unemployment rate crept back up over the 7 per cent mark again last month. The economy is simply not creating enough jobs for all who want to work. If we cannot offer a decent job at a decent wage for everyone who wants one, the least we can do is not penalize those who have the ability and the desire to create their own. Our income maintenance system needs to offer the widest possible number of options to allow workers who will never be able to go back to their old jobs the opportunity to use their individual talents and ability to get back on their feet.

The Self Employment Opportunity Act represents, on a limited, experimental basis, a fundamental but warranted departure from our traditional view of individual unemployment benefits, not the unemployment trust fund itself. HR 1690 would not in any way use trust fund money for any new program or new purpose. It would merely redefine what selected individual recipients can or cannot do and still remain eligible for unemployment benefits to which they are otherwise clearly entitled. Thank you.

CLIFTON LADY LIONS WIN GIRLS' BASKETBALL STATE CHAMPIONSHIP

HON. DON SUNDQUIST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I bring to the attention of the Congress this news from the 7th District of Tennessee. On Saturday, March 15, 1986, the High School Girls' Basketball State Championship was played between two very outstanding opponents. When the Lady Lions of Clifton Frank Hughes School took to the hardwood for the championship contest, they were ranked fifth in the State. On the road to the title game, they had defeated three teams who had enjoyed a higher ranking. In the final game, the Clifton Lady Lions again found themselves as the underdog facing a powerful Greenback squad. In spite of this, under the skillful guidance of Coach Hal Clark, the Lady Lions were not to be denied. When the final buzzer sounded, the Clifton team had won in dramatic fashion by a score of 63–62 and had improved their season record to 35 wins and only 3 losses. To win a State athletic championship is a grand accomplishment and a distinction which can never be taken away. Throughout their lives these young women will reflect on this experience with fond memories and personal satisfaction. Coach Clark and his team are a credit to the youth of our State and are deserving of the highest praise. They are winners, and I salute them and their families.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO RALPH E. CRAWFORD

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the U.S. House of Representatives a man who has served the Sacramento area with diligence and success. On Saturday, March 15, 1986, a retirement dinner in honor of Arcade Fire Chief Ralph E. Crawford will be held.

At only 45 years of age, Chief Crawford has a multitude of impressive accomplishments to his credit. His service record is exemplary of his continuous loyalty and devotion to his community as well as to the U.S. armed services.

After serving 4 years in the U.S. Air Force, Chief Crawford gave 20 years of dedicated service to the Arcade Fire Department including 5 years as fire chief. Chief Crawford's involvement does not stop there. He is currently on the board of directors for the California Fire Chiefs Association, where he holds the position of general manager. During its 1985 term, Chief Crawford served as president of the Fire Districts Association of California and was past president of the Fire Districts Insurance Group of Sacramento. In addition to his many accomplishments with the fire department, Chief Crawford holds the rank of lieutenant colonel in the California State Military Reserve and is a member on the Sacramento Juvenile Substance Abuse and Delinquency Commission.

Mr. Speaker, Ralph E. Crawford has demonstrated an ongoing commitment to excellence and hard work. On behalf of the people of Sacramento, I commend and thank Chief Crawford for his outstanding service to our community.

LEGAL QUESTIONS RAISED OVER WESTLANDS SETTLEMENT

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, on March 13 and 18, 1986, the Subcommittee on Water and Power Resources held oversight hearings on a proposed settlement in the case of Westlands Water District v. United States (CV–F–81–245–EDP).

The Westlands Water District, located near Fresno, CA, receives irrigation water from the San Luis Unit of the Central Valley Project. Westlands filed suit against the United States in 1981 after then Secretary Watt threatened to cutoff water supplies to the district because they did not have a long-term water service contract. For the past 4 years, parties to the litigation have been attempting to negotiate a permanent settlement.

Last summer, Government negotiators submitted a proposed settlement in this case to the Department for review and approval. After becoming aware of the contents of the proposed settlement, I sought legislation to gain disclosure of the proposed stipulated agreement and associated materials.

The Congress passed this legislation in December, prohibiting the Secretary from signing any settlement agreement until first, April 15, 1986 or second, until the Congress had reviewed the agreement for at least 30 days, Public Law 99–190.

The subcommittee's oversight hearings were convened to discuss the implications of the proposed settlement.

Mr. Speaker, our hearings uncovered some very disturbing facts. The hearings clearly revealed that the proposed agreement contains provisions which violate existing Federal reclamation law. Other provisions violate the spirit of the law. In every case where the negotiators were faced with a judgment call, they appear to have decided in favor of Westlands. These conclusions are supported by comments contained in internal Interior and Justice Department memoranda.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to summarize for my colleagues the major conclusions reached as a result of our hearings.

VIOLATIONS OF LAW

First. No repayment contract for distribution and drains: The San Luis Unit authorizing act required distribution systems and drains to be repaid within 40 years of being placed in service. The Department only has secured repayment contracts for $157 million of the $248 million appropriated to date. As one internal memo notes, the proposed settlement "violates all relevant contract provisions of reclamation law and 60 years of established procedures" on this issue. The specific statutes violated are the 1926 Omnibus Adjustment Act and the 1939 Reclamation Projects Act.Z42146 larry n. hearn march 20, 1986 jacket number 71-060 A20MR8.153 folio(s) 3zb/4zb

Second. Shifting the drain to the main project features account: The proposed settlement would shift funds previously appropriated and obliged from the empty distribution and drainage account to the indexed main project features account. Not only is this shift unjustified under the 1960 law, but further, it ignores the specific rejection of such an interpretation by Congress in 1977. This shift would eliminate the necessity of Westlands to come back to Congress for authorization of drainage funds, including the cleanup of Kesterson, for many years.

Moreover, all drainage funds must be repaid in full by Westlands, whereas the main project features are repaid, in part, by power consumers. The effect of this ill-advised policy is to shift payment costs to other water and power users.

Third. No authority for drainage funding: The proposed settlement would establish a mechanism calling for Westlands to provide $5 million per year for 20 years as an "up-front" cost-sharing arrangement for payment of drainage costs. However, Westlands would not be required to sign a repayment contract for the full cost of solving drainage problems as required by the 1960 San Luis Act and the Reclamation Projects Act of 1939.

Fourth. Improvement Districts Violate Reclamation Reform Act: The proposed settlement would allow Westlands to establish "improvement districts" to sign contracts for additional water supplies. In this way, Westlands can circumvent coming under the provisions of the Reclamation Reform Act of 1982 which requires full compliance with the law whenever supplement benefits are received.

As the Justice Department review of the agreement noted, this provision is "especially patent because improvement districts are in this context nothing more than alter egos" of Westlands itself.

Fifth. Repayment contract for $31 million exempt from Reclamation Reform Act: Westlands pledged in 1977 to repay $31 million in drainage costs which have subsequently been spent. The last increment of the $31 million was appropriated in fiscal year 1985, 2 years after enactment of the Reclamation Reform Act. If Westlands now signs such a repayment contract, it would be covered by the Reclamation Reform Act which mandates coverage when any new contract is signed. The settlement provides that this contract shall not be covered by the act.

The Justice Department stated it was not "persuaded" by the arguments to support this interpretation.

Sixth. Entire settlement exempt from Reclamation Reform Act: The proposed settlement includes a provision which exempts the entire settlement from coming under the Reclamation Reform Act.

The Justice Department correctly concluded there was no basis for such a conclusion. As Justice observed "this paragraph raises one of the more troubling questions rayised by this Settlement. * * *."

Seventh. Allows water deliveries to lands outside the congressionally established service area: When Congress authorized the San Luis unit, it specifically detailed the lands which were authorized to receive Government subsidized water. The proposed settlement ignores the law and allows water deliveries, some of which are now draining selenium into Kesterson Reservoir, to receive Federally-subsidized water. This would violate, according to the Interior Department memo, the San Luis Act and the precedent in 25 other Bureau projects.

CHANGES IN POLICY

The proposed settlement would establish a series of unprecedented policies all of which would undermine the Reclamation program, or work entirely to Westlands' benefit.

First. Added repayment costs for others: The proposed settlement would defer capital repayment, at zero interest, well into the next century. It would also create O&M deficits which would have to be borne by other water users. A December 4, 1985 Interior Department memorandum states that:

> The settlement defers payment by Westlands of some $130 million in capital repayment until after 2008. That capital shortfall would be paid back, interest free, over the years 2008-2030. Under the CVP ratesetting policy proposed by the Bureau . . . at least $50 million of this repayment would be shifted from Westlands to other water districts * * *. (Emphasis added).

Second. Violates April 3 agreement for closure of Kesterson: The April 3, 1985 agreement calling for the phased closure of Kesterson requires Westlands to undertake and pay for all drainage work. This approach is consistent with the 1960 authorizing act. This proposed settlement, however, shifts the burden for solving the drainage problem to the Federal Government and will result in the taxpayers picking up the tab for millions of dollars in costs.

Third. Preferential status for additional water: The proposed settlement gives Westlands preferential status for 250,000 acre-feet of water for which it has no long-term water service contract. At present, the Bureau has requests for 4.1 million acre-feet of water, but it only has 1.1. million acre-feet available for contract. This agreement puts Westlands at the head of the line for this water, notwithstanding the fact that this water would be delivered to lands outside the authorized service area, as well as to some lands implicated in the selenium contamination crisis.

Fourth. Prejudice in Contra Costa case: A 1977 agreement in the case of Contra Costa versus United States enjoins the Secretary from signing any water service contract with Westlands until a supplemental EIS has been finalized. If the Secretary were to sign the stipulated agreement which is the subject of these hearings, he would be—in the words of the Justice Department—"pre-judging the outcome of the EIS process presently underway as a result of the Contra Costa litigation."

ADVANTAGES OF SETTLEMENT DISPUTED

Contrary to the testimony offered last week, internal Interior Department memos clearly point out that the costs of settlement exceed those of going to court. According to the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Policy, Budget and Administration, the present worth of revenues from settlement are $209 million. However, the revenues to be derived from winning the case are $260 million. Even the worse case scenario results in a loss of only $9 million.

Given these facts, it is difficult—if not impossible—to understand the public policy grounds on which the proposed settlement was agreed to in the first place. As one internal memo noted, the reason stated is that this will bring an end to "angry conflict" and "make friends happy—great victory to farmrs." However, it would "stir up enemies—GEORGE MILLER, METZENBAUM, et al."

It should also be noted that, far from ending the angry conflict, even the judge in this case acknowledges the dispute will continue in the courts.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, this proposed settlement will shape California's water future for decades. Equally important, it will determine the integrity of the Reclamation Reform Act of 1982.

However, this proposed settlement would result in a double standard for Westlands. While other districts throughout the West must comply with existing laws, Westlands would be exempted. The proposed settlement is rife with inconsistencies and double standards.

If the goal is to use whatever legal means exist to trigger the Reclamation Reform Act, they have failed.

Just deciding a course is legal doesn't mean it is the proper course. Questions must be asked regarding the manner in which public policy decisions are made within the Interior Department.

The internal memos we have seen which repeatedly condemn the proposed settlement are troubling, not because they were written in the first place, but because the advice and recommendations they contain have been rejected and ignored by administration officials.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge the Secretary to reject this settlement and go to court. This settlement clearly is not in the public interest. It would destroy the integrity of reclamation law and establish an inconsistent standard of enforcement.

PRO AMERICA ORGANIZATION RESOLUTIONS

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to endorse three resolutions passed by the Pro America organization. Pro America's efforts to educate the American public regarding a wide spectrum of domestic social issues and important international events, help the advancement of the conservative agenda in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I submit for the record three resolutions: First, Expose and Oppose the National Education Association; second, Support English As the Official Language of the United States, and third, Material Help for Afghan Freedom Fighters.

EXPOSE AND OPPOSE THE NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION

Whereas, the National Education Association (NEA), founded in 1857 for the purpose of advancing the cause of education, promoting professional excellence and gaining recognition of the importance of teachers in the educational process, was gradually influenced by the socialist-humanist "progressives," who had begun to infiltrate the teaching profession, teachers' colleges, and the text book industry; and

Whereas, this socialist-humanist progressive network shared a number of basic beliefs that would form the philosophical foundation of the new curriculum—an absolute faith in science and the theory of evolution, a belief that children could be taught very much like animals in accordance with the new behavioral psychology, a conviction that there was no place for religion in education and that traditional values were an obstacle to social progress which had to be removed; and

Whereas, the ultimate goal of these "progressives" was, through conditioning by uncoerced persuasion of the students and teachers of the public schools, to convert this Republic into a socialist state; and

Whereas, through the years the NEA has become more radical and, within the past several decades, increasingly a militant labor union (rather than a professional organization), ruthless and effective in political action, made possible by millions of dollars of compulsory union dues; and

Whereas, in that connection, the NEA works constantly for the repeal of Section 14 (b) of the Taft-Hartley Management Act in order to force more compulsory unionism on teachers; and

Whereas, they openly and arrogantly admit (NEA Oregon UniServe Bulletin, October 1981) that "The major purpose of our associations is not the education of children, it is or ought to be the extension and/or preservation of our members' rights. We earnestly care about the kids learning, but that is secondary to the other goals."; and

Whereas, the devoted members of the NEA persistently follow the advice of Dr. George S. Counts that "the teachers should deliberately reach for power and then make the most of their conquest . . . " (in his publication, "Dare the Schools Build a New Social Order?"); and

Whereas, their demands for more and more power over American education and for more and more millions of taxpayer dollars are equaled only by a greater and greater decline in quality of education and SAT scores, accompanied by heretofore unheard of increase in functional illiteracy, sexual promiscuity, teenage pregnancies, violence in schools, and suicides of young people; and

Whereas, for the NEA and the educational establishment massive functional illiteracy has proven to be the greatest financial boon in the history of public education, with millions of dollars in federal grants to the special education teachers to undo what has been done in the classroom; and

Whereas, from Pavlov's experiments in Moscow, it is known that by imposing look-say teaching techniques on an alphabetic writing system one can artificially induce dyslexia, thereby creating a learning block or reading neurosis, and this fact was known to many American educationists who were determined to continue this method; and

Whereas, among the many goals set forth in the NEA 1984-85 "Legislative Program" were the support of nuclear freeze, use of classroom courses on nuclear war for all grade levels, opposition to all tuition tax credits and use of vouchers in education (page 149), support of the Equal Rights Amendment including military service for women, support of sex education, including homosexuality, and the demand that teachers be free from censorship or legislative interference and that communication between certified personnel and students must be legally privileged, opposition to any testing of teachers, and opposition to tax indexing; and

Whereas, the protection of Pupil Rights Act or Hatch Amendment, passed by Congress in 1978, to protect children from psychiatric examinations and related activities in the schools, was ignored by the Department of Education; and

Whereas, public pressure forced the publication of regulations in 1984, with hearings (to which the NEA sent no representatives) in seven different United States cities, and these hearings revealed shocking documentation of what is going on in the schools of America in the name of education; and

Whereas, the NEA's response to the new regulations has been a vicious attack on the Hatch Amendment (with the NEA Newsletter, Dec. 3, 1984, agonizing in oversize type that "The Hatch Act could change the Way you Teach Forever"); Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of the National Association of Pro America do all in their power to expose the disastrous consequences of what has passed for education in the last several decades, expose the National Education Association as the major source of the problem, oppose further accumulation of power by the NEA, and work to promote knowledge about and enforcement of the Pupil Rights Amendment (Hatch Amendment).

GLOBAL EDUCATION

Whereas, the ultimate goal of Global Education is to "internationalize" education on a world-wide scale, and it is being introduced (initially, as "bilingual" education in some areas) through State Legislative bills and Superintendent of Public Instruction offices; and

Whereas, the proposed curriculum spells out movement toward a socialistic form of government, and humanistic concepts of teaching values clarification where there is no right or wrong, no good or bad and, in fact, no absolutes whatsoever; and

Whereas, Global Education encourages exploration of alternative and non-traditional lifestyles and critical evaluation of long-established cultural patterns, thereby seeking to break down the time-honored American tradition and family unit through political indoctrination and cultural revolution; and

Whereas, the concept of national sovereignty and patriotism is replaced by "international citizenship" and interdependence, thereby violating current teacher obligation to teach allegiance to the United States, as a sovereign State; and

Whereas, emphasis is placed on "fear" . . . of nuclear warfare, global hunger, poverty, pollution, overpopulation and environmental destruction, and

Whereas, the program is very expensive, ultimately requiring the establishment of world-wide resource centers, libraries, training of personnel and building of extensive facilities; Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That, with the security of the United States in mind, the National Association of Pro America oppose the use of the concept of Global Education in all its forms and in every area of education including the public, private, and parochial schools of this country.

MATERIAL HELP FOR AFGHAN FREEDOM FIGHTERS

Whereas, the United States Congress has passed House Concurrent Resolution 237 and Senate Concurrent Resolution 74 declaring the intention of the United States to provide material assistance to the Freedom Fighters (Mujahideen) of Afghanistan; and

Whereas, the majority of the people of Afghanistan oppose the encroachment by a totalitarian puppet regime emplaced and supported by Soviet aggression and their ongoing reign of terror and genocide against the civilian population; and

Whereas, the the Afghan Freedom Fighters singlehandedly have taken a stand against the continuing imperialism of the Soviet State, pledging their lives and sacred honor against a barbarian aggressor and for the defense of freedom worldwide; and

Whereas, the Soviet presence in Southwest Asia is destablizing to world peace and specifically threatening to Pakistan, Iran, and the Middle East oil lanes, placing Soviet planes based in Afghanistan within two hours flying time of the Persian Gulf; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Association of Pro America reaffirm its Resolution V, 1982, "Support Afghanistan's Freedom Fighters," that it support the aforementioned Congressional Resolutions and urge Congress to aid the defense of freedom in Afghanistan by taking all necessary steps to supply adequate weapons, food, clothing, medical aid, and other materials directly into the hands of the Afghan Freedom Fighters now and encourage international support for their courageous stand against the tyranny of international communism and its military war machine.

NICARAGUAN RESISTANCE

HON. CONNIE MACK

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, in the ongoing debate on assistance which the United States should be extending to the Nicaraguan resistance, I believe we should pay close attention to the views of the Hispanic communities in Florida which have close cultural and family ties to Latin America.

Recently, the Florida Commission on Hispanic Affairs, a commission of 15 members of Hispanic civic, professional, business, labor, and community leaders throughout the State, passed a resolution supporting the President's request for military and humanitarian assistance to the Nicaraguan freedom fighters.

This resolution, which I wholeheartedly support, illustrates the desire of the Hispanic community to support freedom and democracy in their homelands. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert at this point in the RECORD the text of the resolution of the Commission on Hispanic Affairs.

RESOLUTION

Whereas, the Florida State Commission on Hispanic Affairs (Hispanic Commission) is an official state commission established by the Legislature in 1976 to voice and represent the over one million Floridians of Hispanic origin; and,

Whereas, the Governor of the State of Florida appoints the fifteen members of the Hispanic Commission from among Hispanic civic, professional, business, labor and community leaders throughout the state; and,

Whereas, the present composition of the Hispanic Commission is representative of the principal ethnic, racial, and national origins that make up Florida's Hispanic population, including Puerto Ricans, Mexican-Americans, Cuban-Americans, Colombian-Americans and persons born in this country of Hispanic heritage; and,

Whereas, the Hispanic Commission is increasingly alarmed by the systematic violation of human rights by the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua; and,

Whereas, the Hispanic Commission is concerned with the massive flow of Soviet, Cuban, P.L.O., Libyan and Eastern-bloc personnel, arms and materiel into Nicaragua which, in the past year alone, has totalled five hundred million dollars; and,

Whereas, the Sandinista government has provided weapons, training and political support to Communist guerrillas intent in overthrowing the democratically-elected governments of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, Colombia and other countries in the region; and,

Whereas, the Hispanic Commision believes that the establishment of Soviet client states in Central America would result in great increases in United States military expenditures to the detriment of social programs at home and other international commitments; and

Whereas, the Hispanic Commission is concerned that the resulting destabilization in Central America would result in a mass of political refugees coming to the United States which would further strain the limited resources available for social services; and,

Whereas, the people of Nicaragua demonstrated their commitment to democracy in the struggle against the Somoza regime and today they resist communist tyranny and are willing to fight for freedom; and,

Whereas, the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters are in need of arms and supplies to counter the massive influx of Soviet, Cuban, P.L.O., Libian and Eastern-bloc personnel and supplies; and,

Whereas, the Hispanic Commission believes that it is morally right to help people who struggle for freedom; and,

Whereas, the Hispanic Commission believes that the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua has betrayed the goals of the Nicaraguan revolution and has permitted their country to be used as a terrorist haven and a Soviet base in the Western Hemisphere; and,

Whereas, the Hispanic Commission believes that the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters today embody the hopes and aspirations of the Nicaraguan people; and,

Whereas, the President of the United States has requested the Congress to provide funds in the amount of one hundred million dollars for military and humanitarian assistance to the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters to help them in their struggle for freedom and democracy; and,

Whereas, the Hispanic Commission believes that rejection by the Congress of the President's request would be a catastrophic blow to the forces fighting for freedom in this hemisphere and would abandon to Communist tyranny the people of Nicaragua who have relied on American support of their cause; and,

Whereas, the Hispanic Commission believes that it is in the national interest of the United States to promote democracy in Central America; and,

Whereas, the Hispanic Commission believes that rejection by the Congress of the President's aid proposal for the Nicaraguan freedom fighters would encourage further Communist aggression in the region and would ultimately require a U.S. military response;

Therefore, be it resolved, that the Florida State Commission on Hispanic Affairs supports the President's request for one hundred million dollars in military and humanitarian assistance to the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters and urges the members of Congress, regardless of party affiliation, to support this bill.

Furthermore, the Florida State Commission on Hispanic Affairs urges Americans of all backgrounds, especially those like the Soviet Jews, Poles, Hungarians, East Germans, Rumanians, Ukranians, Czechoslovakian, Vietnamese, Cambodians and other witnesses of Communist repression to voice their support for the President's request.

Furthermore, the Chairman of the Florida State Commission on Hispanic Affairs, Rafael A. Penalver, Jr., and all other members of the commission who may wish to join him, are hereby authorized to travel to Washington, D.C., all at their own expense, to present this resolution to the President of the United States, the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate and all members of Congress.

(Approved and Resolved this 7th day of March, 1986 in Key West, Florida.)

RAFAEL A. PENALVER, Jr.,
Chairman.

JACK VALENTI

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the class individuals in Washington, DC is Jack Valenti, president of the Motion Picture Association of America.

He has contributed a great deal to the Nation, both as a former aide to President Lyndon Johnson, and now as a industry executive. He is always ready to help a good cause, and the public dialog is better off with people like Jack Valenti around.

I ask that Gary Arnold's article in "Politics" be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

BODY POLITIC

A radiantly dapper and distinguished white-haired gentleman whose dynamically compact presence was once described by a reporter as "shorter than average but larger than life," Jack Valentine sums up his durable in two sentences. "I survived," he concedes with a fleeting grin and exaggerated shrug. "That is no small accomplishment in places like Washington and Hollywood, where the casualty rates are sometimes high."

This month Valenti will complete his 20th year as president of the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA), a job that makes him the chief spokesman, lobbyist and trade negotiator for the film industry. He had formerly served as a special assistant and speechwriter for President Lyndon Johnson.

Valenti came to Washington in a state of shock on the afternoon of November 22, 1963. In the crisis atmosphere created by the assassination of President John F. Kennedy in Dallas, Vice President Johnson immediately drafted Valenti and others into government service. But it wasn't until June 1985 that Valenti gained notoriety, thanks to one of these peculiarly virulent attacks of righteous indignation that lend credence to charges of a "hive mentality" within the Washington press establishment.

INDISPENSABLE GAFFE

It was his unwitting offense to praise his boss and mentor at a speech delivered in Boston at the annual convention of the Advertising Federation of America. Valenti utterly failed to anticipate that terms of praise he considered merely sincere would be ridiculed as intolerably fulsome by journalistic scolds. In retrospect it might be argued that Valenti popularized the now ubiquitous and indispensable "gaffe," pursued by the press like pigs on a truffle hunt. At the time, of course, Valenti never saw 'em coming.

"I was pleased at the invitation," he recalls. "I thought of it as a very proud occasion, and pride went before my fall, but it never occurred to me that this little Boston speech would have any public repercusions. I didn't even know there was a problem until I got back to Washington the next day and George Ready, the press secretary, got on me because he was being bombarded with demands for copies of the speech. 'What on earth did you say up there?' he wanted to know.

"It was still a mystery to me, but I soon found out that the offending part had come at the end. And that was the rhetorical flourish I'd admired the most when writing and giving the speech. I thought I'd composed something really elegant." Quoting from indelible memory, Valenti recites the infamous passage.

"Once, during the deadly days of the Nazi terror, when a desperate France had been overrun and the heel of the Nazi was on the neck of the French, Winston Churchill spoke to the French people in a radio broadcast. 'Francais, c'est moi, Churchill." He told them not to lose heart, that in due time, the free world would stir itself and relieve the French of their long night. 'So,' he said, 'sleep well, my Frenchmen, sleep well to gather strength for the morning, for the morning shall come.'" Then came the kicker: "I sleep each night a little better, a little more confidently because Lyndon Johnson is my President. For I know he lives and thinks and works to make sure that for all Americans, and indeed, the growing body of the free world, the morning shall always come."

Valenti was not destined to sleep well for several nights after the press, just beginning to accumulate gripes about a "credibility gap" where Vietnam War policy was concerned, got wind of his sittingduck oration and couldn't resist roasting it to a crisp. "The ridicule that hurt the most," Valenti says, "was Herblock's cartoon in The Washington Post. I've valued Herb as a friend for many years now, but at that time he really socked it to me. He drew a plantation scene with me as a cringing, yes massa, no massa kind of slave.

"The president helped take away some of the sting. 'Forget it,' he said. 'How many special assistants in the history of this office ever said anything memorable?' Then he added, 'Come to think of it, how many presidents ever said something memorable? Well, I took a beating, and it was tough and humiliating to take it, but I think it taught me a useful lesson in humility."

Valenti was recruited for the MPAA job in 1966 by two men—Lew Wasserman, then the president and now chairman of MCA and still the single most powerful and influential executive in the movie business, and Edwin Weisl Sr. a lawyer and confidant to President Johnson. Initially reluctant to endorse the idea and part with Valenti, the president countered at one point with an offer of the ambassadorial post in Italy. Gradually, he relented, aware that the MPAA offered an improvement in Valenti's annual White House salary of $30,000. Nevertheless, his original contract with the association permitted Valenti emergency leave if President Johnson found his services necessary—which he promptly did while preparing for the Manila Conference in October 1966.

PIRACY

Valenti, after 20 years no less an engine than LBJ, expects politics and the political role he plays to become even more important to the future of the industry he represents."The problems and opportunities that exist right now were simply unimaginable when I started the job 20 years ago. That was another world, a simpler world. But there was no comparison, because what did you have? The movies and television. There were a handful of cable systems, but they didn't constitute a significant market or challenge. No one had invented the superstation or the VCR or the satellite dish, or all these other delivery systems. There was piracy, but it wasn't remotely as malignant, as difficult to police, as it became once you could record a movie on a blank tape small enough to hold in your hand. And against all these exotic toxins, your only armor was the copyright laws—a pretty shabby, creaky, cracked suit of armor."

Today, Valenti believes, his industry is faced with two great challenges—new technology and foreign market constraints. He speaks confidently about his political role in meeting the challenge of foreign trade and even attibutes part of that challenge to the strength of the American film.

"Unless it's been mortgaged beyond recall from the very beginning a motion picture can be a priceless asset. Its shelf life may never end and its reach is potentially global.

"That reach is responsible for some of the resistance we encounter when negotiating trade contracts with 120 countries around the world, because the appeal of the American entertainment film is unmatched. That fact causes inevitable kinds of envy and resentment and tempts some societies to erect barriers against us and impose outrageous penalties on us.

"How do we answer that kind of prejudice? With patience when it comes to soothing the cultural envy but firmness when it comes to insisting on equitable trade. We've had a problem with the Koreans lately, but I think that dispute is coming along satisfactorily. All we're expecting is to be treated with the same hospitality our country extends to trading partners. I told them, 'You've got cars and VCR's you're eager to sell in America, so why penalize our movies with quotas and high tariffs? Let's try to work things out.' And they've been forthcoming."

Valenti is less confident that politics will be helpful in meeting the challenges posed by new technology. No one seems quite sure what to expect of the promising but also imponderable market created by the popularity of videocassette recorders. While the theatrical market was declining to about $3.7 billion in 1985, home video was growing by a factor of 100 percent to $3.3 billion. It's taken for granted that home video revenue will surpass theatrical revenue in the United States this year. Worldwide it may already be a greater source of revenue. Nevertheless, it looms as a vast new market that also creates transitional difficulties for the movie business, loath to see its copyrighted merchandise reproduced and retailed in a format that makes a good deal of unathorized copying impossible to prevent while returning a far smaller share of income to the film companies than the theatrical exhibition does.

UNFATHOMABLE

"Where are we going?" Valenti asks rhetorically. "Nobody, but nobody," he proceeds to emphasize, "can fathom that prospect. That's what we're trying to determine now. A lot of time and effort in this organization go into planning for the business landscape just over the horizon, but in general terms, the best we can do is grab a hold of whichever curve seems to be ascending and try to keep pace with the magic of technology, which has certainly been way ahead of us."

Ultimately, Valenti hopes, human nature will work to the advantage of his industry.

"I don't believe people will want to remain hostages in their living room day after day, even if they turn the living room, or the rec room, into a pleasant, high-tech theater setting. But there's no doubt that movies are going to remain high on the list of things people elect to spend their leisure hours on."

The challenge of his office hasn't really changed Valenti. He still prides himself on being a promptly accessible public figure, particularly when responding to phone calls. "I'm available to damn near everybody," he maintains, "and I get a kick out of answering all my calls personally and even dialing the numbers myself. It's almost unheard of, but I think it's a useful management practice. For one thing, it's easier to get through to people."

Valenti remains a very political man. His job has kept him at the turbulent intersection of politics, entertainment, international trade and rapidly developing technology. But it is no surprise that he still speaks fondly of his days as a Johnson aide.

Valenti described his years as a White House assistant in his second book, A Very Human President, published in 1975. Despite the success and prominence he's enjoyed while heading the MPAA, Valenti still regards the association with President Johnson as the climactic peak of his professional life. As he expressed it in the book, "I have worked in two of life's classic fascinations, politics and movies, and while there are dazzling attractions in both areas, it is the political man who most excites me. Since LBJ was the quintessential political being, I suppose that is why I was in thrall continuously to him . . . I personally will never look upon his like again . . . He was an awesome engine of a man."

THE DRUG PROBLEM

HON. GERALD D. KLECZKA

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, last Sunday, we all listened closely to the President's speech on Central America. One point really caught my attention: We should fund the Contras because the Sandinistas engage in drug trafficking. Every parent concerned about the drug problem should be outraged, said the President.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I too am outraged about the drug problem, but for a different reason. Because despite all the lip service this administration has paid to the war on drugs, it has repeatedly slashed the drug interdiction budget.

Take a look at the Customs Air Program, a vital component of our interdiction force. Last year, we appropriated $75 million for fiscal 1986. This year, the President has proposed a rescission to leave only $52.5 million.

Take a look at the Air Force wing of radar planes that were supposed to supplement Customs air efforts. Last year, we authorized $35 million to get this project started. So far DOD hasn't spent a dime from this account, and the President's 1987 budget eliminates the program.

Mr. President, let's not blame Sandinistas for problems your administration have failed to address. If you really want to start a war, start the war on drugs.

DEBRA LOUISE EBY, GEORGIA WINNER OF VOICE OF DEMOCRACY

HON. ROBERT LINDSAY THOMAS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. THOMAS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, to look into the future of our Nation, we need look no farther than to the people of America. That is the reason that I know that our future is bright.

As I travel throughout the communities of my own district, I am always struck by the fact that the youth of my own State are brighter, more articulate, and, very often, more concerned and aware of national issues than were the youth of my own generation.

For those who may have the idea that the younger generation has lost touch with the values of America, I invite their attention to Ms. Debra Louise Eby of Hinesville, GA. Debra is the 18-year-old daughter of Lt. Col. and Mrs. Daniel Eby, and she has an outstanding record of accomplishments and activities at her high school, Bradwell Institute.

Her most recent achievement has been to win first prize in the Georgia competition of the Voice of Democracy scriptwriting contest sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and its Ladies Auxiliary.

This program was started 38 years ago, and this past year more than a quarter of a million students participated. More than 8,000 schools took part in the contest along with 4,000 VFW posts and 3,500 Ladies Auxiliaries and 2,300 radio and TV stations. The total monetary value of scholarships and awards provided last year amounted to $675,000.

Ms. Eby faced some very tough competition in the Georgia contest, and on behalf of the people of the First Congressional District, I salute her achievement and congratulate her for bringing this honor to our coastal empire area.

Mr. Speaker, Ms. Eby's winning script is placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point:

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

(By Debi Eby)

When I was thirteen or fourteen, I decided that President Reagan needed some help in leading the country, so I wrote a letter to him explaining what I would do if I were in his shoes. I never mailed that letter—I still have it somewhere—and that's probably for the best, because some of my suggestions were very implausible. For example, I wanted to make it illegal for anyone to earn over $50,000 a year. My ideas may have been outlandish, but I am proud that I felt that my views were worth the attention of the President. As a wise man once said, "There are no limits to those who see none." America's youth should see and set no limits for themselves—they should always strive to reach that new horizon. After all, what is a horizon but the point at which all limits end?

Now that we, the youth of America, are finally free from the "seen but not heard" taboo, we have the opportunity to speak up and speak out. And we have done just that. Young men and women are volunteering their talents for social services, holding leadership posts in local governments, voicing their opinions in newspapers, magazines, and other publications, organizing marches to protest unwanted legislation, and working in innumerable other ways to better their communities and country.

Only by continuing such activities can we youth expand our horizons. Therefore, we should have only one goal—to continue, to the best of our time and abilities, to lessen the gap between "what is" and "what should be." In other words, we must do everything possible to improve our country. Before we can accomplish this or any other endeavor, though, we must recognize that we can make a difference. If we set "limits" for ourselves, the only thing we will ever see is a sunset. Wisdom may come with age, as the saying goes, but if we wait until we are wise enough never to make mistakes, we will never make any difference, either. Concern for the welfare of the United States is what is needed most in this country right now, and there is no age limit on caring. So let's voice our opinions—no matter how unusual they may be. Worthy thoughts breed worthy actions.

Before we can "widen our horizons," though, we must modify the attitudes of those people who believe that American youth must simply be tolerated until they "grow up." These people see youth as a detriment to society, rather than an asset. To them, we are just a bunch of immature kids. We must dispel this stereotype by convincing them that we are worthy of their respect, that inexperienced does not mean inept. Our generation is better educated than any of our predecessors. This fact is a powerful tool which we must use to our advantage. With it, we can convince our critics that the word reasonable can describe youth. With it, we can continue to improve or lives and the lives of our contrymen to the best of our abilities. With it, we can reach new and greater heights.

I can't tell you exactly how I'm going to improve my country, because I don't know myself. I do know, though, that I will take advantage of any and every opportunity which comes my way. For example, I suggested to the President that he maintain a so-called "suggestion box"—an address that people could write to and offer any comments or suggestions they might have. My father told me that it would cost too much to have someone open and read all that mail. I don't know, he may be right, but might it not be worth the expense? This country is a democracy—doesn't that mean that the people rule? I cannot think of a better way for the people, both old and young, to express their opinions. And who knows? One of those ideas may just make this world a little bit better. We, the youth of America, are going to use all the "suggestions boxes" we can find to improve our country. And me? I'm looking forward to the day when "what should be" finally "is."

SANDINISTA DOUBLE STANDARD ON HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. F. JAMES SENSENBRENNER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, a recent issue of the New Republic magazine clearly outlines the double standard on human rights abuses. So that my colleagues will be able to clearly see what is happening in Latin America, I am inserting it into the RECORD at this point:

The article follows:

[From the New Republic, Jan. 20, 1986]

THE SANDINISTA LOBBY

(By Fred Barnes)

Last July 1 a man named Alvayro Jose Baldizon Aviles slipped across the border from Nicaragua into Honduras. He was no ordinary refugee. Baldizon was chief of the special investigations commission of Nicaragua's Ministry of Interior. He worked for Tomas Borge, the interior minister and a powerful figure in the Sandinista government. Baldizon had an eye-popping story to tell of massive human rights abuses by the Sandinistas. In September and October, under the guidance of the U.S. State Department, he told it all over Washington.

Citing specific names, dates, and locations, Baldizon disclosed hundreds of murders of peasants, prisoners, Indians, businessmen, and opponents of the Sandinista regime, all of them carried out by Nicaraguan government soldiers or police. Borge personally ordered some killings and whitewashed others, Baldizon said. In 1981 Borge allegedly standardized the practice of murdering political foes by issuing a secret order allowing "special measures," the euphemism for assassinations. He institutionalized the deception of visiting foreigners, appearing before Christian groups in an office with a crucifix, a statue of Jesus Christ, and a Bible. His real office is adorned with pictures of Marx, Engels, and Lenin, and copies of The Communist Manifesto and Das Kapital. Moreover, Borge was involved in cocaine trafficking, put former criminals in police jobs, and installed Cuban advisers in operational posts. Baldizon also said the Sandinistas were training Costa Rican guerrillas and using mobs of young Sandinistas to break up gatherings of political opponents.

Even by Latin American standards, this was quite an indictment, exactly the kind of firsthand account likely to trigger outrage by groups monitoring human rights in Central America. And maybe even spark an aggressive investigation or two. But not by the Washington Office on Latin America, which says it "monitors human rights practices and political developments in Central and South America . . . [and promotes] a foreign policy that advances human rights, peace, and democracy in the hemisphere." Joseph T. Eldridge, the Methodist minister and former missionary in Chile who is WOLA's director, was invited along with other human rights activists to a session with Baldizon at the State Department on October 3. Eldridge didn't show. He did call to ask about a private session with Baldizon, and State Department officials agreed so long as one of their staff aides was present. Later, Eldridge canceled the meeting because of a schedule conflict. He insists he's still trying to meet with Baldizon. But Janice Barbieri of the State Department's office of public diplomacy says Eldridge isn't trying very hard; he hasn't even called back to set up a new time. Whatever the case, it's been months, and Eldridge has yet to meet with Baldizon.

This indifference to Baldizon and his evidence of systematic abuses of human rights was not a lapse. On the contrary, it reflects the selective moral indignation of a phalanx of organizations in Washington that regularly criticizes the Reagan administration's policy toward Central America and, in particular, Nicaragua. The ostensible aims of these groups are high-minded: peace, protection of human rights, free elections, an end to domination of politics by oligarchies, etc. And they tirelessly point out how Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, and Panama—all allies of the United States—come up short. But Nicaragua, with its increasingly repressive Sandinista regime, is another story. What criticism these organizations have of Nicaragua is soft-hitting in the extreme. Mostly they explain away or ignore abuses by the Sandinistas.

These organizations and their leaders refer to themselves as "the community." But they've been accused of being something quite different. A Heritage Foundation paper labeled them "The Left's Latin American Lobby." A book by the Council for Inter-American Security attacks them as "The Revolution Lobby." Bruce Cameron, a former lobbyist for Americans for Democratic Action, says WOLA at least is a "shill for the Sandinistas." Naturally, WOLA and other groups disagree. "There is an attitude in [Washington] that equates opposition to the administration's Central American policy with support for the Sandinista government," says Eldridge. "This is an unfortunate and lamentable conclusion."

Maybe so, but WOLA and other organizations haven't exactly gone out of their way to show that they don't apply a double standard—tough on right-wing governments and U.S. allies, soft on left-wing regimes. A good place to start would have been with Baldizon. Juan Mendez of America's Watch, a human rights monitoring group, went to the trouble of taking Baldizon to lunch, where they could confer without State Department interference. But America's Watch seems more interested in countering Reagan's attacks on Nicaragua than checking out Baldizon's evidence. Last July it put out a report evaluating Nicaragua's human rights record. The logical yardstick was the Sandinista promise of political pluralism and a mixed economy. Had the Sandinistas delivered on these? But that wasn't the question asked. Rather, America's Watch found the one human rights standard that the Sandinistas can meet: Is their human rights record as bad as Reagan says? Nope, America's Watch concluded.

WOLA doesn't pretend to be anything but an advocacy organization. It advocates friendly, tolerant relations with Nicaragua. But similar questions arise in the case of legal groups, whose nominal concern is not policy but the rule of law. Susan Benda of the American Civil Liberties Union says her only concern is blocking U.S. involvement in the covert war waged by the contras. "We're opposed to this covert war regardless of what the Sandinistas do," she says. "We don't care if they close down the press. What the Sandinistas do doesn't affect our opinion on the war."

But at least one legal group is now taking care to avoid the appearance of a double standard. Amy Young, the director of the International Human Rights Law Group, now admits that her organization's study of contra abuses last year should also have looked at Sandinista conduct. In a new investigation early in 1986—another vote on contra aid comes in March—both sides will be examined, she says, Larry Garber, IHRLG's project director, characterizes the soft-on-the-Sandinistas approach of some groups as "avoidance tactics." Although they recognize there are human rights problems in Nicaragua, "they won't go down and investigate," he says. Why not? "It's no secret some organizations in town were excited about what happended in Nicaragua and are still hopeful it will be a revolution that brings lasting peace and stability. They've been willing to forgive things that have gone on during a time of transition. That time is over."

Practically no one is more forgiving than the Coalition for a New Foreign and Military Policy, the umbrella group of "the community." Its 50-odd members include WOLA, the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, the Washington office of the Presbyterian Church (USA), the American Friends Service Committee, and the YWCA. The coalition, along with the Commission on U.S.-Central American Relations, published what it called a "basic information" book on Central America. According to the book, the Sandinistas have done little wrong, and when they have, it was only because the United States forced them to.

Take the massive Sandinista arms buildup. It began in 1979, at a time when the U.S. government was reasonably friendly, and has gone on unabated. Nicaragua now has by far the largest military force in Central America. Yet the "basic information" book attributes the Sandinista buildup to fear of a U.S. invasion. "In short, the Nicaraguans want to raise the military, and thereby the political, cost of a U.S.-sponsored invasion," it says. Nor do the Nicaraguans threaten their neighbors. "Despite the difficulty in distinguishing between offensive and defensive weapons, it is clear that the military strengthening that Nicaragua has undergone in the last few years is primarily defensive, not offensive." Even MIGs from the Soviets, the book says, wouldn't give Nicaragua "a credible offensive force capable of invading any country in the region."

The book is vague about the political leanings of the Sandinista directorate, vague in a way that misleads. Borge, the interior minister, is described as "a poet and a writer [who] has studied law at the National University." This is the fellow who confided to Playboy magazine in 1983: "I told [my mother] that I would not be blackmailed by her gentleness and her naivete and that I was a Communist." Humberto Ortega, the defense minister and brother of Nicaraguan president Daniel Ortega, is described simply as an author. Yet Ortega doesn't mince words about his ideology. "Marxism-Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution," he said in 1981. "Our moral strength is Sandinismo and our doctrine is that of Marxism-Leninism."

As the Sandinistas are legitimized by "the community," the contras are demonized. Dissenting opinions are not tolerated on this point. When Bruce Cameron decided that support for the contras would promote human rights in Nicaragua, he was no longer welcome in "the community."

The acceptable line on the contras is that they are old Somoza hands who have generated no popular support for their insurgency. "Nicaraguans," wrote Reggie Norton of WOLA in the coalition's book, "are justifiably concerned that far from representing a promise to improve their lives, the contras represent a return to the type of repression that characterized the Somoza regime." This may have been true five years ago, but since then the contras have been transformed from a small band of ex-National Guardsmen to a 15,000-man force that has won the support of such anti-Somoza leaders as Alfonso Robelo and Arturo Cruz. Mass defections to the contras, plus their ability to operate in large areas of Nicaragua, are palpable signs of a surge in popularity, and evidence of growing disenchantment with the Sandinistas.

On the subject of elections, Eldridge of WOLA talks scornfully about the recent election in Guatemala, which saw a once-exiled dissident win the presidency. After all, Eldridge says, "elections are one note in the symphony of democracy. . . . The gist is it [the Guatemalan election] was technically flawless. Hats off. The question is whether this will wean the military away from its monopoly of power. A lot of people are skeptical." But the Nicaraguan election in 1984 was "a political opening," concluded a report by WOLA and IHRLG. Serious impediments to free choice by the voters were minimized in the report. There was censorship, but the parties were permitted "to communicate to the Nicaraguan people" their "vision for the future" and "to criticize freely the performance of the government." Repeated "incidents of harassment and intimidation" occurred—Sandinista mobs broke up opposition rallies—but they didn't affect much. The chief opposition party, the Coordinator, which dropped out charging that the election wasn't free or fair, acted for "political reasons."

Eldridge says that half the leaders of the Coordinator would rather have an invasion by U.S. Marines than participate in an election. If so, then why did the Coordinator accept the Sandinista condition that the contras be asked to lay down their arms for the election? In fact, the Coordinator's candidate, Arturo Cruz, negotiated feverishly for a postponed election in which the opposition would take part. At the key moment, though, the Sandinistas backed out.

The Sandinista sympathizers continue to insist that political pluralism is the general rule in Nicaragua. America's Watch proclaimed in July 1985 that "while prior censorship has been imposed by emergency legislation, debate on major social and political questions is robust, outspoken, even often strident" in Nicaragua. In fact, just as under Somoza's regime, debate is allowed only so long as it doesn't threaten the authorities.

The America's Watch report claims that the group does "not take a position on the U.S. geopolitical strategy in Central America," then goes on to do exactly that. There have been abuses of human rights by the Sandinistas, it says, but "some notable reductions in abuses have occurred in Nicaragua since 1982, despite the pressure caused by escalating external attacks." This is exactly what the Sandinistas say. Baldizon, who was in a position to know, tells a strikingly different story. So do Protestant preachers who have been arrested recently in Nicaragua. And last October the Sandinistas suspended what few civil liberties had been allowed.

One organization that has gone to great lengths to explain away this new state of emergency is the Central American Historical Institute at Georgetown University. Tossing out civil liberties "does not violate the U.N. International Civil and Political Rights Amendment," the institute said in 1984. And the state of emergency doesn't take away the right to life or justify torture or slavery, or block "freedom of thought, conscience, or religion," the institute said. "Nor is it applied in a discriminatory fashion," it added, suggesting that political repression is less troubling if it is evenhanded.

The institute points out the impressive turnout of 75 percent for the election, despite efforts by the Coordinator to discourage voting. "This, and the fact that opposition parties won one-third of the valid votes, contradicts the accusation that the election was merely a rubber stamp for the [Sandinistas]." Last May, in its publication Update, the institute went to great lengths to knock down an article in La Prensa, the frequently censored opposition paper in Nicaragua. Jaime Chamorro, the paper's co-director, charged that the Sandinistas added 400,000 votes to their tally. The same month the institute said in another Update that opposition parties are alive and "kicking" in Nicaragua's National Assembly. The Sandinistas like "a give and take dynamic to prevail so as to not alienate what amounts to a 'loyal' opposition.

The institute frequently attacks the contras, but is squeamish about Sandinista abuses. In a rundown of contra leaders, it lists Lucia Cardenal de Salazar as "widow of Jorge Salazar, wealthy coffee grower killed in a November 1980 dispute with Nicaraguan police." Shirley Christian of the New York Times reports in her book Nicaragua that Jorge Salazar was assassinated by Sandinista security forces. Baldizon confirmed that Sandinista leaders were involved in plotting and carrying out Salazar's death.

The biggest splash made by "the community" has been with its well-timed reports on contra abuses. The most famous of these was written by Reed Brody, a New York lawyer. He charged that the contras attack purely civilian targets, and he cited instances of killings of unarmed women and children, rapes, beatings, kidnapings, forced recruitment of new troops, disruption of harvests, and intimidation of people joining government programs. With a congressional vote on aid to the contras a few weeks away last spring, the Brody report got big play in the press. But it was, at best, open to question. A Reagan administration examination of the report found that six incidents cited by Brody had been carried out by a contra officer later executed for murdering civilians and that four incidents occurred before the contras were constituted as an organized force. Brody blames the contras for killing a French doctor with mortar fire, but the contras say they had no mortars in that incident and that Sandinista fire killed him. Moreover, the administration says 48 rifles and 11,500 rounds of ammunition were seized from what Brody describes as merely a farm, and that a "deeply religious" couple killed by contras were actually agents of Sandinasta state security. Brody was candid enough to disclose that the idea for the report came from Reichler & Applebaum, the Wshington law firm that represents the Nicaraguan government. And he also revealed that in Nicaragua he was housed and given office space by the Sandinistas. The government even directed him to witnesses. Still, Brody said, his investigation was "independent." He made no attempt to probe Sandinista abuses.

A recent Sandinista defector has described Brody's close relationship with the Nicaraguan government. Mario Jose Guerrero was director of the National Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights. The commission, Guerrero said, was ordered to give full support to Brody. Besides office and lodging, it paid all his bills and arranged interviews. Another defector, Bayardo de Jesus Payan, was the chief budget officer of the commission. He described Brody in action to a House subcommittee:

"I . . . noticed that many times he showed a photograph in which he was hugging Commander Daniel Ortega and also that he was constantly calling on the telephone to the foreign ministry and visiting it. He also made propaganda for the [Sandinistas] and urged the employees of the institution to vote for Daniel Ortega, since he was a great supporter of the Sandinistas. Also, he always spoke badly about the policy of the government of the United States and of President Ronald Reagan."

WOLA and the International Human Rights Law Group found Brody's evidence compelling, but they were worried that his connection with the Sandinistas would deprive the report of credibility. They dispatched two lawyers, one an outspoken critic of administration policy, to Nicaragua to check on contra abuses. These representatives also neglected to examine abuses by the Nicaraguan government. But they managed to corroborate some of the Brody report, and they declared their support for it. America's Watch supplied a report of its own, which dealt with both sides. It concluded that Sandinista abuses were mainly in 1981 and 1982, and directed against the Miskito Indians. Since then, there had been a "sharp decline" in Sandinista abuses, America's Watch said. Baldizon, for one, would quarrel with that.

"The community" does make some efforts to demonstrate evenhandedness. WOLA, Eldridge says, has been "steadfastly encouraging dialogue in Nicaragua, as in El Salvador." Indeed, WOLA sponsored a visit to the United States by leaders of El Salvador's guerrilla forces. But the contra leaders in Nicaragua are out of bounds. Eldridge is for a dialogue between Duarte and his Communist opposition, but not for one between the Sandinistas and the contras. The dialogue he wants would pit only the erratic Eden Pastora, once a Sandinista commander, and perhaps Arturo Cruz against the Sandinistas. Cruz could be there only as an individual, not as a leader of the contras, says Eldridge. Which means that the main political and military opposition to the Sandinistas would be excluded, and the Sandinistas will be under little pressure in the talks to make concessions to democracy. Some dialogue.

FOREIGNERS INCREASE HOLDINGS OF U.S. GOVERNMENT SECURITIES BY $20 BILLION TO A TOTAL OF $213 BILLION—BILLIONS IN INTEREST ON PUBLIC DEBT GOES OVERSEAS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, it is certainly nice to have the use of foreigners' money to help finance our staggering deficits. It keeps the interest rates in this country lower amd makes it less painful to finance our red ink spending.

The latest figures from the Treasury show that between November 1984 and November 1985, the "estimated total foreign holdings of marketable and nonmarketable Treasury bills, notes and bonds reported by banks and brokers in the United States" rose from $193.4 to $212.9 billion.

From this, one can estimate that somewhere near $20 billion a year in interest on the public debt will go to foreigners. This is money which, if it were not for the deficits, could have gone into investment in America—in our roads, our education system, our defense, our health services, or lower taxes.

The new figures are interesting. They show that the Middle East oil exporters are drawing down their investments as the price of oil falls. Between November 1983 and November 1985, their holdings of U.S. Government securities fell from $34.3 to $26.7 billion. The old fears of Arab oil influence in America are drying up.

Who are the big new investors? The Japanese. We are running about $4 billion a month in our trade deficit with Japan. A lot of those extra dollars are ending up in United States securities—to draw interest for future generations of Japanese. Between November 1983 and November 1985, the Japanese increased their holdings from $20.6 to $42.7 billion.

Last year, for the first time since 1917, the United States became a net debtor to the world. We will be paying for that debt and for our deficit spending binge of the Reagan years for a long, long time to come.

SPRINGFIELD'S 300TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to request that my distinguished colleagues join in saluting the citizens of Springfield, Delaware County, PA who this year are celebrating their 300th anniversary. The residents are commemorating this landmark in their history on June 21, 1986, the date which marks the foundation of the township as a government entity.

Since the founding of Springfield by William Penn in 1686, Springfield residents have preserved the honor and continuity of their community through the many trials which have swept our Nation. I want to extend my heartiest congratulations to them for maintaining a commitment to preserving the township's past as they continue to look to the future. The pride with which they have blended tradition and innovation has helped to create a wonderful community in which to live and raise a family for all of its three centuries. I hope that this milestone marks only the beginning of a long and productive life for the township of Springfield and its denizens.

AMERICAN AGRICULTURE

HON. FRANK McCLOSKEY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, today we are recognizing the importance of agriculture to our economy, to our security and to our Nation. But unless our words are transformed into effective policies, the praise expressed today for the American farmer will ring hollow. Net farm income is down. The great farm depression which began in 1982 is still with us. Despite the good faith efforts here in Congress to enact a farm bill to protect farm income and farm credit legislation to avert catastrophic failure of the farm credit system, thousand of farmers face greater difficulties and the specter of farm foreclosure continues to stalk the Midwest. Without an administration willing to implement the highest level of income support for farmers contained in the 1985 farm bill, the 1986 crop year will be bleak indeed for producers of food and fiber. While interest rates are falling into single digits for big business, they remain well above 10 percent for family farmers. At a time when the dollar's value is falling, we find little evidence from the White House of a coherent policy to systematically expand farm exports. Nor does there appear to be concern about the damage caused to beef and pork producers because of imports coming in from north and south of the border. And as land values continue to fall, the administration continues to defy the sentiment in Congress that advance loan payments should be made this spring to farmers. Oh yes, the administration will point to the bookkeeping changes that increased made available an additional $750 million to the Farmers Home Administration.

So, if today is going to be a meaningful exercise recognizing the importance of agriculture, we must continue to press the administration to address the issues which I have mentioned. To do so will not bust the budget. In addition, we must insist that the President expedite the appointment of the new Farm Credit Administration to get on with the job of implementing the Farm Credit System [FCS] amendments. Congress in good faith overwhelmingly supported FCS restructuring. However, the delay in appointment of these officials has caused confusion and uncertainty about provisions of this important credit legislation most important to FCS member-borrowers, especially in the area of management of acquired properties.

Despite the dark picture facing many farmers in my district and elsewhere, we should not overlook the inherent strength of American agriculture. Given time and a national leadership that understands the importance of policies emphasizing net income protection for the family farmer, agriculture may be able to join other sectors in economic recovery. But an administration that seeks to severely cut Cooperative Extension Service activities, slash soil conservation programs, and impose user fees on farmers who are just beginning to see relief in the form of lower fuel prices is not that national leadership. I am confident that my colleagues in the House on both sides of the aisle will in the days ahead continue to press the administration of these issues. The current "look Ma, no hands" farm policy just won't do. Such an attitude will only produce a "look Ma, no farms" result.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

HON. TOMMY ROBINSON

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, many Arkansans have been touched by the crisis in American agriculture. Most of us grew up on a farm, or have family or friends who are farmers. Though city dwellers may scoff, you and I know that family farming is the backbone of our economy and our culture.

Congress recognized the importance of agriculture in a unique way—by declaring today, March 20, 1986, as "National Agriculture Day." Such a tribute is certainly deserved, for our farm families work dawn to dusk, rain or shine. They stand to remind all of us that hard work is the basis of American life.

Farm families are special because their work brings them together. They live and work on the same land as their forefathers. Problems are shared by all, but being close, they find strength. The best part about being a farmer I suppose, is seeing the results of their hard work. How proud these families must feel to stand and look at fields brimming with healthy green crops.

It is disturbing that farmers are not getting a fair price for their crops these days, but our farm families are hanging on. They are hanging on to a way of life—their heritage. "National Agriculture Day" is a small, but honest way for us to say "thank you" to our farm families for continuing to provide us wholesome and plentiful food.

And they certainly do provide food. Last year's soybean crop was estimated at 2.13 billion bushels, and corn was estimated at 8.72 billion bushels. That's a record harvest.

To farmers, these record harvests are a mixed blessing. Crop prices fall, but high volume production helps make up for low prices. As a nation, we will never face widespread hunger due to ineffective farming techniques. Without a doubt, famine is a word we Americans do not really understand. Let us all be thankful for that, and let us all remember that farm families have given us more than we could ever give them in return.

MILLER INTRODUCES PROPOSAL TO CREATE PEACE GARDEN

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation authorizing the establishment of a Peace Garden in the District of Columbia.

It is particularly fitting that today, when this Chamber is filled with discussions of war and death, we take time for the creation of a monument to the concept of peace.

There are many memorials in the city at which people pause and consider the tragedy and senselessness of war. But they are all monuments to war, and to its victims. We also should have a monument to the ideal of peace.

My legislation was originally proposed by residents of the San Francisco Bay Area and my own 7th Congressional District who have come together to form the Peace Garden project. I want to congratulate these citizens, and particularly Elizabeth Ratcliff, the president of the project, for initiating the idea for this "place for growth, beauty, and quiet contemplation."

I am also gratified to have the support of my colleagues, Mr. DELLUMS, Mrs. BOXER, Mr. STARK, Mr. BURTON, Mr. EDWARDS of California and Mr. BROWN of California who join me as cosponsors of this legislation.

Members of the project have written to William Penn Mott, the director of the National Park Service, who has responded, "We enthusiastically support your commitment to a serene garden in which people can contemplate its important message."

The legislation authorizes establishment of a Peace Garden in the District of Columbia on a site selected by the Secretary of the Interior, subject to the approval of the Commission on Fine Arts and the National Capital Planning Commission. The Peace Garden project would be charged with the responsibility to design plans which will also be subject to the commissions' approval. The costs of establishing the Peace Garden would be entirely borne by the public, not the taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, in a city filled with monuments to war, to the courageous men and women who have fought for and died for this Nation throughout our history, we surely have room for a monument to one of the great causes for which they fought and died, the cause of peace.

A TRIBUTE TO DOMINICK "DICK" PLESCIA

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Mr. Dominick "Dick" Plescia. On March 21, 1986, Mr. Plescia will be honored with a testimonial dinner by the Textile Workers Pension Fund on the occasion of his retirement. Dick Plescia will be ending a career in the textile dyeing and printing industry spanning almost 50 years.

Dick Plescia has held many distinguished positions and accumulated a string of accomplishments during his long period of service. He began his career in 1938 in Lodi, NJ. where he was born and attended high school. He quickly rose to vice president and then president of local 1932 and was reelected to nine consecutive terms.

As manager of the Chicago Joint Board, Dick Plescia devoted countless hours to strengthening and expanding the joint board. His efforts were also on behalf of his fellow workers. While at the joint board, Dick instituted the Chicago Textile Industry Health and Welfare Fund, a benefits plan for members of the joint board.

As fund manager of the Textile Workers Pension Fund, Dick's untiring efforts and innovative programs has brought the fund continued growth and security. The financial strength of the pension fund today is due in no small part to Dick Plescia.

The many achievements of Dick Plescia would fill several volumes. His spirit and dedication to his fellow workers deserves to be recorded in history as part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It is with great honor and pleasure that I join with so many of Dick's friends in wishing him a retirement filled with good health and prosperity.

MINNESOTA AAUW WILL PROVIDE UNIQUE GLIMPSE AT PROFESSIONAL WORLD TO AREA HIGH SCHOOL WOMEN

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 20, 1986

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, the American Association of University Women has long been recognized as a forerunner in efforts to advance the education and career opportunities of women. The Virginia, MN, branch of AAUW recognizes the importance of implementing these values within the local community, and has established priorities to assist women in utilizing their capabilities and potentials to the fullest degree.

To help pursue these goals, the Virginia AAUW will sponsor a career workshop on April 5 entitled "Invest in Your Future." This workshop will be open to area high school women and will offer exposure to the wide variety of nontraditional career choices available to them.

Thirty professional women from throughout the area will spend the day discussing the positive societal impact women can have in fields including banking, engineering, and law enforcement. Students will have the opportunity to question speakers on every facet of the professional world. Women attending the workshop will be offered a good indication of what to expect from a particular career, and they will be exposed to positive role models—women whose ambition and determination helped them to achieve their goals.

This is the first workshop of its kind to be held in the Virginia area. Area high schools have expressed enthusiastic support, as have the Mesabi Community College and the Eveleth Vocational-Technical Institute. The workshop concept is a valuable contribution that should be explored by other communities.

All too often young people are forced to make career-determining decisions without access to knowledgeable guidance and insight. The Virginia, MN, AAUW workshop will allow young women to approach their futures in a mature, educated manner. I commend all the members of the Virginia AAUW for investing their time and efforts in our country's finest asset—our youth.
